BOOK REVIEW

al-Futūḥāt al-Makkīyah

Edited by ‘Abd al-‘Azīz Sulṭān al-Manṣūb (Yemen: Wizārat al-Thaqāfa Jumhūriyya al-Yamīniyya, 2010).

‘What did we do before this edition?’ That might be the sentiment of scholars of Ibn ‘Arabī after working with the critical edition of ‘Abd al-‘Azīz Sulṭān al-Manṣūb (from Yemen), first printing 2010 (1431 AH). The edition represents eleven years of his work on numerous manuscripts that he studied in libraries in Turkey, Egypt, the Emirates, and elsewhere. The outcome is the first complete, accurate, and thoroughly documented edition of al-Futūḥāt al-Makkīyah.

Poetry is an important part of Ibn ‘Arabī’s work, and the vocalization of the poetic passages is welcome. In addition, the editor provides citations for the poetry Ibn ‘Arabī quotes, usually with the line before and after to situate the quote. When there are obscure usages in the prose passages, the editor often vocalizes the relevant words.

The editor’s Introduction covers Ibn ‘Arabī’s name and birth, childhood, parents, uncles, wives, children, study, spiritual quest, great opening, journeys from West to East, teachers, friends, connections with scholars of the time, miraculous events, authorship, death, and legacy. The first ‘draft’ of Ibn ‘Arabī’s magnum opus was started in 599 AH in Makka and finished in Damascus in 629 AH. In 632, he decided to write a second, final draft, which he finished in 636. Remarkably, the manuscript is in his own hand and its existence even up to today hints at forces beyond the ordinary. The manuscript is 10,544 pages, divided into 37 ‘books’ with 560 chapters—the same number of years as from hijra to the birth of the Shaykh al-Akbar. It is in six sections, and the architecture of the work is such that these six headings are based on ‘geometries’ ranging from divine names to human faculties to physical dimensions.

The Shaykh wrote his book with a Western, Andalusian hand. Some features of the writing style are unpointed letters, but with markings made to clarify potentially confusing phrases; the fā’ is usually pointed below the tail; and the qāf usually has one dot above.

Questioning Ibn ‘Arabī’s negative reception in much of contemporary Islamic discourse, the editor points to 10,634 references to the Qur’ān, 3,518 citations of ḥadīth, and more than 5,000 blessings on the Prophet. From the Introduction, it is clear that the editor would like to reclaim Ibn ‘Arabī as an ‘orthodox’ Muslim thinker for the contemporary world.

The first printed edition of the book (known as Būlāq) came out in 1858, based on the Süleymaniye manuscripts, from the first draft Ibn ‘Arabī produced in the years 599–629. The edition has many errors. In 1910 Dār al-Kutub al-‘Arabiyya al-Kubrā in Egypt decreased the number of errors considerably, printing the work in four volumes. ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Manṣūb writes, ‘We found the differences between it and the Qunya edition to be equal to 1 in every 75 words. Considering that the original book has 1,735,000 words, this means no less than 23,000 differences’ (p. 46). He gives eight examples, such as ‘He has ghalaṭa [erred] in that, the Messenger of God ṣalla Allahu ‘alayhi wa salam, and showed anger at the one who did that’, which is correctly ‘He has aghlaṭa [spoken harshly] about that, the Messenger of God ṣalla Allahu ‘alayhi wa salam, and showed anger at the one who did that’. There is also an important transposition, where the author of al-Madīna al-fāḍila is not one of the ahl al-kufr but one of the ahl al-fikr.

From 1954 on, Dr. ‘Uthmān Yaḥyā (Osman Yahia) from the Sorbonne with UNESCO and the Cultural Ministry of Egypt undertook to improve the Egyptian editions. He used three original manuscripts: Qunya, based on the second draft; another manuscript based on the first found in the Beyazid Library, Turkey, and the Cairo edition printed 1329 AH. He worked eighteen years in preliminary work to produce in 1972 the first volume. The last volume, the fourteenth, came out in 1992. With his death, there were still twenty-three more volumes left.

‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Manṣūb acknowledges the value of this edition, but makes four criticisms. First, much of the critical apparatus is consumed by stylistic differences in orthography. He says, ‘He perhaps could have saved some time by not repeating each difference, such as malā’ikat malā’ikah mala’ikat mala’ikah’ (p. 48). I used to study New Testament texts, where seemingly insignificant variations can be important clues to a manuscript’s history. But in this case, we are dealing simply with regional and stylistic variations. If the four-volume editions are hard to read because of their dense blocking on the page, Osman Yahia’s edition suffers from an overly heavy critical apparatus. The four-volume editions can have over 750 words on a page, with no paragraphing and little punctuation, making the reading more difficult than it possibly needs to be. Osman Yahia’s edition may have only 140 words on a page, with generous spacing of paragraphs and sections, but it also has ten lines of critical apparatus for fifteen lines of text detailing three manuscripts showing, for example, nasha’, nashā’, and nashā’h. The 2010 edition has 4–500 words per page and usually only a few lines below the text.

Second, in Osman Yahia’s comments, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Manṣūb detects an Isma‘ili bias. Third, he takes issue with the use of exclamation marks when referring to the divine, e.g., (ta‘ālā !) or the messenger, e.g., (– ‘alayhi al-salām ! –). This reviewer also notices an overuse of exclamations in the Osman Yahia edition. Although the extensive punctuation may be helpful at times, it means that there is another opening to error. The 2010 edition is lightly punctuated, and after having worked carefully on translating the first volume over the last six months, I have found the punctuation to be helpful and accurate. Fourth, ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Manṣūb says that there have been omissions ‘of many expressions and words from the verified edition, and the advent of words added without indicating that’ (p. 49).

Although ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Manṣūb does not mention the printed edition by Dar al-Kotob (1999), this writer has found numerous errors there, averaging six a page over a hundred pages. The errors are usually clumsy attempts to correct what did not need correcting. Ironically, the Dar al-Kotob edition may be the easiest to visually search, neither too dense (as with the four volumes) nor too spaced (as with Osman Yahia), and so still has a place on my shelf.

‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Manṣūb welcomes digital editions but has found them to be full of errors. He supplies a long list of the significant errors.

The 2010 edition has indexes for the Qur’ān citations, ḥadīth, poems, eyewitness testimonials (to the manuscript’s authenticity), Sufi terms (fully six pages for the first 170 pages of text, including entries such as al-umm, al-ghawth, and wārid), people, places, book titles mentioned, and sects. The indexes of the Dar al-Kotob edition, however, seem to be easier to work with and more extensive (although the entry ‘Muhammad’, found on nearly every page, could have been omitted).

The edition in twelve volumes is bound well and the pages are easy to read. The font is open and light and readable. The work answers the deficiencies of past editions and provides access to this greatest of works by the akbar of shaykhs.

Close work with the three editions (Būlāq, Osman Yahia, and 2010) shows this critical edition to be very well conceived. In 600 pages I found only one verse number error in the apparatus. In the same volume, the dozen or so times that textual variants were important were fully documented. The 2010 edition also notes Qur’ānic variants (Ḥaḥṣ and Warsh) used in the text. The Osman Yahia edition over the same portion of the work had perhaps thirty annotations in the critical apparatus that were very helpful and would have improved this critical edition: e.g., references to ideas explored by Henry Corbin, explicit connections made to Greek thought, and theological-philosophical terminologies. What this critical edition has that the Osman Yahia edition does not is the depth of poetry annotations and the frequent use of Lisān al-‘arab for classical word usages that are unfamiliar to modern Arabic speakers. From the comparison of the critical apparatus in the two editions, the reader will recognize Osman Yahia’s erudition in modern philosophical thought, especially through the French language, and al-Mansoub’s thoroughly Arabic vantage point, where it is the Arabic that opens up the Futūḥāt. From the Introduction to the Qur’ānic citations by sūra name (not number), it is clear that this critical edition is placing the work in its fully Arabic Muslim context and as such provides an important counter to a ‘philosophical’ and ‘universalist’ vision of the Shaykh al-Akbar.

ON MAJESTY AND BEAUTY

The Kitâb Al-Jalâl Wa-l Jamâl of Muhyiddin Ibn 'Arabi

translated by
Rabia Terri Harris

In the Name of Allah, Most Beneficent, Most Merciful
The power and strength are His.

Praise belongs to Allah the Great; His Majesty is part of the manifestation of His Beauty. In His proximity He is the Near, in His loftiness, the Observer. Power, splendour, grandeur, and magnificence are His whose essence is great beyond any resemblance to other essences. His essence is exalted above all motions and stillnesses, all bewilderment and mindfulness. It is too high to be overtaken by any explanation, express or implied, just as it is too great to be limited and described.

It is beyond any physical descent or ascent, any tangible enthronement upon any throne, any haste to seek an object, and – when an object is gained – any satisfaction at reuniting with something that had been missed.

Just so, it is too great to be described in detail or in summary, to be the basis for creeds, to alter with the differences among creeds, to find pleasure or pain in action, or to be qualified with anything but eternity.

It is too great:

- to draw together or be divided.
- for anything that refers to bodies to refer to it.
- for understanding to encompass the core of its reality.
- to be as imagination would describe it.
- to be as wakefulness or dream would seek to perceive it.

It is too great for times and places to hold it, for the permanence of its being to be measured with the passing of months and years, for above and below, right and left, behind and before.

It is too great for denial or confusion to hinder its majesty.

It is too great to be comprehended by intellectual reflection, by the spiritual practices of masters of illumination, by the Knowers' secrets, by the majestic range of leaders' vision – for it is too great to be confined behind veils and curtains, and so cannot be comprehended by anything but its own light.

It is too great:

- either to exist in the shape of a human being or to lose anything by the existence of particular essences.
 - either to accept an alien condition belonging to the entities it has created, or to be defined by negative conditions (though it is confirmed by faith).
 - either to be the place of manifestations, or to be known as past, present or future time.
- It is too great for the senses to rest upon, for doubt and confusion to affect, for likeness and analogy to comprehend, for material classification, or for the intimacy of the man of knowledge.

It is too great to be the third of three in company.

It is great beyond spouse and parents, beyond there being 'a single thing like unto it' (Ikhlas)

4), beyond anything preceding its existence, beyond being attributed limbs, hands, fingers, feet, beyond anything else being with it in eternity.

It is great beyond the laughter and joy promised for the repentance of servants, beyond wrath, beyond habitual wonder, beyond alteration of state as it exists among humankind.

So glory be to Him, Mighty in His magnificence, Grand in His splendour. "There is nothing like unto Him, and He is the Hearing, the Seeing." (Shûrâ 11)

To proceed:

The matter of jalal and jamal, the Divine Majesty and the Divine Beauty, has attracted the attention of the witnesses of truth, the Knowers of Allah among the Sufis. Each of them has spoken of these two as was appropriate to his own state. Most, however, have connected the condition of intimacy with Beauty and the condition of awe with Majesty, and things are not as they have said.

Or rather, to a certain extent things are just as they have said – that is, Majesty and Beauty are indeed two attributes of Allah and awe and intimacy two attributes of human beings, and when the souls of the Knowers witness Majesty they feel awe and diminution, while when they witness Beauty they feel intimacy and elation. Because this is so, the Knowers have equated Majesty with Allah's overpowering force and Beauty with His mercy; they came to this decision because of what they experienced in themselves.

I wish, if Allah so wills, to clarify the realities of the two to the extent that Allah enables me to explain them.

I say, first, that Allah's Majesty is a relation that proceeds from Him to Him, and He has prevented us from true knowledge of it. Beauty, though, is a relation that proceeds from Him to us, and it is this which grants us any knowledge we may possess of Him, as well as all revelations, contemplations, and spiritual states. Among us, it has two modalities: awe and intimacy. That is because this Beauty has an exalted aspect and a related aspect. The exalted aspect is called the Majesty of Beauty, and it is this of which the Knowers speak and which appears to them, though they believe that they are speaking of the first Majesty we mentioned.

For us, this Majesty of Beauty has been linked to the state of intimacy, and the closer, related aspect of Beauty has been linked to the state of awe.

When the Majesty of Beauty manifests to us, we are drawn intimately close. Were it not for this, we would be destroyed, for nothing can continue to exist in the face of Majesty and awe together. Thus Majesty in Him is countered by intimacy in us so that we may keep our balance in contemplation and maintain a mental awareness of what we see, rather than falling into distracted terror.

When Beauty manifests to us here – and Beauty is the welcoming openness of the Truth towards us while Majesty is its unattainable exaltation over us – then His expansiveness in His Beauty is countered by our state of awe. For were one expansiveness to be met with another it would lead to unacceptable behaviour, and unacceptable behaviour in the Divine Presence is the cause of expulsion and alienation. On account of this, one of the witnesses of truth who knew its importance said, "Seat yourself upon the prayer-mat (bisât) and beware of presumption (inbisât)."

Allah's Majesty acting upon us prevents us from unacceptable behaviour in the Divine Presence, as likewise does our awe at His Beauty and expansiveness toward us.

Therefore, what has been spiritually disclosed to our colleagues is sound. It is their judgment – that Majesty in itself closes and diminishes them and that Beauty in itself opens and expands them – that is in error. So long as the divine disclosure is sound, the rest is inconsequential, but Majesty and Beauty, in their essences, are as we have described them.

Know that the Qur'an encompasses Beauty and the Majesty of Beauty. As for Absolute Majesty, no created being possesses any means of entering into it or bearing witness to it. The Truth has singled it out for Himself. It is the presence in which the Truth sees Himself as He is. Were we to have a means of entering into this, we would possess a comprehensive knowledge of Allah and all that is with Him, and that is impossible.

And know, brother, that since Allah Most High possesses two realities and has described Himself with two Hands¹ and knows us as two "handfuls," the whole of existence has carried out this rule:

There is nothing in existence that does not contain its compensatory opposite.

Out of all this counterposition, we are here especially concerned with what pertains to the Divine Majesty and the Divine Beauty (and I mean by Majesty here the Majesty of Beauty, as mentioned above).

No divine saying related through transmitters from Allah Most High contains anything indicative of Majesty without its being accompanied by something of Beauty to counter it. It is the same way in all revealed scriptures, and in everything.

For example, whenever there is a verse in the Qur'an that speaks of mercy, it has a sister that speaks of retribution to balance it. Thus His calling Himself "Forgiver of sins, Acceptor of repentance" is countered by His calling Himself "Terrible in retribution" (Mu'min 3). His saying "Inform My servants that I am All-Forgiving, Most Merciful..." is countered by "...and that My punishment is the painful punishment." (Hijr 49-50) His saying, "The Companions of the Right, how happy are the Companions of the Right! amid thornless lote-trees..." as the verses run (Wâqi'ah 27-28), is countered by "The Companions of the Left, how wretched are the Companions of the Left! In hot wind and boiling water..." and so forth (Wâqi'ah 41-42). "Faces that day will be radiant" (Qiyâmah 22) is balanced by "Faces that day will be gloomy" (Qiyâmah 24), "On the day when (some) faces will turn white" is balanced by "...and (some) faces will turn black" (Al 'Imrân 106). "(Some) faces that day will be downcast, labouring, toiling" (Ghashiyah 2-3) is balanced by "(Some) faces that day will be happy and well-pleased because of their striving" (Ghashiyah 8-9). "(Many) faces that day will bright, laughing, joyous" ('Abasa 38-39) is balanced by "(Many) faces that day will have dust upon them, darkness will cover them" ('Abasa 40-41).

If you follow this strand through the Qur'an you will find that all the verses of this type follow this pattern. And it is all for the sake of the two divine watchers [the recording angels of good and bad deeds²] mentioned in His sayings (Banî Isrâ'îl 20):

All do We aid, those [who seek this world] as well as these [who seek the eternal]....

and (Shams 8):

He reveals to it its way of evil and its way of good and his saying about the truthful giver (Layl 7):

We facilitate for him the way to ease

² These watchers are mentioned explicitly in Qâf 17-18: "When the two receivers receive, sitting on the right and the left. He utters not a word but there is by him a watcher at hand."

which He balances with His saying about the lying miser (Layl 10):

We facilitate for him the way to distress
So know.

The verses on the Divine Majesty and Beauty are also arranged like this in the Book of Allah. I would like to mention a few of them and discuss them by means of ishârât, hints or indications of what the attentive understanding might grasp in pursuit of these meanings, hallowed as they are above human unclarity and animal lusts. May Allah aid us by protecting us from sin and error in word and action. By His Might. Amin.

We will use the word "hints" instead of "section" or "chapter" and begin with a verse of Majesty, following it with its corresponding verse of Beauty, and then proceed to another verse of Majesty and so on, God willing. It may be that one verse will have two aspects – an aspect of Majesty and an aspect of Beauty. If so, God willing we will cite both its sources, in Majesty and in Beauty, because it contains the whole counterposition.

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High said (Shûrâ 11),

laysa ka-mithlilihi shay'un
Nothing is like unto Him...

This verse contains its compensatory opposite. It is also countered as a whole by His saying (Shûrâ 11):

wa huwa as-samî' ul-basîr and He is the Hearing, the Seeing.

and by the Tradition of the Prophet (peace be upon him):

Allah created Adam according to His form.³

So know, you who are drowned in the sea of contemplation, that in the reading from Majesty, the likeness referred to in laysa ka-mithlilihi shay'un is literal likeness. In the reading from Beauty, it is figurative likeness.

[According to Majesty], this verse denies any equivalence [between Creator and created] based on a sharing of essential properties. There are grand oceans here. For instance, [if two things are equivalent,] the equivalence is not dictated by the perfection of both of them, or their [corresponding] virtues, or anything else: it is only as far as essential properties are concerned that they can be each other's equivalents. As far as other attributes are concerned, they may either resemble or contradict each other, [indifferently].

Thus, two men share in one essential property: though one of them is weak, incapable, ignorant, deaf, dumb and blind, while the other is strong, capable, knowledgeable, and able to hear, speak, and see, they are united by a single definition: for example, that they are mortal rational animals. (Since that is so, it is indicative, so understand.)

Thus also, there may be a sharing and equivalence of [primary] attributes that does not result in "likeness." The reality of a thing indeed derives from its essential properties, but they are multiple. Another thing may share in some of them without the first thing being "like unto" the other thing in all respects. For instance, the definition "animal" is applied to human beings and brute beasts, but a person is not "the like of," a horse, because one of the conditions of likeness is the sharing of all essential properties, and that cannot occur except in two individuals of the same sort.

The kind of likeness here described is called literal or "intelligible" ('aqliyyah). Let us define it as perfect and total equivalence. There is also partial equivalence, which arises when there is sharing of some essential properties. Here likeness exists to the extent of sharing; after that point disjunction occurs.

The realities refuse to accept an equivalence based on secondary, incidental attributes: they do not belong to the reality of the essence to which they are attributed, but are like accidents, even if they are fixed and their nonexistence is inconceivable. In such a case the equivalence could only be drawn between two attributes, not between the two entities in which the two comparable attributes subsist. For instance, one could propose that two "knowers" are equivalent, conceptually or actually, but if they are [genuinely] equivalent it will be for some other reason [than "knowing"].

Secondary attributes take identity from the individuality of that in which they subsist. Their identity is dependent, just as [in philosophy] the place proper to a contingent event depends upon the space occupied by its substrate and is to the extent of its substrate, because the contingent event is sited [in the substrate].

All this indicates that there is no sharing of essential attributes between us and the Creator, whether total or partial. On account of this, from the perspective of the realities, "likeness" between us and Him is denied. Do not deceive yourself that He describes you as He describes Himself – as knowing, willing, and so forth. The brute beasts are described as hearing, seeing, and willing as well. So understand that.

Beauty. The selfsame verse, His saying:

laysa ka-mithlilihi shay'un

is [according to Beauty,] a figurative, "verbal" (lughawiyyah) likening, as when people say "Zayd is like a lion." Here the ka has the sense of a preposition [meaning "as," instead of being read as part of the compound word ka-mithlilihi. The verse then reads:

Nothing is like His likeness.

With this the Truth descends in the station of openness and the attribute of Beauty upon the hearts of the Knowers. In this reading Allah denies that He has made them resemble anything else in His whole creation – just as, in His Majesty, He denies that the creation resembles Him.

In this reading He gives word of the superiority of the human being over all creatures and all else in existence. So the reality of the human being is not bound to one estate. Allah has assured him of the attributes of completeness and perfection, made him overflow with His grace, and given into his possession the keys of the Divine Names. From this figurative likening [of the human and the divine] humanity derives its stewardship of the Creation. By it the two worlds are supported. By it the spirits are subdued; of it Allah spoke (Jâthiyah 13):

And He has made subservient to you whatsoever is in the heavens and whatsoever is in the earth, altogether, from Himself.

This reading points to a divine expansiveness. At the moment in which this expansiveness manifests in the heart of the witness of truth, his state takes on the sense of the preceding reading from Majesty, just as when the Majesty of the verse manifests in his heart, his state immediately takes on the sense of the verse's Beauty. This is the way things are in every manifestation, as we have shown.

The reading from Majesty conforms to obligation and denies similitudes and equivalents [to Allah]; the reading from Beauty conforms to ecstasy and denies [only] equivalents. So Majesty affirms the holiness of the Truth, while Beauty affirms the exalted rank of the servant.

Again, when He says, concerning the realities of His Majesty,

a counterbalance is to be found in the realities of His Divinity. For after this statement its opposite arises: the descent of the Truth to the station of likening with:

[He is] the Hearing, the Seeing.

So understand this hint. The servant, with his own personal attributes, continues to exist only because Allah Himself continues to exist. Even when the servant is invested with attributes of perfection as fixed by divine lordship's appearance in human servanthood, and is preserved by Allah's active continuance of him, this remains the case.

Therefore the one who (through Allah's continuing in Himself) is a witness of truth, is bedazzled: he is engaged in unbroken contemplation, for he is present with the fundamental counterbalance (taqâbul). And the one who (through Allah's continuation of his personal being) is not a witness of truth, is also bedazzled: he is veiled by amazement, for he is with Allah, acting upon the universe, by way of His "likening" (tamâthul). This is the state of the people of Paradise, who, in Paradise, [with the divine prerogative] will say to a thing they wish "Be," and it will become.⁴

So the witness of truth sees that the coming into existence of the wished-for thing proceeds from the essence of the word uttered and not from the uttering itself. The one who is not a witness of truth sees the thing come to be from the uttering itself, because it happens through him. Both join in denying that the power comes from themselves – so understand.

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High said (An'am 103):

lâ tudrikuhu al-absâr
Vision comprehends Him not.

This contains its own contrary.

⁴ 'Abdul-Karim al-Jili cited this report thus: ... it was reported that God sends to the people of the Garden a message with the following contents (and God knows best): "A letter from the Life Everlasting to the Life Everlasting. I say to a thing 'Be,' and it is, and I have made you to say to a thing 'Be,' and it is" – and they do not say to a thing "Be" except that it is. (Ibn 'Arabi, Journey to the Lord of Power, p.80). In the Qur'an (Hâ Mîm Sajdah 31): "...[In Paradise] you shall have whatever you ask for."

The Prophet (peace be upon him) was asked, "Did you see your Lord?" and replied, "He is a light. How should I see Him? The Veil of Power was still lowered; it is never raised. He is too great for the eyes to pronounce upon Him."⁵ Thus in their contemplation of Him the eyes are in the station of bewilderment and inability, and their vision is not their own. As the Truthful One [Hadrat Abu Bakr] has said, "The inability to attain perception is itself perception."⁶

Hint. The eyes do not perceive the air, because they are immersed in it. Whoever has something in his fist does not perceive that thing.

Hint. The eye wishes to perceive the colour of water, but the contents of the glass are overwhelmingly clear. The eye does not perceive this colour – for if it did, it would limit it – because water resembles vision in clarity. Perception does not perceive itself, for it is within itself while it perceives the water. This is vision envisioned.⁷

Hint. When the eye looks at an object with a polished surface and sees a form in it, its perception of the form is identical with its perception of the polished body. If it strove to discriminate what corresponds to the form in the mirror from the mirror, it would be unable to do so. The mirror cannot be grasped. If you inquire of the eye what it saw, it cannot reply "I saw the mirror," because the mirror is ungraspable and nothing can pronounce upon it. (If someone says this anyway, he is ignorant and has no real understanding in his observation. But if he says, "I saw..." and then gives a report of the form or forms that he saw, he has told the truth.)

These things are exempt from the eye's comprehension despite the fact that they are created so understand – but the eye may perceive them without grasping them. Their assimilation to the forms (reflected within them) is of the essence: the mirror may never be disjoined from the reflected form in the vision of any seer. Such is your own vision, so confirm for yourself what we have said.

Know that Allah Most High is not to be encompassed by any eye or any intellect. Yet stupid speculation measures and defines Him, and weak imagination assigns him form and likeness. Sometimes intelligent people, after having found Him to be free of whatever they imagined and speculated about Him, have afterwards fallen back under the power of imagination and have pronounced upon Him indirectly. It is as Allah has said (A'raf 200):

When a visitation from the Devil afflicts them, they remember, then lo! they see.

That is, they return to the sound proof intellect has given them that Allah is beyond all this.

Beauty. The Beauty corresponding to this Majesty is in His saying (Qiyâmah 22-23):

wujûhun yawmâ'idhin nâdiratun ilâ rabbiha nazirah
Faces that day will be radiant, looking upon their Lord.

Allah – glory to Him here opens Himself to us in His Beauty so that we might perceive Him with our eyes, looking upon Him. To this also points the tradition of the Prophet (peace be upon him):

You will see your Lord, on the Resurrection Day, as you see the moon on the night when it is full, or as you see the sun at noon in a cloudless sky, and you will not be harmed by your vision of Him.⁸

And also what Allah Most High has said about the denizens of Hell (Tatfif 15):

That day they will be veiled from their Lord.

Now in the Arabic language the verb nazara, to look, when accompanied by the preposition ilâ can only mean to look upon, with the eyes. It is when followed by fi that it means to look into, mentally and intellectually, and when followed by lî that it means to look after, with compassion; other prepositions lead it to signify encounter, struggle, or delay. Also, the eyes are one of the attributes of the face, while the intellect is not. Consequently the looking mentioned in this verse must be the vision of the eyes.

Allah's saying (A'raf 143):

You cannot see Me.

to Moses (peace be upon him) was a decision relevant to a state that may be known from Moses's request [to see his Lord]. We shall not attempt to discuss that here. Yet Allah did make [His vision] lawful to the mountain, which shattered to atoms, while Moses fell into a swoon.⁹

Now, perception does not faint. A particular constitution is not one of its requirements (nor was it a requirement here) – its only requirement is something to subsist in, because it is an intangible. Fainting, though, exists by virtue of a heavy and dense constitution.

When Moses recovered, he glorified Allah. There would be no point to his giving praise when he arose from this state unless he had been granted some sort of contemplation. Next, realization led him to repentance for the conditions imposed by his constitution. Then he avowed that he was (A'raf 143):

the first of those who believe in what he had seen in that swoon, for faith does not take shape without vision, in whatever realm it may be.¹⁰

⁸ Bukharî, Bad' al-khalq 7, Anbiya' 1; Muslim, Imân 380-383, Jannah 14-17; Tirmidhi Qiyâmah 60, Jannah 7; Ibn Mâjah, Zuhd 39; Darîmî, Riqâq 12; Ibn Hanbal, II:230, 232, 254, 257, 316, 359, 473, 502, 504, 507; III:16; VI:355.

⁹ The whole episode is told in A'raf 143: And when Moses came at Our appointed time and His Lord spoke to him, he said: "My Lord, make me see, that I may look upon You." He said: "You cannot see Me, but look at the mountain: if it stays firmly in its place, then you will see Me." So when His Lord manifested Himself to the mountain, it crumbled, and Moses fell down in a swoon. Then when he awakened he said, "Glory to You, I have returned to You, and I am the first of those who believe."

"[How is it that] you requested the vision of God, while the Messenger of God said that 'not one of you will see his Lord until he dies?'"

So he said: "And it was just like that: when I asked Him for the vision, He answered me, so that I fell down stunned. Then I saw Him in my (state of) being stunned."

Concerning this, the Prophet (peace be upon him) asked Harithah, "What is the reality of your faith?"

He replied, "It is as if I am looking upon the Throne of my Lord distinctly..." as the tradition goes.¹¹ He confirmed seeing, in whatever realm, and for that reason the reality of his faith was sound. The Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) allowed that in this case Harithah possessed true realization and something more: validated faith. For there is no point to faith in the unseen except its connection to vision. Of this there is no doubt.

[As the "first of those who believe"], Moses was, in some sense, the first to see Allah with his eyes. This degree may refer to either a state of experience or to a station of being. If he spoke from his station, Moses was indeed the first person to perceive Allah [continuously]. If he spoke from his state, it may be that others had seen Him, but the rank of "firstness" is reserved for the state of Moses by the perfection of the episode [rather than by historical precedence]. This usage is often found.

If, in contemplation, the Truth opens you to this verse, be content that:

Vision comprehends Him not.

If not, you are ruined, as I have told you. So beware of presumption: indeed, let awe be with you constantly, and it will protect you. So know – and Allah, glory to Him, is the Guide.

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High said (Jinn 28):

wa ahsâ kulla shay'in 'adadan
And He counts the number of everything.

This is a hint of the comprehensive divine knowledge of all of the names of existing things, whether they existed in the past, exist at present, or will come to exist in the future. This verse applies particularly to actual being that is, was, or will be. It is a connection more specific than that given in His saying (Talaq 12):

ahâta bi-kulli shay'in 'ilman
He encompasses all things in knowledge.

I said: "While (you were) dead?"

He said: "While (I was) dead."

He said, "...So I did not see God until I had died. It was then that I awakened, so that I knew Whom I saw. And it was because of that that I said, I have returned to You, since I did not return to anyone but Him." ... He said, "I was seeing Him (all along), and yet I didn't used to know that it was Him! But when my 'dwelling' was changed and I saw Him, then I knew Whom I saw. Therefore when I 'awoke' I was no longer veiled, and my vision went on accompanying me throughout all eternity." (pp. 64-66)

¹¹ The text of this hadith is as follows: It is related from al-Hârith ibn Malik al-Ansâri that he passed by the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him), who asked him, "How are you, Hârithah?" "I am truly a believer," he replied. "I see what you say," the Prophet told him, "but for every saying there is a reality. What is the reality of your faith?"

Hârithah said, "I have withdrawn myself from this world. My nights are vigils and my days are fasts, and it is as if I am looking upon the Throne of my Lord distinctly. It is as if I am looking upon the people of Paradise visiting each other in Paradise. It is as if I am looking upon the people of Hell spitting each other in Hell." the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) said, "O Hârithah, you have realized, now persevere!"

– which means all necessary, all possible, and all impossible things.

(While some theologians will not apply the term "thing" to anything but an actual entity, this need not concern us. Allah certainly encompasses all things in knowledge and He certainly knows the impossible, and if those who prefer such terminology restrict the "encompassing knowledge" of this verse to actually existing entities, they have no proof for it except their own usage.)

Here "all-encompassing knowledge" has a general meaning, while "counting the number" demands finiteness in the thing that is counted. "All-encompassing knowledge" is then particularly an expression for the connection between knowledge and its infinite objects.

While it may be that the significance of "to count" in this verse is largely identical with that of "to encompass," the meanings are not the same in the case of future events. These are infinite [and yet are "counted"] as we have said. For while the things Allah wills are infinite, He knows more than He wills, and what He knows is not the same as what He wills. [The larger infinity of knowledge] is not "counted" because it cannot be; the count would have to include counting itself. And the impossible is not quantified at all, so that "counting" might be applied to it. Only knowledge can comprehend it: that is, that it is a property of Allah's knowledge of things in all aspects.

Since the Truth "counts the number of everything," you are among the things that are counted, and His protection and observation of you follow. When a contemplation ascends from this verse to Him, it wanders lost in the majesty of the Truth, amazed with inspirations, glimpses, flashes, fragrances, and significances of the divine, and all that proceeds in it and from it.

So when this contemplation has become real for you, the Truth opens the verse I shall mention next, which concerns the Beauty of this Majesty. And then together with what intimacy you desire there, He manifests Himself in the Majesty of this verse, which amazes and overwhelms the contemplator. So understand.

Beauty. Allah Most High said (Saffât 147):

wa arsalnâhu ilâ mi'ati alfin aw yazîdûn
We have sent it to a hundred thousand or more.

This verse came with the word "or", which pertains to uncertainty, and that is impossible for Allah Most High.

When the Truth descended in His Beauty in this verse, it was in expansiveness toward us. Uncertainty is our characteristic, so [the use of "or"] establishes a type of relationship to the servant. If the servant is ignorant, he will assimilate his Lord to himself and qualify Him with uncertainty, and so fall into error. If he is a confirmer of truth, he will flee to the divine saying: and hold to that secret, and connect this uncertainty to the habitual human way of seeing things, according to the customary mode of expression among the Arabs for the general idea of "many." Uncertainty pertains to the creature, despite his wanting to count exact numbers and, from another perspective, his wanting to declare himself as free of limitation as he has declared his Maker.

So let the reader take this verse as intending the general idea of "many" and not as specifying a number. Although numbers are not absent from the verse, still the Speaker's intention here is not to signify some particular number; the intention is to signify multitude. This sort of phraseology was in use among those to whom Allah sent His Message, and when they employed it they certainly did not intend that one should insist on some precise number.

And when the servant has borne witness to the intention of multitude here, he will discover the precise enumeration of all that he has known from the moment he came into existence until his present moment, and of what will come to be, without end!

(Actually, some theological scholars disagree with us about whether knowledge can attach to two or more [simultaneous] objects. Some of them hold that this is impossible. Those who allow it include Imam Abû 'Amr al-Silâfi [may Allah be pleased with him], who did not disagree with us on this question. As for the statement of al-Isfara'ini [Abû Ishâq] that the heart can bear no more than one knowledge at a time, it may be that he was hinting at our position. Within the framework of that statement are knowledge, the principles of action that take shape from knowledge, and its mastery, as well as an intimation of [what we have said].

As far as we are concerned, our discourse is only with the masters of realities and secrets among the people of Allah Most High. We have sought to make a connection to some of the sayings of formal scholars in order to set at ease hearts that are straying from this Way with regard to these realities. So know that. Allah speaks the truth and He it is that shows the way.)

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High said (Baqarah 163; also Kahf 110, Anbiya 108, Hajj 34, Hâ Mîm Sajdah 5):

ilâhukum ilâhun wâhidun
Your god is One God.

This also contains its own counterbalancing opposite. It is a statement applying to everything deified and worshipped.

Hint. This is a secret of Allah's Divinity. If it were not for what every worshipper finds in the object of his worship – that is, in his act of worshipping that object – he would not worship it. If [idol-worshippers] were to draw strength from the unequivocalness of this statement, they would say that when Allah the Misleader misleads, He leads astray the relations between Divinity and the one who has no god, while [the idol-worshipper] is merely the servant of a particular object of worship, the secret of whose divinity itself belongs to Allah Most High. That is the soul of His saying (Baqarah 163):

Your god is One God: there is no god but He.

So the statement affirms the essential form of a thing rejected in actual practice. People only adopt these [idols] because of the relationship with the divine that they establish by carving them, raising them up, installing them, and submitting their needs to them. So understand that: it is a remarkable secret.

Hint. The partner, which has no being, is denied: therefore nothing is denied. The partner is a postulate, not an existent; postulates are ascriptions, and ascriptions have no reality. The denial of partners to Allah is the affirmation of Divine Singularity (al-wahdâniyyah). Affirming Singularity finally comes down to existence, while denying partners finally comes down to nonexistence. So understand.

Hint. Allah's Singularity manifests in the Divine enthronement upon the human throne. This is in contrast to the Beneficent enthronement: The Divine enthronement is at the centre of the circle, according to His saying:

My earth and My heavens do not contain me, but the heart of My believing servant contains Me.¹²

while the Beneficent enthronement encompasses the circle, according to His saying (Tâ Hâ 5):

The Beneficent is established upon the Throne.

The Throne of the Universe in the Beneficent enthronement has the dignity of the Truth for the human enthronement, while the human heart in the Divine enthronement has the dignity of the Truth for the Beneficent enthronement.

When the Singularity manifests, the contemplator beholds nothing except himself. Whether he has developed to the stage of his own singularity or is at some other stage, it is the same. If he is at the stage of his own singularity, he is in the position of multiplying unity by unity, which can only produce unity. Thus in arithmetic (by way of metaphor and approximation), if you multiply one by one, the result will be one. And if the contemplator is in a stage other than that of singularity, he is in the position of someone who multiplies one by two: he produces nothing but two. This is the case with all numbers similarly treated: If you multiply one by fifteen, the result is fifteen; if you multiply one by 155, your result will be that by which you multiplied the unity, namely 155. So know that.

Beauty. As for the Beauty corresponding to this Majesty, the Most High said (Banî Isrâ'îl 110):

qul id'û Llâha aw id'ûr-Rahmâna ayyamâ tad'u fa-lahul-asmâ' ul-husnâ.

Say: Call upon Allah or call upon the Beneficent:
whichever you call upon, His are the Most Beautiful Names.

The Truth here descends in His Beauty, in expansiveness toward us, with His Beneficence. It is in this name, the Beneficent, that He is established upon the Throne of the Universe. This is the general divine knowledge to which the Knowers of Allah ultimately attain and in which the witnesses of truth are opened and expanded, while the corresponding Majesty closes and contracts them – that is:

Your god is One God.

Where the name "Allah" gathers together all things whatsoever, the name "The Beneficent" gathers together all the realities of the universe and what it contains. From this derives the expression rahmân ad-dunyâ wal-âkhirah, "Most Beneficent of this world and the Next," and because of this people are told:

Say: Call upon Allah or call upon the Beneficent:
whichever you call upon, His are the Most Beautiful Names.

People's supplication is only that which connects them to what benefits them, according to the extent of their knowledge of God. If a prayer is in the name of the Beneficent, that name includes all of the Beautiful Names except "Allah." His are the Most Beautiful Names, The Beneficent, and all that the name "Allah" contains. When you call upon Allah, you are only calling out of Him the Beneficent in particular, while you are calling out of the Beneficent that Name from which you seek the real object of your prayer. Thus the drowning man calls, "O Saviour!" the hungry man, "O Provider!" the sinner, "O All-Forgiving! O Most-Forgiving!" So it is for all of the Names. So understand what we have pointed out to you: It is a great and profitable door.

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High said (Anbiyâ' 23):

lâ yus'alu 'an ma yaf'alu

He cannot be questioned about what He does...

This verse is connected to irresistible force, the plane of Allah's transcendent power, and the establishment of divine sovereignty over the world. When these attributes become fixed in the servant's heart, it is impossible for him to seek the reason for an occurrence or to raise any objection to it.

Hint. Someone who knows what is within himself does not question himself unless a questioner is appointed for him who undertakes to ask, and so the question arises. Since that is the case,

He cannot be questioned about what He does because [the questioner, the questioned, and the point of the question are] none other than Allah, His attributes, and His actions. This significance is answered in the reminder of the verse, where He says (Anbiya' 23):

wa hum yus 'alûn

...but they will be questioned.

The reality here is single and of a piece. Allah is the one who questions them about His action upon them and what has manifested through them, and they cannot answer except by His action in them. So understand: I have intended to be brief for the sake of people who understand hints.

Beauty. The Beauty corresponding to this verse is His saying (Nisâ' 77):

limâ katabta alaynal-qitâl

Why did you ordain fighting for us?

He here descends in His Beauty in expansiveness towards us, so we are enabled to voice a question. The Beauty of this verse is our boldness in our absence of knowledge of the Majesty at that moment.

When such a question arises, the servant must join it with His saying:

He cannot be questioned about what He does.

Hint. For this construction to follow upon the other presents difficulties only for someone who must labour and struggle to fulfil [the questioned order]. By contrast, both [a thing's] creation and its nonexistence are the same to someone who accepts a divine order spontaneously. If a person has done this, he cannot be called other than wise.

Hint. Part of wisdom is to put things in their proper places, and one of its aspects is to restore forms to what the realm they occupy requires. The realm of this world is not like the realm of the Next. It is not necessary that the way things take shape in this world should be the way they take shape in the next. Indeed, the Prophet of Allah (peace be upon him) has spoken of the joy, graciousness, beauty and harmony of the blessed, and of the opposite situation of the damned, while this world is a turbid and mutable confusion, and its mode of life sick, meagre, and gloomy. Of necessity, one must leave it, and so of necessity the level of things must change. Since [the people who asked the question here discussed] realized this, they said what is in the remainder of the verse (Nisâ' 77):

Why did You not put it off for us for a little while?

because a change in the level of things was inevitable [and the order to fight would adopt some other aspect in the Next World].

Hint.

Why did you ordain fighting for us?

To fight means to search for knowledge of Allah by means of reflection and the rejection of obscuring imaginations, and to search for contemplative vision through struggle and suffering. All of this was part of the expansiveness of the Truth towards these people. They were sentenced to presumption, and so they behaved badly, and not as witnesses of truth.

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High said (Nisâ' 48, 116):

inna Llâhu la yaghfiru 'an yushraka bihi
Allah does not forgive that partners be ascribed to Him.

The circle of lâ ilâha illâ Llâh – "there is no god but Allah" – encompasses all who testify to the Unity, and none of them shall remain eternally in Hellfire. The real authority of this testimony, however, manifests only in those people who possess no other virtue. Nothing but the Most Merciful of the Merciful in particular will intercede for them. The intercession of that which is other than Allah is only for people who possess an atom's weight of good (zuzal 7) other than the Testimony of Unity.¹³

The inhabitants of Paradise will recognize them: "These are they who have been set free by the Compassionate One, Who has admitted them into Paradise without any deed that they did or any good that they

Our object, God willing, is to be recorded solely and especially as belonging to lâ ilâha illâ Llâh and its people. But the majesty of lâ ilâha illâ Llâh is difficult to approach, for it requires that a person rely upon nothing other than this principle, and that is difficult. This greatest of majesties, [the majesty of Unity], opens people to the play of the mystery of divinity as it acts universally in all entities – from the lowest to the highest – that may be served or worshipped. But if people stop at this, they expand into presumption in the matter of intermediate causes, [holding them to be divine]. They then discover what they have created for Him and what He has created for them. So understand that.

Beauty.

inna Llâha yaghfir udh-dhunûba jamî'an
Allah forgives the sins altogether. (Zumar 53)

but the ascription of partners to Him is one of the sins, and it is not forgiven. The Truth descends in His Beauty in openness toward us and causes us to see the play of the mystery of divinity in all objects of worship. Consequently, people presume to the extent of attributing partners to Him. Then the Majesty of His saying:

Allah does not forgive that partners be ascribed to Him

chastens them and draws them back.

When they conceal this within themselves so that they show forth the opposite response, Allah conceals the opposition to Him that may arise from them, as a reward for their concealing this in their hearts.

In concealing [their sins] He divides them into two groups. One group He hides from others. Another group He hides from themselves, since He hides them from the origin of the suffering. If you observe, when they enter Hellfire because Allah makes them die in it, that testimony of Unity which they concealed in their hearts itself protectively hides the heart, the site of suffering – or if you will, the origin of suffering.

This is a prodigious hint whose Beauty expands hearts, and whose gentleness and graciousness bequeath boldness.

Hint. When they do not conceal Him, He does not conceal them in any realm, but exposes them for all to see.

Hint. The name "Allah," in the verse we are examining, takes on the sense of al-Ghaffâr, the Coverer, the Forgiver, but only because it has come together with the Name al-Jâmi', the Gatherer, present in His saying ["Allah forgives the sins.."] "altogether," jamî'an. The Name al-Ghaffâr does not possess in itself the station of synthesis, jam', and so "Allah" was used.

sent in advance."

Then He will say: "Enter My Paradise; whatever you see is yours."

They will say: "O Lord, You have bestowed upon us what You did not bestow upon anyone else in the world...."

In Iman 377 the Prophet (peace and blessings be upon him) speaks of his own repeated intercession for the faithful, down to those with the tiniest particle of good works. Finally, he says:

"O my Lord, permit me regarding him who professed 'There is no god but Allah.'"

The Lord will say, "That does not lie with you, but by My Honour, Glory, Greatness and Might, I will certainly take out the one who professed 'There is no god but Allah.'"

The Shaykh includes with these people – saved not for their works, but for the Testimony of Unity alone – those who have surrendered to Unity any self to which works could be attributed.

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High has said (Zumar 67; also An'âm 91, Hajj 74):

wa mâ qadarû Llâha haqqa qadrahu
They do not value Allah at His true value.

Despite all the possible objects of knowledge, divine realization is solely concerned with two things. One of these matters is the truth (haqq); the other is reality (haqîqah). Truth is known with the intellectual powers as a guide, and reality with the powers of direct perception and contemplative vision. There is certainly no third capacity after these two.

Thus when Harithah said, "I am truly (haqqan) a believer," his statement arose from the first capacity. His state was supported by the second capacity, but he remained silent about it. So the Prophet (peace be upon him) asked him, "What is the reality (haqîqah) of your faith?" because he saw that Harithah possessed that second capacity. When Harithah responded with high perspective, intimate awareness, and direct perception, the Prophet (peace be upon him) told him, "You have realized; now persevere!" To apply the term "realization," ma'rifah, to a thing is not entirely appropriate unless it embraces these two realities: haqq and haqîqah.

Now Allah Most High has informed us that we are incapable of attaining the truth of His value (haqqa qadrihi). How then should we reach the reality of His value? "Value" here is nothing other than realization of the glorification proper to the station of divinity. If we are incapable of that, how much more incapable must we be of the realization of His Essence, magnified and exalted as it is to the greatest and highest?

When the witnesses of truth behold this Majesty and are convinced that they cannot value Him at His value despite all the glorification within them, and have blamed themselves for insufficiency, they realize that it is not within the range of temporal creatures to take the measure of the eternal. For that would be dependent upon some sort of real relationship, and there is no relationship in the deserts of bewilderment of this Majesty.

Beauty. The Beauty corresponding to this Majesty is His saying (Dhâriyât 56):

wa mâ kha1aqtul-jinni wal-insi illâ li-ya'buduni
I have not created jinn and men except to worship Me.

With this the souls of the witnesses of truth are drawn to intimacy, and they aver that Allah would not have assigned them to anything that they were not well able to perform, by His leave. So when they have confirmed that through the expansiveness of this station, the Majesty of: contracts them and draws them back.

Hint. If you wish to know the limits of the realization sought from you in this verse, then look at what He has created for you and placed under your authority, and find within yourself in what way you want what has been created for your sake to know you. That is exactly the way in which the Truth wants you to know Him, without any addition or subtraction. And if you are not able to do this through your lack of grace, take it from what Allah Most High has revealed in the Torah:

O son of Adam, I have created all things for your sake, and you for My sake. So do not subjugate that which I have created for Me to that which I have created for you!

Hint. When someone who has been created for your sake causes you difficulties, do not blame him. The blame is yours, because it only seeks out the doer of the action which does not please you, and that is none other than Allah, who cannot fitly be blamed: You have observed ignorance and bad behaviour in yourself.

Allah's welcoming openness has ramifications. One of them is that our awe should be brought to bear in the presence of Beauty. For if we do not have this at the time of His expansiveness, then:

They do not value Allah...

at the corresponding Majesty – and if not, we are destroyed.

Advice. When something created for your sake causes you difficulties, look at what you would have wanted from it. Then turn to yourself and examine the relationship between this wish of yours and what your Lord has asked of you. You will find that He has sought that same thing from you, while you have caused difficulty and refused: Thus this related matter has caused you trouble. For when Allah Most High burdens you with any desire concerning that which has been created for you – it is all the same whether it be the likes of you or not – then certainly He has sought that from you, while you have been unaware. If you have obeyed Him in regard to that thing, then it will obey you, and if otherwise, then otherwise. Know that Allah has created humankind for the sake of the true human being. Allah Most High said (Zukhruf 32):

And We have exalted some of them over others by degrees, so that some of them may take others in subjection.

So understand this hint and you will be guided, God willing.

HINTS OF MAJESTY

Allah Most High said (Taghâbun 16):

fattaqû Llâha ma istata'tum
So fear Allah as much as you can.

There is no verse in the Book of Allah Most High, or any word in existence, that does not possess three perspectives: Majesty, Beauty, and Perfection. Its Perfection is the knowledge of its essence, of the cause of its existence, and of the object of its station. Its Majesty and Beauty are the knowledge of how it confronts those who confront it with awe, intimacy, contraction, expansion, fear, and hope. Each class has its own proper experience. (In this treatise we have turned to mentioning Majesty in one verse and Beauty in a different one only in order to acquaint the Sufi student with the forms of correlation between dissimilars.) No word possesses a fourth station. In theology, the secret of this appears in the knowledge of the Truth Himself and of His two Hands and "handfuls." So know that.

The witnesses of truth are frightened by the Majesty of this verse. When Allah demands that of which they ought to be capable, He casts them into the sea of distance from Him and appears in His Grandeur. For it is not within the scope of any obligated being to live up to his capacity to fear Allah. Thus the majesty of this inaccessible plain destroys them. But when they are nearly destroyed by the intensity of this Majesty, the Truth opens and expands them and brings them close to Him, and shows them:

Fear Allah with His due fear.

Beauty. Allah Most High said (Al 'Imrân 102):

Attaqû Llâha haqqa tuqâtahu
Fear Allah with His due fear...

and He descends upon them in His Beauty, in welcoming openness, when He orders them to fulfil the true requirements of religion (haqq), so that they draw close and become serene, and fear for themselves the dangers of elation.¹⁴ So they apply their lower and higher selves to:

So fear Allah as much as you can.

and that verse enables them to preserve the behaviour proper to the Presence.

Hint. Fear Allah through Allah: This is the Prophet's saying (peace be upon him), "I take refuge with You from You."¹⁵ Allah Most High said (Dukhan 59):

Taste; you, [the sinner in hellfire] indeed, are the mighty, the generous!¹⁶

and He said (Mu'min 37):

Allah seals every proud, commanding heart.

Hint. "Fear Allah" – His being displeased – "through Allah" – His being pleased.

A general universal hint. Fear Allah the Punisher (al-Mu'âqib) by means of Allah the Forgiver (al-Mu'âfi).

Whoever is acquainted with the realities of the Divine Names has been given the keys of the sciences, and this amount suffices. The object of my recalling these verses in detail has been to teach the means of entry into this art and the understanding of its approach, for it is a powerful method. May Allah protect us and you from pretence.

Advice. Know, brother, that in the Mighty Qur'an the Truth addresses us in two ways. In some verses He speaks to us to acquaint us with the states of other people and what happened to them, with where we have come from, and with where we are going. That is the first way. Other verses He addresses to us so that we may address them to Him. These are again of two types. Some verses call for us to address Him with actions, as for instance (Hajj 78; also Baqarah 43, 83, 110; Nisâ' 77, Nur 56, Muzammil 20):

Establish prayer and pay the poor-rate...

¹⁴ The remainder of Al 'Imrân 102 runs: "...and do not die unless you are Muslims."

¹⁵ The hadith runs: "O Lord, I take refuge in Your good pleasure from Your wrath and in Your pardons from Your punishments. I take refuge in You from You. I cannot count the praises due You. You are as You praise Yourself." It is related by Muslim, Abû Dawûd, Tirmidhî, Nasâ'i, and Ibn Mâjah. [Hakim 1264]

and (Baqarah 196):

Accomplish the Pilgrimage and the Visitation...

and so forth. Others call for us to address Him with words, as for instance Guide us in the straight path... (Fâtiḥah 6)

Our Lord, we believe, so forgive us...(Al 'Imrân 16)

Our Lord, do not punish us if we forget or make mistakes... (Baqarah 286)

There are many such verses. The Qur'an does not contain any other sort of address than these. It is necessary for you to be mindful of the distinctions in the Word of Allah Most High when you read it. For instance, they recite:

When they meet those who believe then a pause, then:

they say "We believe"

then a pause, then say:

and when they are alone with their devils they say

pause; then say:

"We are with you; we were only mocking"

pause; then say:

Allah shall mock. (Baqarah 14-15)

If you read it in this fashion you will become acquainted with its secrets and distinguish the circumstances of the addresses and the stories of states, sayings, and deeds, and the harmony of things. So know that.

We have made our object clear, so let us draw back upon the reins. May Allah benefit us and you with knowledge and make us His own. And praise be to Allah, the Lord of the Worlds.

Topkapi Palace Collections: From Porcelain to Manuscripts

The collections of Topkapi Palace are among the most extraordinary in the world, reflecting centuries of Ottoman power, diplomacy, and cultural exchange. Beyond the architecture and courtyards, the treasures inside the palace reveal stories of artistry, religion, and daily imperial life. Here's a guide to the collections you should not miss—from fine porcelain to exquisite manuscripts.

The Chinese Porcelain Collection

One of the largest collections of Chinese porcelain outside China, the Topkapi Palace porcelain halls display nearly 10,000 pieces. Ranging from the Song, Ming, and Qing dynasties, these objects arrived as diplomatic gifts or luxury imports. Delicate blue-and-white bowls, celadon dishes, and intricately painted vases highlight the Ottoman taste for refined dining and artistry.

Manuscripts and Calligraphy

The palace's Library of Ahmed III holds thousands of manuscripts, many decorated with gold leaf and intricate miniatures. These works preserve Islamic scholarship in theology, medicine, astronomy, and poetry. The Holy Quran manuscripts housed here are masterpieces of calligraphy, representing centuries of devotion and art. Visiting this section allows you to glimpse the intellectual richness of the Ottoman court.

Weapons and Armor

Far from just military tools, the Ottoman weapons collection is a showcase of craftsmanship. Swords inlaid with gold, jewel-studded daggers, and ceremonial shields highlight the artistry of imperial armorers. Each piece reflects the prestige of the sultans and the ceremonial grandeur of the empire's armies.

Jewelry and Imperial Gifts

The Treasury houses opulent imperial jewels, from emerald-studded thrones to the famous Spoonmaker's Diamond. These dazzling objects not only impress with their beauty but also serve as symbols of diplomatic power, often received as gifts from foreign rulers.

Everyday Objects of the Palace

Among the collections are more intimate objects—silver serving sets, crystal cups, and ornate textiles. These items offer a glimpse into the daily lives of the sultans and their families, blending functionality with refinement. Each detail illustrates how art was present in even the smallest aspects of palace life.

Planning Your Visit

The collections are spread across several courtyards and halls, meaning a ticket to Topkapi Palace gives you access to a variety of treasures. To see the highlights without rushing, allocate at least half a day. For art and history enthusiasts, a full day may be necessary.

Conclusion

The collections of Topkapi Palace are more than just displays of wealth; they are windows into centuries of global exchange, devotion, and artistry. From the shimmering porcelain halls to the quiet manuscripts, each artifact tells a story of an empire at the crossroads of East and West. Don't miss the chance to explore them during your visit.

This article is about the early Quranic manuscript. For other uses, see Quran (disambiguation).

The Topkapı manuscript or Topkapı Quran (Also known as Topkapı Qur'ān Manuscript H.S. 32 or Topkapı H.S. 32)^{[1]:81–83} is an early manuscript of the Quran dated to the middle 2nd century AH (mid 8th century AD).^{[1]:81–83}

This manuscript is kept in the Topkapi Palace Museum, Istanbul, Turkey. It is traditionally attributed to Uthman ibn Affan (d. 656).^{[1]:81–83} However, a recent study by Professor Rami Hussein Halaseh indicates that attributing H.S. 32 to "Uthmān or claiming its production during the first/seventh century is historically inaccurate."^{[1]:83}

Similar illuminations can be found in the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem, the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus and other Umayyad monuments. The size of this manuscript is 41 cm × 46 cm (16 in × 18 in). According to Halaseh, H.S. 32 currently contains about 97.78% of the text of the Qur'ān.^{[1]:31} With only two pages (23 verses) lacking, this manuscript is the closest to the complete text of the Quran. Mehmed Ali Pasha, Governor of Egypt, sent this manuscript to the Ottoman Sultan Mahmud II as a gift in the 19th century (CE).^{[1]:35}^[2]^[3]

The paleographic assessment indicates that the Topkapi manuscript comes closest to those writings that date back to the 8th century. (cf. the examples in Déroche: Abbasid, page 36).^[4] Halaseh also shows that based on the paleography of the manuscript, folios 2r–6v and 11 seems to have been created by another hand and added to the manuscript at a much later stage.^{[1]:43}

According to Tayyar Altıkulaç, the manuscript dates to somewhere in the second half of the first century AH to the first half of the second century AH based on vowelling and dottings.[5]

Also cf. E. İhsanoğlu: "An examination of the Topkapı Muṣḥaf shows that it was written with a developed kufic script. The shape of the letters does not confirm to the writing style of the early Muṣḥafs attributed to Caliph 'Uthmān, which were written on vellum in his period and therefore known as the Muṣḥafs of Caliph 'Uthmān. (...) Apparently this Method of Abū al-Aswad al-Du'alī [invented after the death of Caliph 'Uthmān] was carefully followed in placing the vowel marks of the Topkapı Palace copy. Single dots were placed in red ink above, beside or below the letters." (Altıkulaç, al-Muṣḥāf al-Sharīf (Preface), page 9). [4]

"According to the evaluation of Munadjjid, neither this Muṣḥaf nor the Muṣḥafs located in Tashkent, al-Mashhad al-Ḥusayn in Cairo and in the Museum of Turkish and Islamic Works in Istanbul were the Muṣḥafs attributed to Caliph 'Uthmān; however considering the differences in their script, the centuries when they were copied and their different dimensions, they must have been copied from the Muṣḥafs attributed to Caliph 'Uthmān. For this reason, each of them was called the (Muṣḥaf 'Uthmān)" (Altıkulaç, al-Muṣḥaf al-Sharīf, page 80). [4]

Manuscripts: The Hunt for Topkapi

Getting images of manuscripts from Topkapi, Istanbul, is notoriously difficult. Here I describe how I succeeded in obtaining them. I am not saying my way is the only way. In fact, if you know of better ways, please do get in contact with me. All I am doing here is share my own experience.

The first step of that experience was to realize, after more than a year, that I was not going to do it without going there myself. I tried several connections, and some of them really went the extra mile for me, but in the end it did not work out.

So, I went there. Istanbul is great and if my readers would like to see a more general guide to manuscript hunting in Istanbul, I would be happy to write it. Please leave a response either here or on Facebook. I planned to stay for a week. This turned out to be too short. My suggestion is to be there for two weeks.

What you need to do at home is:

Know exactly which manuscripts you need. I have found out that the catalogue is lacking many details and contains wrong information. I suggest to use scholarly literature; you need to know about a call number from someone who has seen the manuscript itself. In my case the “Philologika” articles from Helmut Ritter were helpful. There is no reading room at Topkapi and you will not be allowed to peruse a bunch of manuscripts. You can only go there and say: “I want pictures of the manuscript with call number ####”.

What I took with me was:

2 hard copies and a digital copy of the Topkapi CD Request Form.

2 hard copies and a digital copy of my passport.

2 hard copies and a digital copy of a letter of endorsement from my supervisor, printed on paper with university letterhead.

2 hard copies and a digital copy of a letter explaining my purpose.

2 passport quality photographs (did not need them).

I stayed at the Netherlands Institute in Turkey. This came in really handy as I found out that you really need to either speak Turkish or have someone at your disposal who speaks Turkish to make things happen. The librarian was kind enough to help me out. She translated the letter in which I explained my purpose into Turkish.

With her help, calling to Topkapi, I also learned that you first need to get a letter of approval from the Ministry of Culture and Tourism. They are located in the Atlas Pasaji, on Istiklal Cadessi. Coming from Taksim, it will be on the left, a little before the Galatasaray Lisesi. In the Atlas Pasaji, the entrance is on the left, right next to the Tattoo Parlor (!). You will need a few Turkish words and a letter in Turkish explaining your purpose to talk yourself in. I had to go to the second floor where I was pointed to a door (they're all bind with no signs). I opened it and saw a civil servant watching a television show on his computer. He only spoke Turkish. A colleague of him came, and his German was very good (English only limited).

The question they will ask you is: "Do you have permission from Ankara?"

The correct answer is: "I do not need to physically hold the manuscript, I only want photographs."

With that established, they were actually very helpful. However, the letter I needed required a signature of someone who was not there. I agreed to come back the next day. Sometime in the morning, the next day, I actually received an e-mail saying the letter was signed. I went to pick it up and went to Topkapi Palace.

Once you have that letter, it is probably better to call ahead to Topkapi and make an appointment. I did not. When you are there, you can speak to the doorkeeper. You will receive a visitor's pass and be on your way, from the entrance you take a right. I ended up talking to a lady who was, yet again, very helpful. I was asked again about Ankara and I repeated again that I only needed photographs. I asked her why it is a bit more difficult to get images from Topkapi than it is from Suleymaniye. She said that when Topkapi Palace was turned into a museum (Topkapi Palace Museum), all the manuscripts were logged as museum items, and so the library (Topkapi Palace Museum Library) uses different protocols in handling the manuscripts than other manuscript libraries do. Unlucky for me, they had not made photos of the manuscripts I was after (ergo: not all manuscripts are digitized). But I was surprised to learn how willing they were to do it, and they did not bill me any extra money.

About the money, the photos are not dirt cheap. For large quantities it is 2 liras per photo. I wanted to see three sizable manuscripts which amounted to €500,-. I think that's a fine price, but I am just saying, it ain't a bargain.

All of the above happened in a span of 3 days. But, of course, those photos needed to be taken, so I returned home empty-handed. She said that from here we would be able to handle it over the Internet. When I had returned home, it took several e-mails and 22 days to finally have the pictures.

In a next post, I will discuss the quality of these pictures, in comparison with other collections that offer digitalization.

Thanks for this post. Topkapi is definitely not the easiest place to deal with, but the University of Istanbul is equally difficult, and I am not going to mention impossibilities of the TIEM. Good luck with your research and I look forward to the next part.

Two Chapters from the Futûhât al-Makkiyya

WILLIAM C. CHITTICK

Ibn al-'Arabi's magnum opus, al-Futûhât al-Makkiyya, 'The Meccan Openings', is known at least by name to all students of Sufism. In spite of its importance for Islamic thought in general, and Ibn al-'Arabi in particular, few scholars have taken advantage of its enormous riches because of the numerous difficulties connected with reading and understanding the text. Some of those interested in the Greatest Master have made necessity into a virtue by suggesting that, in any case, everything important is contained in Ibn al-'Arabi's Fusûs al-Hikam. This statement has a grain of truth to it in the sense that the mujmal or 'undifferentiated' level contains within itself the mufasssal or 'differentiated' level, much as a seed contains the tree.

One also hears the opinion that the Fusûs is more 'esoteric' than the Futûhât, and therefore, it seems, more valuable. But this opinion could hardly be expressed by anyone who has carefully studied both texts, since there is hardly an idea in the Fusûs not to be found expressed more clearly and in more detail somewhere in the Futûhât. Of course, by 'more esoteric' one may simply mean that the Fusûs is often more difficult to understand. To the extent this is true, the reason goes back to the point just made: the Fusûs is composed largely of brief allusions, while the same doctrines are exposed in full detail in the Futûhât. Moreover, there are certain sections of the Futûhât (one thinks in particular of the 128-page Chapter 559, which is several times as long as the Fusûs), which is more 'esoteric' in every sense of the word than anything found in the Fusûs itself.

The real problem facing the student of Ibn al-'Arabi is that the full significance of his undifferentiated teachings as found, for example, in the Fusûs, cannot be grasped without clarification from those works which express the same teachings in differentiated and explicit detail. Those who desire to gain a serious understanding of these teachings, even if they maintain that the esoteric marrow is found in the Fusûs, have no choice but to study the Futûhât and other works to grasp the Fusûs full implications.

Some of those unfamiliar with the text of the Futûhât and the development of the extensive commentary literature on the Fusûs might argue that this or that Fusûs commentator gives us all the elucidation that we need, but this is to ignore the fact that the commentary tradition of the Fusûs took on a life of its own, much more concerned with contemporary developments in Islamic thought than with the actual content of Ibn al-'Arabi's teachings. Then, as now, authors kept their audience in mind; the Fusûs commentaries tell us as much about contemporary intellectual concerns as about the text itself.

Careful study of this literature suggests that different aspects of the Fusûs are stressed in different periods and places, and that some of the central discussions of the work are often pushed into the background. It is only by going back to Ibn al-'Arabi's own works that we can bring out the significance of the Fusûs for Ibn al-'Arabi and his immediate disciples. Naturally, we are still faced with the problem that 'commentary' is determined as much by the contemporary intellectual situation as the content of the work; moreover, in English there is the added and indeed major problem of 'translation', which needs to be understood in the widest sense, as 'carrying over' a particular world view into an alien intellectual universe. By avoiding the intermediary links in the commentary literature and going directly to the source, we certainly have something to gain.¹

Until recently only a small number of passages from the Futûhât were available in Western languages, mainly French.² This situation has now changed significantly by the publication, under the direction of Michel Chodkiewicz, of an anthology called Les illuminations de La Mecque / The Meccan Illuminations: Textes choisis / Selected Texts. In addition, my own recent work, The Sufi Path of Knowledge: Ibn al-'Arabi's Metaphysics of Imagination, consists mostly of passages translated from the Futûhât. But the task of presenting the Futûhât to Western readers has barely begun. The original text is enormously long and extraordinarily full of difficulties. My purpose here is to offer two short chapters as a minor contribution to this ongoing project.

The two chapters below deal with several themes. Among these, two of the central ideas of Ibn al-'Arabi's spiritual universe stand out: the 'Oneness of Being' (wahdat al-wujûd) and 'Perfect Man' (al-insân al-kâmil). I originally translated the chapters in 1985 during the preliminary stages of preparing my contribution to Chodkiewicz's anthology. Later we decided that the material they deal with was covered sufficiently by other chapters or was not as central to the concerns of that work as we had hoped. As a result I put the chapters aside for some other occasion, which has now presented itself. In what follows I have thoroughly revised the translations and added brief introductions along with minimal notes. Since many of the topics discussed are covered in some form in the two works mentioned above, I usually refer the reader to those works for clarification or elaboration. Most of the themes not explained in the introductions or notes are discussed in those works in some detail.

CHAPTER 317 CONCERNING THE TRUE KNOWLEDGE OF THE WAYSTATION OF TRIAL AND ITS BLESSINGS³

Introduction

Like many chapters in the Futûhât, Chapter 317 deals with a number of topics whose interrelationship is hardly clear at first glance. One might tie together the major subjects as follows: 'Trial' (ibtilâ') is the testing to which God puts human beings and the jinn. It results from 'prescription' (taklîf), i.e. the fact that God has made incumbent upon them worship ('ibâda) as set down in the Shari'a (the revealed Law). Prescription in turn depends upon life in the present world (al-dunyâ), which arises from the connection between the spirit (rûh) and the body (jism). However, there is another kind of life intrinsic to all things which also entails a kind of worship, since, in the words of the Qur'an (in one of many similar verses): 'There is nothing that does not glorify Him in praise, but you do not understand their glorification' (17:44).⁴

¹ We will also lose something, and I am the first to acknowledge this. Much of my earlier research was devoted to Ibn al-'Arabi's most influential disciple, Sadr al-Din Qunawi, as well as other commentators like 'Abd al-Rahman Jami. I still consider study of these figures to be of great importance for understanding the full significance of Ibn al-'Arabi's teachings - especially in their historical extension. The various commentators have much to teach us for many reasons, not the least of these being their involvement with the oral transmission of Ibn al-'Arabi's teachings, their 'verification' (tahqîq) of his teachings through the spiritual practices which accompanied the oral transmission, and the monumental intellectual effort they devoted to putting Ibn al-'Arabi's teachings into logical and coherent order.

The fact that the life which demands prescription derives from the spirit brings up the question of death, which occurs when the spirit leaves the body, and this in turn calls to mind the barzakh (the intermediary stage of existence between death and resurrection) and the 'next world' (al-âkhira) properly so-called, in both of which the spirit is once again attached to the body, though the body is manifest in an 'imaginal' rather than corporeal mode.

Ibn al-'Arabi then connects God's trial of mankind with human understanding of the afterlife, i.e. with the question of correct faith and true knowledge. For faith in 'God, the angels, the prophets, the books, and the Last Day' is incumbent upon all Muslims, and if this faith is to be sound, it must be based upon correct knowledge.

Finally Ibn al-'Arabi turns, as he usually does, to the 'divine root' (al-asl al-ilâhî) of the discussion at hand, i.e. the divine name or names which manifest their properties through the reality being discussed. In this section of the chapter his particular concern is to show that the spirit manifests the names Living (al-hayy) and Light (al-nûr) and that, in the last analysis, God Himself is the spirit of the cosmos, while the cosmos is His body. Hence he concludes the chapter by illustrating the nature of the Oneness of Being, although, of course, he does not use the expression wahdat al-wujûd, since it was coined by his followers.

Ibn al-'Arabi's not infrequent discussions of 'trial' (ibtilâ') in the Futûhât usually have in view those Quranic verses which discuss the trials and tests to which God puts His creatures, such as the following: 'We have made all that is on the earth an adornment for it, and that We may try which of them is fairest in works' (18:7); 'He has raised some of you in rank above others, that He may try you in what He has given you' (6:165), and 'We shall assuredly try you until We know those of you who struggle and are steadfast' (47:31).⁵

In the present chapter, Ibn al-'Arabi takes up specifically the relationship between the following two Quranic verses: 'Blessed be He in whose hand is the Kingdom, who is powerful over everything, who created death and life, that He might try you, which of you is fairest in works' (67:1-2); and 'His Throne is upon the water, that He might try you, which of you is fairest in works' (11:9). In both verses God is alluded to as 'King' (al-malik), in the first because He owns the Kingdom (mulk) and in the second because He sits upon the Throne ('arsh). What needs to be explained is why the King's Throne rests upon the 'water' and what His kingship has to do with trial.

God's argument against human beings depends upon the messages which He sends through the prophets, whereby He prescribes (taklîf) for them the commands and prohibitions of the Shari'a. The word taklîf means literally 'to impose a burden': God tries people by placing upon them the burden of the revealed Law. Human beings along with the jinn are unique among creatures in having this responsibility placed upon them. Even that which appears outwardly as a pure blessing (ni'ma) is in fact a trial, since the servant must react to blessings in accordance with prescription. As Ibn al-'Arabi writes:

The blessings with which God blesses His servants in this world are not free of trial, since thanksgiving (shukr) is prescribed for the servants, and this is the greatest of trials, since blessings are a greater veil over God than afflictions. (III 209.21)

We will not be able to make any claims of innocence, since we will recognize that we have failed in the fair trial through which He tested us (cf. the Futûhât III 134:21).

Thanksgiving, incidentally, is an important theme of the second chapter translated below.

The present chapter begins with a poem alluding to the human body as a vehicle for the spirit and a locus for the trials which the spirit undergoes. The spirit and the body are the two poles of macrocosmic and microcosmic existence. The spirit is 'of the Breath of God', so its essential attributes are delineated by God's own names. Since the first of the divine names - the 'leader of the leaders' (imâm al-a'imma) upon which all others depend - is the Living, the spirit is usually associated with the attribute of life, as we see in the chapter on Jesus in the Fusûs. All the other divine attributes follow in the wake of life. Hence the spirit also possesses knowledge and awareness, luminosity, desire, power, speech, generosity, justice, and so on.

The body stands at the opposite pole of cosmic existence; compared to the spirit it possesses hardly any trace of these attributes and can conveniently be referred to by their opposites, such as death, ignorance, darkness, and dumbness. The life and luminosity which we perceive in bodily things derive from the spirit's activity. Hence the cosmos - 'everything other than God' - has two extremes, both macrocosmically and microcosmically. On the luminous extreme, that of spirit, the divine attributes are present in relatively full splendour, while on the dark side, that of the body, they are absent for all practical purposes.⁶

However, nothing in the cosmos is absolute, even if certain things reflect the absolutely Real or Its qualities more directly than others. If in one respect life pertains only to the spirit, this is true when the spirit is envisaged in relationship to the body. Then we may fairly speak of contrasting sets of attributes, such as life and death, light and darkness. But if we look at bodily things inasmuch as they are self-disclosures (tajallî) of God, then, like the spirit, they manifest the attributes of God through their very existence, since wujûd ('Being' or 'existence' or 'finding') is the Real Himself. To exist is to manifest the divine attributes. As Ibn al-'Arabi's followers expressed this idea, 'Wujûd descends with all its soldiers.' Even that which is dead or inanimate possesses a certain form of life. That is why the Qur'an says that everything in the universe, animate or inanimate, glorifies God.

Ibn al-'Arabi insists that such verses must not be interpreted in a figurative or symbolic sort of way, as a reference to the 'state' (hâl) of the thing - a plant, let us say, glorifying God by making manifest His life-giving power. On the contrary, this glorification is verbal and aware, the proof lying not only in explicit Quranic statements and hadiths, but also in the visionary experience of the gnostics, who witness this glorification with the heart's eyes and ears. Hence every existent thing is alive, knowing, desiring, and so on, because these attributes are intrinsic to existence. Ibn al-'Arabi discusses this point in some detail in the middle of the passage.

Translation of Chapter 317

This is the waystation of the Imam who stands at the left hand of the Pole.⁷

I wonder at the house He has built and shaped, placing therein a noble spirit, putting it to the trial.
 He destroyed it utterly, as if He had not built it.
 Who can put it together for me, who can make it last?
 He knew full well what He had set up -
 Would that I knew what He knew!

Why did He not from the first build that house as a lasting structure whose life does not disappear?
 It did nothing to make it deserve ruin, so why did He raise it up, and why did He lay it waste?
 The hand of trial toyed with us and it and after a time restored it and raised it high.
 Returned to the house, the spirit mounted upon its throne as a king, making its inhabitants immortal, Blessing it with an Eden and an everlasting Garden, causing it to dwell in paradise and shelter.

Know (God confirm you, O dear and noble friend!) that life belongs to the spirits - which govern all bodies, whether of fire, earth, or light⁸ just as brightness belongs to the sun. Life is an intrinsic attribute of the spirits, so spirits do not become manifest to anything unless that thing comes to life; the life of the spirit that becomes manifest to it permeates it. In the same way the brightness of the sun permeates the body of the air, the face of the earth, and every place in which the sun becomes manifest.

From here one comes to know who is the spirit of the cosmos, from whom it seeks the replenishment of its life, and what is the meaning of His words, 'God is the light of the heavens and the earth' (Qur'an 24:35). Then [in the rest of verse 24:35] He employs a likeness, for He says, 'The likeness of His light is like a niche wherein is a lamp,' which is the light - and so on to the end of the simile. He who understands this verse knows how God preserves the cosmos.

Hence this verse is one of the mysteries of the true knowledge of God in the interrelationship between the God (al-ilâh) and the divine thrall (al-ma'lûh), or the Lord and the vassal.⁹ If God did not undertake to preserve the thrall and the vassal constantly, they would immediately be annihilated, since nothing would preserve them and keep them in subsistence. Were He to become veiled in the Unseen from the cosmos, the cosmos would become naught. Hence the name 'Manifest' (al-zâhir) exercises its properties forever in existence, while the name 'Nonmanifest' (al-bâtin) exercises its properties in knowledge and gnosis. Through the name Manifest He makes the cosmos subsist, through the name Nonmanifest we come to know Him, and through the name Light we witness Him.¹⁰

There is life in the human being, who is our object of attention in this chapter - for this chapter deals with trial, which encompasses the two weighty ones [jinn and mankind] for whom prescriptions are made. Nothing other than the two weighty ones is like us in the property of worship ('ibada) and prescription (taklîf). Hence my words about the human being alone in respect of his life concern everything other than God, while my words about his trial concern everyone for whom prescription is made, i.e. the two weighty ones.

God says, 'His Throne was upon the water' (Qur'an 11:9). Here 'upon' ('alâ) means 'in' (fi), that is, the Throne was in the water, just as man is 'in' water. In other words, man came to be from (min) water, for water is the root of all existent things. It is the throne of the divine life, since 'From water' God created 'every living thing' (Qur'an 21:31), and everything other than God is living, since everything other than God glorifies Him in praise, while glorification cannot take place except in a living thing. Reports have come concerning the life of everything: wet and dry, inanimate, plant, earth, and heaven.¹¹

Here there occurs a dispute between the people of unveiling (ahl al-kashf) and certain others who have no unveiling, and between the people of faith and those who do not acknowledge the revealed religions (sharâ'i) or who interpret (ta'wîl) them in ways in which they have not come, for they say that this glorification takes place 'through the state (hâl)'. As for a thing whose life is perceived by the senses, there is no dispute as to its life. The dispute occurs only concerning the cause of its life and that to which its glorifying its Lord in praise goes back, since no one can glorify but him who is alive and intelligent and who understands what he says. The opponent holds that living things other than mankind and jinn have no intelligence, in contrast to what is believed by us and the people of unveiling and sound faith. Here by 'intelligence' ('aql) I mean 'knowledge' ('ilm).¹²

¹² 'Aql or intelligence is often used in the sense of knowledge, which in any case presupposes awareness and consciousness, but here Ibn al-'Arabi may be adding this proviso in order not to enter a discussion of 'aql as that attribute which is the defining and specific characteristic of human beings.

In this verse the 'Throne' ('arsh) consists of the 'kingdom' (mulk).¹³ 'Was' (kân) is a word which denotes existence.¹⁴ Hence the meaning is: The kingdom exists in water, or water is the root of the manifestation of the kingdom's entity. Water is as it were the hylê of the kingdom; within it become manifest the forms of the cosmos, which is the kingdom of God. The cosmos is restricted to entities and relationships. The entities are existential, while the relationships are intelligible and non-existent.¹⁵ This is 'everything other than God'.¹⁶

Since water is the root of life and of every living thing, while the relationships are subordinate to water, He makes a connection between the Throne placed upon the water and His creation of death and life in trial. He says, 'His Throne is upon the water, that He might try you' (11:9), i.e. test you. The Throne, as I mentioned to you, consists of existent entities and non-existent relationships. He also says, '[Blessed be He . . .] who created death and life, that He might try you' (67:1-2). So life belongs to the entities, and death to the relationships.¹⁷

The spirit's manifestation to the body is the life of that body, just as the sun becomes manifest in order to illuminate those bodies to which it becomes manifest. The spirit's absence from the body is the disappearance of life from it, i.e. death. Hence coming together is life and separation death. Coming together and separation are intelligible relationships with manifest properties, even though they have no existence in entity.

You should know that all the faculties in man and every living thing, like the faculties of sensation, imagination, memory, form-giving, and all the other faculties attributed to all bodies, high and low, belong only to the spirit. They come to be when the spirit exists and bestows life upon the body. When one of the faculties ceases to be, this is because the spirit turns away from the body in the respect in which that specific faculty has come to be. So understand!

When the spirit turns away from the body entirely, all the faculties and life disappear along with the spirit's disappearance. This is called 'death'. It is like night through the absence of the sun. As for sleep, it is not a complete turning away.¹⁸ Rather, it is vaporous veils which come between the faculties and the sensory objects of their perception, while life remains in the sleeper. This is like the sun when clouds come between it and a specific location on the earth. The brightness - like life [in the sleeper] - continues to exist, but the sun cannot be perceived ¹³ The term 'kingdom' is often used together with 'dominion' (malakût), in which case the two words refer to the two basic worlds which make up the cosmos: the visible and invisible, or spiritual and corporeal. Here the term is clearly used to refer to everything owned by God, who is, in Quranic terms, both King (al-malik, 59:23) and Owner of the Kingdom (malik al-mulk, 3:26).

¹⁶ 'Everything other than God' is the standard definition of cosmos.

¹⁷ Apparently this sentence is parenthetical, describing life and death not as relationships (as they are discussed earlier and in the next paragraph) but as intrinsic attributes of entities and relationships, since that which (truly) exists is alive, while that which does not exist has no life.

¹⁸ The connection between sleep and death is immediate in Islamic thought. The Prophet said, 'Sleep is the brother of death,' while the Quranic basis for this connection is the verse, 'God takes the souls at the time of their death, and that which has not died, in its sleep . . .' (39:42).

When the light of the sun leaves this location on the earth and night comes to its end, the light becomes manifest in another location, illuminating it so that day comes there just as it had come in the first location. In the same way, once the spirit leaves the body that had possessed life through it, it discloses itself to a form in the 'Trumpet' (sûr), which is known as the barzakh and which is the plural of sûra ('form').¹⁹ Then the barzakh form comes to life. Similarly the Prophet said that the life-breath (nasama) of the person of faith is a green bird [after death]²⁰ That bird is like the body here. It is a form that has come to life through the spirit which had been giving life to the body. Just as the sun will rise up over us again tomorrow, illuminating the existent things by its light, so also the spirit will rise up over the dead bodies on the 'day' of the next world, bringing them to life. This is the Unfolding (nashr) and the Uprising (ba'th).

You should know that God brought the Trumpet into existence in the form of a horn. It was named the 'Trumpet' in the way that things are named by the name of what is near to them or causes them to be. Since this horn is a locus for all the barzakh forms into which the spirits pass after death and in sleep, it was called sûr, the plural of 'form'. Its shape is that of a horn: its high end is wide and its low end is narrow, like the shape of the cosmos. How can the wideness of the Throne be compared to the narrowness of the earth?²¹ The faculties pass with the spirit into that barzakh form in sleep and death. That is why the spirit perceives [in both of these states] by means of all its faculties without distinction. Thus have I given you knowledge of the actual situation.

It is here that those who uphold transmigration (tanâsukh) have slipped. When they saw or heard that the prophets gave news of the passage of the spirits into these barzakh forms, within which they come to be in the form of their character traits, and when they saw those character traits in animals, they imagined that the words of the prophets, messengers, and men of ¹⁹ Most Qur'an commentators read the word sûr as 'trumpet', and explain that it will be blown by the angel Seraphiel. But a minority have suggested that the word should be read as 'forms'. Although the usual plural of 'form' is suwar, some authorities maintain that sûr can also be its plural, or a collective noun (cf. Fakhr al-Din Razi, al-Tafsîr al-kabîr, commentary on Qur'an 6:73; Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, under sûr). Ten Quranic verses mention the 'trumpet' (or the 'forms') always in connection with the verb nafkh, which means to blow. For example, 'Upon that day . . . the Trumpet shall be blown,' which, according to the minority interpretation, would be read ' . . . the forms shall be blown into' (18:99). The Qur'an employs the term nafkh in three other connections, two of which are highly significant for the present discussion: The Qur'an refers to Jesus as God's spirit, 'blown into' the Virgin Mary (21:91, 66:12), while Jesus brings to life a bird by 'blowing' into it (3:49, 5:110). (As pointed out above, Ibn al-'Arabi discusses Jesus in connection with the spirit in the Fusûs). The Qur'an also refers to God's 'blowing' of His spirit into Adam after He had moulded his body out of clay (15:29, 32:9, 38:72). In addition, the Qur'an calls God the 'form-giver' (al-musawwir) and, addressing man, tells him that God 'created you, proportioned you, balanced you, and composed you after whatever form He would' (82:7-8). Hence Ibn al-'Arabi has a strong traditional basis for making a connection between sûr and 'forms'. Nevertheless, he takes this reading as an 'allusion' (ishâra) rather than a definitive interpretation. Hence, for example, he uses the masculine single pronoun to refer to sur in this passage, thereby showing that he is reading it to mean 'Trumpet'. He was perfectly aware of the prophetic hadiths which explain sûr as a 'horn' (qarn), as the remainder of the discussion shows. In the present context, the barzakh is the World of Imagination inasmuch as it is experienced after death and before the Resurrection, when human beings assume new forms in keeping with their character traits. For a discussion of the 'Trumpet', cf. Sufi Path, pp.122-3. On the barzakh after death, cf. Chittick, 'Death and the World of Imagination: Ibn al-'Arabi's Eschatology', The Muslim World 78 (1988), pp.51-82; Sufi Path, passim; Les Illuminations, passim.

knowledge referred to the animals of this world and that the spirit would be returned for purification, and they mentioned what they had come to know of the prophets' position. Hence they were mistaken in their view and in their interpretation (ta'wîl) of the words of the messengers and what the revealed books have said about that. They saw that a dreamer is near to this affair into which they had entered, so they were happy with the position they took. Hence their position only came to them from a bad interpretation of sound words.²²

This is the meaning of His words, 'To try you': to test your rational faculties through death and life. 'Which of you is fairest in works', through pondering and considering the two. Then He will see which of you is correct, and which is mistaken, like those who uphold transmigration.

He made all this a clear proof and set it up as a conclusive demonstration of His name Living, His name Light, and His names Manifest, Non-manifest, First, and Last. Thereby a person may know the relationship between the cosmos and Him who brought it into existence. A person will know that the cosmos is not independent in itself, that its poverty toward God is an intrinsic poverty, not separate from it for the blink of an eye, and that the relationships are constant in property because of the subsistence of the existence of the entities.²³ He is the Inaccessible, Unapproachable, and Unreachable lest His creatures perceive Him and lest 'anything of His knowledge' be comprehended 'save such as He wills' (Qur'an 2:254). He is the All-concealing (al-ghafûr)²⁴ who curtains rational faculties from the perception of His own inmost centre or the inmost centre of His majesty.

Know O friend (God give light to your insight!) that it has now been established for you that the life of all bodies derives from the life of the spirits which govern them and that death takes place through the separation of the spirits from them. At this point the order (nizâm) of the two disappears, since the faculties which hold fast to the bodies disappear with the disappearance of the spirit which God appointed to govern them.

You should also know that life in all things is two lives: life derived from a secondary cause, i.e. the life which we have mentioned and attributed to the spirits; and another life, which is intrinsic to all bodies just as life is intrinsic to the spirits. However, an effect of the life of the spirits becomes manifest in the governed bodies through the diffusion of the spirits' brightness within them and through the manifestation of the spirits' faculties, which we mentioned. But the life intrinsic to the bodies is not like that, since the bodies were not created to govern. Hence, through their intrinsic life - which cannot disappear from them, since it is an attribute of their own selves (nafsî) - they glorify their Lord constantly, whether or not their spirits are within them. Their spirits give them nothing of glorification except a second, accidental, specific condition. When the spirit departs from them, so also does this specific remembrance (dhikr), which is the speech (kalâm) usual among us, whether it reaches the senses as glorification or something else.

The possessor of unveiling perceives the intrinsic life which is found in all bodies. When something happens to any bodily thing which removes it from its own order, such as the breaking of a dish, the breaking of a stone, or the cutting of a tree, this is like the amputation of a person's hand or leg, whereby the life of the governing spirit disappears from it while its intrinsic life remains. Every form in the cosmos possesses a governing spirit and an intrinsic life. The spirit disappears with the disappearance of the form, like a person who is slain. Likewise the form disappears with the disappearance of the spirit, like a person who dies in his bed without having been struck by a sword. But the intrinsic life that belongs to every indivisible substance (jawhar fard) does not disappear.

Through this intrinsic life - toward which God blinds the eyes of some creatures - skin, tongues, arms, and legs will testify against the people on the Day of Resurrection.²⁵ Through it a man's thigh will speak at the end of time, giving news to him of the acts of his wife.²⁶ Through it trees will speak at the end of time when Jews hide behind them and Muslims are seeking them to slay them. A tree will say to a Muslim, when it sees him hunting for the Jew, 'O Muslim, there is a Jew behind me, so slay him,' so he will slay him. But the thornbush (gharqad) will conceal the Jew when he comes to it, which is why the Messenger of God cursed it.²⁷ Nor can it be said that the tree only felt pity toward him who relied upon it, like people of noble character, since you should know that God's right has more claim to be observed and that it is more necessary for a person of faith to employ a noble character for God. Do you not see that He says, 'In the matter of God's religion, let no pity for them seize you' (Qur'an 24:2)?

This life is intrinsic to all things only because it derives from the divine self-disclosure (al-tajallî al-ilâhî) to each and every existent thing. He created the existent things to worship and know Him.²⁸ But not one of His creatures would know Him unless He disclosed Himself to it, and then it comes to know Him through itself. For no created thing has the capacity to know the Creator, as God said, 'We taught him knowledge from Us' (Qur'an 18:64).²⁹ Self-disclosure continues forever, witnessed by and manifest to all existent things, except the angels, mankind, and the jinn, since this constant self-disclosure belongs only to that which has no rational speech (nutq), like all inanimate things and plants.³⁰

As for those things which have been given rational speech and the ability to express what is in themselves - that is, the angels, mankind, and the jinn in respect of their governing spirits and their faculties - for them self-disclosure occurs from behind the veil of the unseen. Hence the angels' knowledge derives from God's giving knowledge (ta'rîf), not from self-disclosure, while the knowledge of mankind and the jinn derives from consideration (nazar) and reasoning (istidlâl). But the knowledge possessed by their bodies and by all other created things derives from the divine self-disclosure.

²⁶ Ibn al-'Arabi probably has in mind the following hadîth: 'By Him in whose hand is my soul, the Hour will not come before wild animals speak to human beings, the tip of a man's whip and the strap of his sandal speak to him, and his thigh gives him news of what his wife will do after him' (Tirmidhi, Fitan 19).

²⁷ One of the hadîths Ibn al-'Arabi has in mind is the following: 'The Hour will not come until the Muslims fight the Jews. The Muslims will slay them, until the Jew conceals himself behind rocks and trees. The rock or the tree will say, "O Muslim, O servant of God, there is a Jew behind me, so come and slay him" - except for the thornbush, since it is a tree of the Jews' (Muslim, Fitan 84). A longer version of the same hadîth tells us that this event will take place when al-Dajjal (the Antichrist) is in charge of Jerusalem, with 70,000 armed Jews standing behind him. Jesus will look at al-Dajjal, 'and he will melt like salt in water,' and then Jesus will slay him. God will then put the Jews to flight. 'Nothing will remain of what God created behind which a Jew conceals himself without God making it speak, neither stone, nor tree, nor wall, nor crawling creature - except the thorn bush, for it is one of their trees and will not speak . . .' (Ibn Maja, Fitan 33).

³⁰ From another point of view, all things possess nutq, as Ibn al-'Arabi points out below and towards the end of Chapter 339.

This is because other creatures have an innate disposition to concealment, since they were not given verbal expression to convey knowledge. God desired to conceal this station [of self-disclosure to all things] as a mercy to those for whom religion is prescribed, since He knew from the first that it would be prescribed for them, while He had ordained for them acts of disobedience. And for some of them He had ordained protest in that which was not seemly for them, like the angels, when they said, 'What, wilt Thou set therein one who will do corruption there?' (Qur'an 2:3).³¹ Then there happened to them what happened in the story of Adam. That is why things were concealed from them. If they had disobeyed God by [His] decree and ordainment in spite of self-disclosure and witnessing, this would have been a tremendous lack of reverence and shame, so the retribution would have been tremendous and mercy would never have reached them. But since they disobeyed Him while affairs were concealed, they gained an argument with which to excuse themselves. Hence heedlessness and forgetfulness derive from the mercy which God appointed for His servants so that they might find through it an argument, should objections be made against them. Through it they find an excuse. Hence God did not make prescriptions for any of His creatures save the angels, mankind, and the jinn.³²

As for other than these three, the continuity of self-disclosure bestows upon them intrinsic, continuous life. In their glorification they are like us in our breaths, constant and incessant without any hardship felt in breathing. On the contrary, our breaths are identical with ease. Or rather, if it were not for our breaths, we would die. Do you not see the person who is choked? When he is prevented from exhaling his breath, he dies and experiences pain. In such measure is the glorification of all things - if you have understood.

In reality, it is the Real who governs the cosmos, as God says, 'He governs the affair, He differentiates the signs' (13:2). The 'signs' are the proofs of the profession of His Unity: Each created thing gives a proof, specific to itself, of the Unity of Him who brought it into existence.

In each thing He has a sign proving that He is One.

These are the 'signs' which He 'differentiates', thereby dividing them among His creatures according to the innate dispositions which God has given to them.

So He is the spirit of the cosmos, its hearing, its sight, and its hand. Through Him the cosmos hears, through Him it sees, through Him it speaks, through Him it grasps, through Him it runs, since: 'There is no power and no strength save in God, the All-high, the Tremendous.'³³

This is known only by those who draw near to God through supererogatory good works, just as has been mentioned in the Sahîh in the divine prophetic reports: When the servant draws near to Him through supererogatory works, He loves him, and when He loves him He says, 'I am his hearing, his sight, and his hand.' Another version has, 'for him I am hearing, sight, hand, and confirmer.'³⁴

God's words 'I am' show that this was already the situation, but the servant was not aware. Hence the generous gift which this nearness gives to him is the unveiling and knowledge that God is his hearing and his sight. He had been imagining that he hears through his own hearing, ³¹ This protest of the angels to Adam's creation forms the subject of an extended commentary toward the beginning of the first chapter of the Fusûs. See also Sufi Path pp. 68, 142.

³² Ibn al-'Arabi seems to contradict what he said earlier in the chapter concerning who is given prescription. But in the earlier passage he said that 'nothing other than the two weighty ones is like us in the property of worship and prescription,' and elsewhere he makes clear that the angels are indeed given prescriptions, but they are not 'like us' in this since they receive only commandments, not prohibitions (Futûhât III 118.35).

³⁴ On this hadîth and Ibn al-'Arabi's interpretation of it, cf. Sufi Path pp. 325-31.

but he was hearing through his Lord. In the same way, during his life, man supposes that he hears through his spirit, because of his ignorance, but in actual fact he hears only through his Lord.

Do you not see what the veracious Prophet said concerning the People of the Well? 'You did not hear better than they.' This was when he addressed them with the words, 'Have you found as true what your Lord promised you?', even though they were corpses.³⁵ So there are no creatures that do not hear, but they are given innate dispositions which prevent them from conveying what they know and what they hear. This is the life that becomes manifest to the eyes of the creatures during the miraculous breaking of habits when the dead are brought to life, such as the cow of Moses and other things.³⁶

The name Manifest - if you verify it - is the cosmos, since the cosmos is to the Real as the body is to the governing spirit. And the name Non-manifest belongs to everything that is hidden from the existent things in the relationship of life to themselves. The human being exists through the whole, since he is defined as a 'rational animal'. His animality is his manifest form, since 'animality' denotes the same thing as 'a feeding and sensate body', though more briefly. The word 'animal' (hayawân) was preferred in the realm of verbal expression because of its abbreviated form, since it is equivalent in denotation. Man is 'rational' (nâtiq) in respect of his supra-sensory reality (ma'nâ), and this reality is nothing other than what we mentioned. Hence in our view the whole cosmos, which consists of everything other than God, is a 'rational animal', though its bodies, its feeding, and its sensations are diverse. It is manifest through its animal form and non-manifest through its intrinsic life which comes to exist through the divine self-disclosure, which exists continuously. Hence there is nothing in *wujûd*³⁷ save God, His names, and His acts. He is the First in respect to the name Manifest, and He is the Last in respect to the name Non-manifest. So wujûd is all Real (haqq). There is nothing of the unreal within it, since what is understood from applying the word 'unreal' (bâtil) is some sort of non-existence in that which someone claims is an existence. So understand!

If this were not the case, the creatures alone would perform acts, and the divine power would not pervade all the possible things, or rather, the possibilities would vanish from the divine power. So glory be to the Manifest who is not hidden, and glory be to the Hidden who is not manifest! Through Him the creatures are veiled from knowing Him, and He made them blind through the intensity of His self-manifestation. Hence they are deniers, acknowledgers, waverers, bewildered, correct, mistaken. And praise belongs to God, who favoured us with such

³⁷ Up until this point I have been translating wujûd as 'existence', but in this case the ambiguity of the term wujûd, which refers basically to the underlying substance of the Real, or 'Being', comes to the fore. In Sufi Path, I frequently resorted to the expression Being/existence in such a context. Here I will leave the term untranslated. On wujûd see Sufi Path, especially Chapter 5; also Chittick, 'Ibn al-'Arabi's Doctrine of the Oneness of Being', Sufi 4 (1989-90), pp. 6-14.

loci of witnessing and disclosed to our eyes these realities. Our eyes fall only upon Him, and we support ourselves only through Him. 'There is no god but He, the Inaccessible, the Wise' (3:18).

He who desires to know the reality of that to which we have been alluding in this problem should consider the images and forms on the screen (sitâra) [of the shadow play].³⁸ In the eyes of the small children far from the veil of the screen set up between them and the person who manipulates the figures and speaks through them, who speaks within these forms? The situation is similar with the forms of the cosmos. The majority of people are these small children whom we have supposed, and you know from whence things come to them. The children in the gathering are happy and delighted. The heedless take it for a sport and diversion. The men of knowledge take heed and know that God has set this up only as a likeness (mathal). That is why, at the beginning, a figure comes out known as the narrator (wassâf). He delivers an address in which he magnifies and praises God. Then he talks about each kind of form which will come out after him from behind the screen. The gathering comes to know that God has set this up as a likeness for His servants, in order that they might take heed and come to know that the cosmos is related to God just as these forms are related to their mover and that the screen is the veil of the mystery of destiny. In spite of all this, the heedless take it as a sport and a diversion, as God says: 'Those who take their religion for a sport and a diversion' (Qur'an 6:69). Then the narrator goes away. He is like the first person existent among us, i.e. Adam. When he went away, he went away from us to his Lord, behind the screen of the Unseen. 'And God speaks the truth, and He guides on the way' (Qur'an 33:4).

³⁸ Clearly with a few changes the analogy could be extended to the television screen or the cinema. Probably the most famous use of this analogy in Sufi literature is found in Ibn al-Farid's Nazm al-sulûk. Cf. R.A. Nicholson, Studies in Islamic Mysticism, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1921, pp. 189-91, 260-2; A.J. Arberry, The Poem of the Way Emery Walker, London, 1952, lines 2130-237.

CONCERNING THE TRUE KNOWLEDGE OF A
WAYSTATION IN WHICH THE SHARI'A KNEELS
BEFORE THE REALITY, SEEKING REPLENISHMENT³⁹

Introduction

The chapter begins with a poem that refers to the demands which are made upon human beings by the nature of their ontological situation; their vicegerency (khilâfa) makes their burden a heavy one - noblesse oblige.

The chapter then refers to the intimate relationship between the Shari'a and the Reality (haqîqa), which in this context denotes God inasmuch as He determines the Shari'a. In certain respects the Shari'a and the Reality are identical, as Ibn al-'Arabi has told us in an earlier chapter.⁴⁰ In another respect, the Shari'a follows the Reality, as this chapter points out. But to understand the way in which the Shari'a follows the Reality, we need the knowledge possessed by perfect man. The station of 'animal man' (al-insân al-hayawân) - i.e. all human beings except the prophets and the very highest of the friends of God (awliyâ Allâh) - does not allow insight into this mystery. This may explain why Ibn al-'Arabi turns immediately to discussing the station of perfect man, devoting the rest of the chapter to three of his characteristics: the divine form, the subjection of all things in the cosmos to him, and the 'openings' which are given to him inasmuch as he is an inheritor (wârith) of the Prophet.

Discussion of these characteristics in turn amounts to commentary on several Quranic verses: 2:30-31, concerning Adam's vicegerency; 31:20, concerning the subjection of all things to man, God's lavishing him with blessings, and those people who dispute about God without knowledge; and 48:1-2, concerning the 'opening' and 'inaccessible help' given to the Prophet. Note that the term 'opening' (fath or futûh) plays a major role in Ibn al-'Arabi's teachings and is present in its plural form in the word Futûhât itself.⁴¹

At the outset, Ibn al-'Arabi tells us that this chapter describes a waystation (manzil) in which the second of the 'banners of praise' (alwiyat al-hamd) is revealed to the spiritual traveller. This expression derives from a sound hadîth in which the Prophet says that he will carry the banner of praise on the Day of Resurrection, and behind him will come Adam and all the other prophets and their followers. Ibn al-'Arabi defines the banner of praise as the most complete praise of God, around which all other praises gather, just as soldiers gather around the standard of the king.⁴² This banner clearly alludes to the fact that, as Ibn al-'Arabi and his followers put it, the Prophet is the most perfect of perfect men, the most complete locus of manifestation for the names of God. Ibn al-'Arabi connects the banner of praise with the 'praiseworthy station' (maqâm mahmûd) mentioned in the Qur'an (17:79), a station which, the Prophet tells us in a sound hadîth, will be given to him on the Day of Resurrection.⁴³ Insight into this chapter's connection to the 'second' of the seven banners of praise can be gleaned from the beginning of the previous chapter of the Futûhât (Chapter 338), where Ibn al-'Arabi writes as follows:

In the Praiseworthy Station within which the Messenger of God will stand on the Day of Resurrection, God has seven banners through His name Praiseworthy, and these are called the 'banners of praise'. The Messenger of God and his inheritors, the Muhammadans,⁴⁴ will be given, within these banners, the names of God by which the Messenger will laud his Lord when he stands in the Praiseworthy Station on the Day of Resurrection. This is referred to by his words, when asked about intercession, 'I will praise God with words of praise which I do not know now.'⁴⁵ This praise is his laudation of God with the names required by that dwelling place.

God is lauded only through His Most Beautiful Names. His names cannot be encompassed in knowledge, for we know that in the Garden there is 'What no eye has seen, what no ear has heard, and what has never passed into the heart of any mortal';⁴⁶ and we know that none of us knows 'what comfort is laid up' for us 'secretly' (Qur'an 32:17). All this is supported by that divine name through which it all becomes manifest when the name makes it manifest.⁴⁷ When He favours us by making a divine name manifest to us, we necessarily know it and laud God through it and praise Him, whether this be a laudation of glorification or a laudation of affirmation.⁴⁸

When I came to know this, I asked about the time appointed for the names through which God will be praised on the Day of Resurrection in the Praiseworthy Station. For I knew that I do not know those names now and that God will not teach them to me, since they are words of praise which pertain exclusively to the Prophet on the Day of Resurrection. But when we hear him praising Him with them on the Day of Resurrection in the Praiseworthy Station and when the banners are spread while the names are written upon them, then in that dwelling place we will come to know them. It was said to me as follows:

'The number of those names is 1,664. Each banner will have ninety-nine names written upon it - he who counts them there will enter the Garden.'⁴⁹ However, one of the banners will have 770 of these names written upon it. The Prophet will praise God with all these words of praise, and each of them comprises the seeking of intercession with God.'

When someone takes up residence in this waystation [i.e. the subject of the present chapter], among the things that he will be given is the witnessing of each of these banners and knowledge of all the names within them; then this inheritor may laud God with them there [in that world]. And here [in this world] each of the banners has a waystation which the Prophet reached, and which is reached by his inheritors, the perfect among his followers.⁵⁰

The beginning of Chapter 339 seems to suggest that it is the second in a series of chapters, but the above passage states rather explicitly that Chapter 338 deals with all seven banners (though little more is said about them), while none of the other banners is mentioned in the several chapters immediately following 339.

Translation of Chapter 339

[This waystation derives] from the Muhammadan Presence. This is the waystation within which becomes manifest the second of the Banners of Praise, comprising ninety-nine divine names.

Prohibition arises from the stain of temporal origination –

Say not, 'My vicegerency releases me.'

Beware! Your vicegerency limits you!

Where is release when the door of your engendered existence is open?

The heart lies behind the locks of your innate disposition.

The keys are lost and the locks cannot be undone.

Do not rejoice in the expansion of your breast!

It was expanded for you to know that limitations rule.⁵¹

Know (God confirm you, dear friend!) that people talk about the Shari'a and the Reality. God says to His Prophet, commanding him, 'Say, "My Lord, increase me in knowledge!"' (Qur'an 20:113). He means knowledge of Him in respect of the fact that He possesses faces (wujûh) in every creature and every originated thing, and this is the knowledge of the Reality.⁵² The Prophet did not seek increase in knowledge of the Shari'a. On the contrary, he used to say, 'Leave aside what I have left aside for you,'⁵³ The knowledge of the Shari'a is the knowledge of a way and a path. It demands a traveller (sâlik), and travelling is a hardship, but he wanted a reduction of that.

The ultimate end of the Shari'a's path is sensory felicity.⁵⁴ Its ultimate end is not the Reality in all cases, since some people reach the Reality in the first step they take in the Shari'a's path, for the face of the Real is found in every step. But the face of the Real in every step is not unveiled to every person.

The Shari'a is that on the basis of which rulings (hukm) are made for those for whom it has ⁵¹ For a discussion of some of the implications of this poem, cf. Chapter 141 on the station of abandoning freedom (translated into English in Les Illuminations 260-64).

⁵³ In another passage, Ibn al-'Arabi explains why the Prophet said this as follows:

'Much of the Shari'a came down because of the asking of the Community. Had they not asked, it would not have been sent down' (Futûhât II 562:16; cf. II 685:12). In Bukhari (I'tisâm 2), the text of the hadîth reads as follows: 'Let alone what I have left aside for you. Those who went before you were destroyed only because of their asking from and their divergence over their prophets. If I have forbidden something to you, avoid it, and if I have commanded you to do something, do of it what you can.'

been prescribed. But the Reality is the ruling concerning that through which rulings are made. The Shari'a comes to an end, while the Reality continues, since it subsists through the divine subsistence, while the Shari'a subsists through the divine bestowal of subsistence. Bestowal of subsistence will be abolished, but subsistence will not be abolished.

This waystation will show you the eminence of man over everyone in the heaven and the earth and that he is the Real's sought-after goal among the existent things, since it is he whom God has taken as a locus of self-disclosure (tajallî). I mean by 'man' perfect man, since he is perfect only through the form of the Real. In the same way a mirror, though complete (tâmm) in creation, is only perfect (kâmil) through the disclosure within it of the form of the looker. That is the 'level' of the mirror, and the level is the ultimate end. In the same way the Divinity is complete through the names which it demands from the divine thralls, so It lacks nothing, while Its perfection - I mean the level of which It is worthy - is independence from the worlds. Hence It possesses non-delimited perfection through independence from the worlds.⁵⁵

God willed to give His perfection its due (haqq), and He wills this always. He created the cosmos to glorify Him in praise, not for anything else. The glorification (tasbîh) is God's, while the glorifier does not possess the state of witnessing (shuhûd), since it is annihilated (fanâ') from witnessing. But the cosmos does not lag in glorification for the blink of an eye, since its glorification is inherent (dhâtî), like the breathing of a breather. This shows that the cosmos never ceases being veiled and it seeks witnessing through that glorification.

[Since God willed to give perfection its due,] He created perfect man upon His own form and gave news to the angels about his level. He told them that he is the vicegerent in the cosmos and that his home is the earth.⁵⁶ He appointed the earth his abode, since He created him from it. He made the Higher Plenum busy with him in heaven and earth, since 'He subjected' to him 'what is in the heavens and what is in the earth, all together, for him' (Qur'an 45:12), that is, for his sake. Then God veiled Himself, for the deputy (nâ'ib) has no property when He who has made him vicegerent is manifest. So 'He is veiled from insights, just as He is veiled from sight'. The Messenger of God, addressing people who resembled man in sensory form but who stood below the level of perfection, said, 'God is veiled from insights just as He is veiled from sight; the Higher Plenum seeks Him just as you yourselves seek Him.'⁵⁷ 'Sight perceives Him not' (Qur'an 6:103), and, in the same way, insights perceive Him not. 'Insights' are rational faculties, which perceive Him not with their reflections, so they are incapable of reaching and winning the object they seek.

'And He taught Adam the names, all of them' (2:31). He commanded him to teach the Higher Plenum. He commanded everything in the heavens and the earth to look after that which was appropriate for this deputy, since He subjected to him everything in the heavens and the earth, even that which is called 'man' in respect of his completeness, not in respect of his perfection.⁵⁸ As long as this kind which shares the name 'man' with perfect man does not attain to perfection, he is one of those who are subjected to the perfect one who, through his perfection, is joined to Him who is Independent of the worlds. He alone - I mean perfect man - worships his Lord who is Independent of him. Perfect man's perfection is that his Lord is not without need for him, since there is no one who worships Him outside the mode of glorification but perfect man, since he receives self-disclosure constantly, and the property of witnessing never leaves him. Hence he is the most perfect of existent things in knowledge of God and the most constant of them in witnessing.

⁵⁷ Ibn al-'Arabi sometimes cites this saying as a hadîth.

⁵⁸ On the difference between human 'completion' and 'perfection', cf. Sufi Path pp.296-7.

Perfect man has two visions (nazar) of the Real, which is why He appointed for him two eyes. With one eye he looks upon Him in respect to the fact that He is Independent of the worlds. So he sees Him neither in any thing nor in himself. Through the other eye he looks upon Him in respect of His name All-merciful, which seeks the cosmos and is sought by the cosmos. He sees His Being permeating all things. Through the vision of this eye he is poor toward everything in respect to the fact that the things are the names of God, not in respect of their own entities. Hence, none is poorer toward the cosmos than perfect man, since he witnesses it subjected to himself.⁵⁹ He knows that if he did not need the cosmos, those things that are subjected to him would not have been subjected to him. He knows in himself that he is more in need of the cosmos than the cosmos is in need of him. His all-inclusive poverty stands in the station of the all-inclusive divine Independence. In respect of poverty, he takes up a position in the cosmos like the position of the Real in respect to the divine names, which demand the displaying of effects in the cosmos. He only becomes manifest in his poverty by the manifestation of the names of the Real.

Perfect man is the Real in his independence from the cosmos, since the cosmos has been subjected for his sake by the divine names that display their effects within it. Nothing is subjected to him except that which possesses the display of effects, without respect to the entity of the cosmos. So he is poor only toward God.

Perfect man is also the Real in his poverty toward the cosmos. He knows that God subjected the cosmos to man only to distract the things, through the subjection imposed upon them, from seeking knowledge in respect to witnessing, for that does not belong to them, since they stand below the level of perfection. Therefore perfect man manifests need for that in which the cosmos has been subjected. Thereby subjection in the cosmos grows stronger, that they may not neglect that of it which the Real commanded them to perform; for 'They disobey not God in what He commands them' (66:6).⁶⁰ By making manifest this poverty, perfect man conforms to the Real in keeping the cosmos distracted.

Hence perfect man is the Real in his poverty, like the names, and the Real in his independence, since he does not see that which is subjected to him, only that which possesses effects. In other words, he sees the divine names, not the entities of the cosmos. Hence he is poor toward God only within the entities of the cosmos, while the cosmos knows nothing of that.

'Heaven moans', because of its inhabitants. The Prophet said, 'It has a right to moan. There is not a span of it without an angel prostrating itself to God.'⁶¹ He said 'prostrating itself to God' to indicate that the vision of every angel in the heaven is toward the earth, since prostration is to make oneself low. The angels know that the earth is the location of the vicegerent and that they were commanded to prostrate themselves [before him]. So they lowered themselves at God's command, gazing toward the place of this vicegerent, so that the prostration would be before him, since God commanded them to prostrate themselves before him. The property of prostration toward Adam and perfect man continues within them forever without cease.

You may object: Things like this prostration will disappear in the next world. We answer: It will not disappear, since the prostration takes place toward the outward form of perfect man, a form which God configures from elemental nature both at the beginning and at the return. At the beginning He made it 'grow up from the earth'; then through death He 'returns it to it'; then He

⁶⁰ Ibn al-'Arabi usually quotes this verse in connection with angels, as in the Quranic context.

'brings it forth' from the earth at the Uprising (Qur'an 71:16-17). This form has lowness (sufli) in level. Through this reality it seeks God, about whom the Prophet said, 'If you let down a rope, it will fall upon God.'⁶² And such must be the situation in itself. So the angels must be constantly in prostration to the Imam in this world and the next.⁶³

Perfect man possesses the form of the cosmos and the form of the Real, and through the whole he gains his superiority. The prostrater and that to which the prostration takes place are in him and from him. Were the situation not like this, he would not be all-comprehensive (jâmi').⁶⁴ Hence within the Higher Plenum there is a crowding to see perfect man, just as people crowd at the vision of an angel when it comes upon them suddenly. Hence heaven moans because of their crowding.

He who knows God through this knowledge knows both the outward and the inward blessings which God has showered down upon him.⁶⁵ Hence he declares himself quit of disputing about God 'without knowledge', i.e. that which is given by considerative proof, and 'without an illuminating book', i.e. those attributes of the Real concerning which communication has come. Hence God says, 'Among men are those that dispute about God without knowledge,' given to him by a proof of his reflection, 'or guidance', i.e. without clarification received through his unveiling, 'or an illuminating book' (Qur'an 22:8). This is knowledge of God communicated through signs sent down in His revealed books, which are described as light, so that through them that with which they are sent down can be unveiled - since through 'light' unveiling takes place. Hence from these people He negated following the authority of the Real, self-disclosure and unveiling, and rational consideration. There is no level of ignorance lower than this.⁶⁶ Hence this level has come from God as the object of blame, whereby He blames everyone who possesses such an attribute.

But, when they know the blessings of God - as we said - this knowledge makes thanksgiving incumbent upon them. Hence they occupy themselves with giving thanks, as did the Messenger of God when it was revealed to him, '... that God may forgive thee thy sins, the former and the latter, and complete His blessing upon thee, and guide thee on a straight path, and that God may help thee with inaccessible help' (Qur'an 48:1-2). He stayed on his feet giving thanks for this blessing until his feet became swollen. Such did he report when something was said to him about this, for he said, 'Should I not be a truly thankful (shakûr) servant?'⁶⁷ He employed the form fa'ûl [in shakûr], which indicates going to great lengths. So his acts of thanksgiving were many, because the blessings were many. Each blessing demanded from him that he give thanks to God for it.

It does not occur to the possessor of this station to seek increase in his thanksgiving, since thanksgiving is an act which demands the past and the actual. Hence, the thanksgiver's reception of increase in blessings is a bounty from God. That is why He named it an increase demanded by the thanksgiving, not by the thanksgiver, though its fruit is eaten by the thanksgiver. It is a

⁶⁴ Perfect man is the 'all-comprehensive engendered thing' (al-kawn al-jâmi'), as mentioned at the beginning of Chapter 1 of the Fusûs. Thereby he is the locus in which the 'all-comprehensive name' (al-ism al-jâmi'), i.e. Allah, manifests all its properties.

⁶⁵ Allusion to Qur'an 31:20, quoted in the introduction to this chapter. Ibn al-'Arabi has already discussed the nature of the 'subjection' mentioned in the verse, and now he turns to the other qualities.

⁶⁶ Since these are the three possible modes of knowledge. Cf. Sufi Path p.188.

recompense from the thanksgiving to the thanksgiver, for he has brought the entity of thanksgiving into existence and made its configuration an embodied form, glorifying and mentioning God. Hence this form asks God to add blessings to the blessings of this thanksgiver, since he was the cause for the bringing of the entity of thanksgiving into existence. God listens to it and complies with its request. So the thanksgiving asks God to let the thanksgivers know about that, so that they will know that the thanksgiving will fulfil with God the right which the thanksgiver has upon it.⁶⁸ Hence God says to His servants, 'If you are thankful, surely I will increase you' (Qur'an 14:7), thereby telling us about the increase.

The knower of God thanks God in order to create the form of thanksgiving constantly; thereby he makes the glorifiers of God, those who perform His worship, more numerous. When God knows this from him, He increases him in outward and inward blessings, so that he may possess the attribute of creating thanksgiving without cease. This situation belongs to him constantly in this world and the next.

The greatest plane through which thanksgiving becomes manifest within existence is the plane of thanksgiving for the blessing of the Form of Perfection and the plane of thanksgiving for the blessing of subjection. Increase from God to the thanksgiver accords with the measure of the form of the thanksgiving. So know how you give thanks and occupy yourself with the most important of it, then the next most important!

When through his thanksgiving the thanksgiver seeks increase because of what God has promised, God gives him nothing of the blessing of increase except in the measure and form of his seeking, i.e. whether it is mixed or flawless. His increase will be a forgiveness, a pardon, and a passing over, nothing else. In short, such a person is lower in degree than the first - who was given [increase] as a result of thanksgiving's asking [God to give it to him] - because in itself the plane of thanksgiving is free of mixture. If the thanksgiver mixes, his mixing will have no effect upon the form of the thanksgiving. But it has an effect upon the increase, if he gives thanks to acquire increase. So ranking in degrees is established among the thanksgivers as we have described: those who seek increase and those who do not seek it, those who occupy themselves with the most important, and those who do not occupy themselves with it. These are diverse paths to God, as He said: 'To every one of you We have appointed a right way and an open road' (Qur'an 5:52), i.e. the paths. The Reality is One Entity which is the ultimate aim of these paths, as indicated by His words, 'To Him the whole affair will be returned' (Qur'an 11:123).

Let us now turn to His words to His prophet Muhammad in the chapter of 'Opening' (fath)

When the servant reaches this waystation of knowledge, 'He will see the works of the wretched embodied and the works of the felicitous embodied in the same way, as subsistent forms aware of the existence of their creator. God places in the souls of these forms a search for the secondary causes which brought them into existence, i.e. the workers, and they are serious in their search. As for the works of the felicitous, these works see on their right hands a path which they follow. It takes them to the witnessing of their possessors, i.e. the felicitous. One of them will choose out the other. They inquire about each other, and then the workers will take them as mounts of triumph and deliverance which carry them to the resting place of mercy. As for the works of the wretched, to them appear many branching and intersecting paths, and they do not know which path they should follow to reach their possessors. They are bewildered and find no guidance, and this derives from God's mercy toward the wretched. Since the works are bewildered, they return to God in worship and remembrance (dhikr). (III 141:14) The passage goes on to tell us that some of the works eventually reach their owners and help them attain to felicity. For other passages on this kind of angel, cf. II 109:14, 626:7, 632:9, 635:7, 656:27; III 126:12, 361:10. See also C. Addas, Ibn 'Arabi, Gallimard, Paris, 1989 p.127.

(Qur'an 48). This is the opening of unveiling through the Real, the opening of sweetness in the inward dimension, and the opening of expression.⁶⁹ Through this last opening the Qur'an was an inimitable miracle (mu'jiza). No one was given the opening of expression in the perfection that it was given to the Messenger of God, for He says, 'If men and jinn banded together to produce the like of this Qur'an, they would never produce its like, not though they backed,' [i.e. helped] 'one another' (Qur'an 17:90).

He says to the Prophet, 'Surely We have opened for thee a clear opening' (Qur'an 48:1), through the three kinds of opening. He says, 'opening', using the verbal noun for emphasis. And 'clear', i.e. manifest: Whoever sees it will recognize it through that which discloses itself and that which it comprises. The opening of expression is established for the Arabs because no one is capable of protesting [against the Qur'an's linguistic perfection]. The opening of unveiling is established through the signs that were shown to him on the night of his ascension.

'That God may forgive thee thy sins, the former,' and thus conceal thee from the blame and the taking to task for which the possessor of sins is worthy, 'and the latter' (48:2), thereby concealing thee from sin itself so that it may not find thee and stand up through thee. He let us know through the forgiveness of the latter sins that the Prophet is inerrant (ma'sûm), without doubt. What confirms his inerrancy is that God made him an example to be emulated. If God had not placed him in the station of inerrancy, it would be necessary for us to emulate the sins that he committed if there were no text concerning them, like the text He provided concerning 'marriage by gift' (al-nikâh bi'l-hiba). This belongs exclusively to him according to the revealed Law, while it is unlawful for us.⁷⁰

'And complete His blessing upon thee' (48:2), by giving His blessing its creation, since He has told us about the 'fully created' and the 'not fully created' kinds, and He gives news through this verse that the blessing He gave Muhammad was 'fully created', i.e. complete in its creation.⁷¹

'And guide thee upon a straight path' (48:2). This is the path upon which is his Lord, as Hud says, 'Verily my Lord is upon a straight path' (Qur'an 11:59). All the revealed laws are lights, but among those lights the revealed law of Muhammad is like the light of the sun among the light of the stars. When the sun is manifest, the lights of the stars are hidden within the sun's light. Their hiddenness is equivalent to that of the revealed laws which is abrogated through his revealed law, even though their entities continue to exist, just as the existence of the lights of the stars is verified. That is why we are obligated in our all-inclusive Law to have faith in all messengers and all revealed laws. They are true, so they do not become false through abrogation - that is the

⁷⁰ The reference is to Qur'an 33:50, which deals with the Prophet's wives beyond the four allowed to the believers, and the fact that a believing woman can 'give' herself to the Prophet: 'O Prophet, We have made lawful for thee thy wives. . .; and any woman believer, if she give herself to the Prophet and if the Prophet desire to take her in marriage - for thee exclusively, apart from the believers. We know what We have imposed upon them teaching their wives and what their right hands own. Hence there may be no fault in thee.'

⁷¹ The term 'fully created' (mukhallaq) is mentioned in Qur'an 22:5 in a passage describing the formation of the child in the womb: 'Surely We created you of dust then a lump of flesh, fully created and not fully created, that We may make clear to you.' The commentators suggest that the lump of flesh that is not fully created does not receive a spirit, or is aborted, or is born with deformities. Ibn al-'Arabi usually applies the terms to the works that are born as a result of human activity, works which take on an independent existence of their own in the World of Imagination, as we saw above. Fully created works lead to felicity, while works which are not fully created may contribute to wretchedness. He writes:

'The divine spirit gains mastery over this corporeal mount. When it comes to it, the mount becomes pregnant, and works are born, either righteous (sâlih), i.e. the fully created, or corrupt (fâsid), i.e. the not fully created. These works then become manifest in the form of mounts [i.e. in imaginal forms resembling corporeal mounts]. If they are righteous, they ascend to the high heaven ('illiyîn). God says, "To Him good words ascend" (35:10), i.e. the wholesome spirits, for they are the purified words of God . . . and He says, "The righteous work - He lifts it up" (35:10). In the same way, if the work is corrupt, it falls to the lowest of the low' (III 33:11). Cf. II 489:16.

opinion of those who are ignorant.⁷² But all the paths go back to looking toward the path of the Prophet. For if the messengers had lived in his time, they would have followed him, as their revealed laws would follow his revealed law, since he was given the all-comprehensive words.⁷³

'And that God may help thee with inaccessible help' (48:2). The 'inaccessible' is something desired that cannot be reached. Since the messengers are those who seek to reach him, his inaccessibility does not allow them to grasp him, because of his all-inclusive mission, God's bestowing the all-comprehensive words upon him, his lordship through the Praiseworthy Station in the next abode,⁷⁴ and God's making his community 'the best community ever brought forth to mankind' (Qur'an 3:106) - for the community of every prophet is in the measure of the station of its prophet. So know that!

When those who maintain that prophethood can be earned sought to reach him, he was inaccessible to them.⁷⁵ The only thing that can be earned is travelling and reaching the door. As for what lies beyond the door, those who reach the door have no knowledge of him for whom it has been opened. Among mankind are those for whom it is opened because of an all-inclusive faith - which is the clear vision of the Reality - like Abu Bakr, since he never saw anything without seeing God before it. Among them are those for whom it is opened through an all-inclusive news-giving within which there is no Law. These two openings will remain in this community until the Day of Resurrection. Among those who reach the door are those who have it opened for them through a prophecy of Law-giving (tashrî') restricted to themselves, while others have it opened through a messengerhood that gives a revealed Law [for others as well]. But God has forbidden anyone from reaching these two doors - or openings - or having them opened for him except the people of independent effort (ijtihâd), since God has caused something of that to remain for them, as affirmed by the revealed Law.⁷⁶ Hence its property belongs to the Law-giver, not to themselves.

Nothing that comes out from behind the door after it is opened has been earned. Prophethood is not earned. Hence 'God' helped him 'with inaccessible help', so he who maintains that prophethood is earned cannot reach him. For, when someone is described as inaccessible, this 'inaccessibility' can only have an entity along with the existence of someone seeking the attribute of him in whom it dwells. So his station and presence are guarded against a seeker reaching it.

The Laws (sharâ'i') based on wisdom (hikamî) and government policy (siyâsî) that become manifest in the form of divine Laws (al-sharâ'i' al-ilâhiyya) do not possess this inaccessible help.⁷⁷ It belongs exclusively to the possessor of the divine revealed Law. Reality embraces both ⁷² As is well known, the 'abrogation' of the previous religions by the Qur'an is one of the basic arguments of exoteric Muslims who want to prove the superiority of Islam.

⁷³ Here allusion is made to two hadîths. The first, 'Were Moses alive, he would find it impossible not to follow me,' is not found in the standard sources; while the second, in which the Prophet says he was given the 'all-comprehensive words', is considered sound. Cf. Sufi Path pp. 239ff.

Laws, the divine Law and that based on wisdom and government policy. Hence he who possesses the Shari'a - i.e. the person of faith - kneels only before the Verifier, who possesses the Reality, that the latter may explain to him the source of every Law within the Divine Presence.⁷⁸ None knows this but the Possessor of the Reality. That is why this waystation is called 'the Shari'a's Kneeling Before the Reality', since every Law seeks the Reality, since it is the inward dimension of every Law, while the Laws are its outward forms in the visible world. Hence there has been no community without a warner who established its government policy for the sake of the subsistence of its best interest. Whether the Law is divine or based on government policy, the best interest is achieved through it in the generation within which it becomes manifest.

Now that you have come to distinguish the waystation of the Shari'a from that of the Reality - and to this is devoted one of the earlier chapters of this book⁷⁹ - let us mention the sciences comprised within this waystation:⁸⁰

Among these is the science of one specific banner of praise and its names, and the science of the property of this banner's mercy upon the world under it.

Among them is the science of the interrelationships (munâsabât) which put formal things into order among themselves so that the entities of certain forms may be established which would not become manifest without this order (intizâm). These are the forms which give to the observer the knowledge of their very essence.

Within this waystation is the science of giving knowledge through the waymarks (a'lâm) set upon the path for the travellers upon it so that they will not go astray from their goal, which is the ultimate end of their path.

Within it is the science of the kinds of provisions (rizq), since these are diverse in keeping with the diversity of those who are provided.

Within it is the science of the profit of the reports (akhbâr) through expressions which are given by the contexts of the situations. Is knowledge through that report acquired from the report, from the contexts (qarâ'in) of the situations, or from the totality? Or, is the knowledge given by the context of the situation different from the knowledge given by the report? Or, are the two brought together in one place and not brought together in another?

Within it is the science of the difference between the taking enjoyment (istimtâ') which occurs through understanding and [that which occurs through] something else; and the difference between him who is 'he is he' and him who is 'as if he were he' (Qur'an 27:42).

Within it is the science of the recompense (jazâ') specific to each one who is recompensed.

Within it is the science of the general science whose ultimate end (ghâya) is works, and another whose ultimate end is not works.

Within it is the science of the relationship of the cosmos to the Real in a specific way.

Within it is the science of the sciences which are produced by reflective thoughts (afkâr) within the hearts of the reflective thinkers.

Within it is the science of the stipulation of blessings (taqrîr al-ni'am).

Within it is the science of that for which the cosmos was created and of the cause for that which has come between it and that for which it was created, even while that for which it was created is known, and there is nothing stronger than knowledge, since it possesses all-encompassing-ness. Hence the resistance of the cosmos lies within the compass of knowledge. So from whence does it come?

⁷⁹ Ibn al-'Arabi probably has in mind Chapter 263, 'On the true knowledge of the Reality,' much of which is translated in Sufi Path (see index of sources).

Within it is the science distinguishing between him who is one of the people of the command (amr) and him who is not.

Within it is the science of the ontological, all-pervading friendship (walâya) through which the wrongdoers are friends of one another, the people of faith are friends of one another, and God is the friend of the people of faith (mu'minîn), since He is the Faithful (mu'min). So from whence is He the friend of the self-protectively pious (muttaqîn), since He is not described by self-protective piety (taqwâ)? Or, is He described by self-protective piety in the respect that He takes the jinn and mankind as a protection (wiqâya) through which He protects Himself from the ascription to Him of blameworthy attributes, both in common usage and according to the Law? Hence these attributes are ascribed to the jinn and mankind, who are the protection through which He protects Himself against this ascription. So He is the friend of the self-protectively pious in respect of His being self-protectively pious. Since He is their friend, there is none but the self-protectively pious. This is good news from God to everyone concerning the all-inclusiveness of mercy and help against wrath, for God is the Friend, the Helper. So understand!

Within it is the science of the levels (marâtib) in relation to the Law specifically, not the levels required by existence.

Within it is the science of the Greatest God (al-ilâh al-a'zam) who laid down as law taking gods (âliha) other than God (Allah).

Within it is the science of bewilderment (hayrah) over that concerning which you have certain knowledge. Knowledge is the opposite of bewilderment in an object of knowledge, so what can have caused your bewilderment, given your knowledge?

Within it is the science of the negation of guidance (hidâya) from the cosmos, in spite of His words, '[He created man,] He taught him the explication' (Qur'an 55:4), and that is guidance itself.

Within it is the science that distinguishes Time (al-dahr) from time (al-zamân).

Within it is the science of the middlemost bringing together (jam'). For bringing together becomes manifest in three locations: in the taking at the Covenant (akhdh al-mîthâq), in the barzakh between this world and the next, and in the bringing together in the Uprising after death. There is no all-inclusive bringing together after this, since after the Resurrection each abode is independent along with its inhabitants. Hence the worlds of mankind and the jinn never again come together after this bringing together.

Within it is the science of the sects (nihal) and the creeds (umam) and the science of the all-inclusiveness of the rational speech (nutq) pervading the whole cosmos. Rational speech is not the specific characteristic of man as imagined by those who make his constituting differentia the fact that he is a rational animal. Unveiling does not allow that man possess this definition exclusively. Man is defined specifically by the Divine Form. He who does not possess this definition is not a man. Rather he is an animal whose form resembles the outward appearance of man. So seek a definition for the one who has this description, just as you seek it for the other animals!

Within it is the science of the reality of abrogation (naskh). Does it or does it not happen among entities - so that it is then called metamorphosis (maskh) - just as it happens among [religious] rulings (ahkâm)?

Within it is the science of the levels of triumph (fawz) - for there is a non-delimited triumph, a triumph delimited by I-ness ?, and one delimited by tremendousness ('azama) - as well as [the science] of what is the definition of each of them.

Within it is the science of rightful claims (istihqâq).

Within it is the science of certainty, knowledge, conjecture, ignorance, doubt, and consideration.

Within it is the science distinguishing between the property of witnessing (shuhûd) and the property of knowledge.

Within it is the science of the one with whom God is not pleased - if He has mercy upon him, He does not have mercy upon him out of good pleasure (ridâ) - and of the difference between the object of mercy along with good pleasure and the object of mercy without good pleasure; and of where the stations of each of the two are located within the two abodes.

Within it is the science of magnificence (kibriyâ) and invincibility (jabarût). When will their all-pervadingness in the cosmos become manifest such that it will be recognized exactly? Right now it is manifest, but only a few people know it. 'And God speaks the truth, and He guides on the way' (Qur'an 33:4).

Ibn 'Arabi and the Spirituality of Everyday Life

Presented at the Eleventh Annual Gathering of the Threshold Society

By Dr. James Morris

Preface

by Kabir Helminski:

Years ago Threshold Books published What the Seeker Needs, translated by Shaikh Tosun Bayrak al-Jerrahi. At the time it was not clear to us that that text was as much interpretation and commentary as translation. It incorporated an Ottoman commentary on the text as if it were part of Ibn Arabi's own words, thereby setting Shaykh Al Akbar's surprisingly universal text into a more parochial perspective. Here and now James Morris presents us with a translation of the original text without added commentary. We hope that it will be useful for sincere spiritual seekers.

Ibn 'Arabi on Our Discovery of 'Revelation' (shar')

Ibn 'Arabi's 'Book of the Quintessence' is so condensed that almost each line deserves further commentary. However, since he so often refers here-with intentional and very pointed ambiguity-to what is given or even 'said' to the seeker by 'revealed prescription' (shar'), it is very important to understand how broadly, but also very individually, he understands the actual reality/process to which that central term corresponds. The following famous passage is a particularly detailed and important expression of this understanding which is at the very foundation of all his writing:

Now you must know that if a human being (al-insan) renounces their (own personal) aims, takes a loathing to their animal self (nafs) and instead prefers their Sustainer/Teacher (rabb), then the Real will give (that human being) a form of divine guidance in exchange for the form of their carnal self... so that they walk in garments of Light. And (this form) is the Sharia of their prophet and the Message of their messenger. Thus that (human being) receives from their Lord what contains their happiness-and some people see (this divine guidance) in the form of their prophet, while some see it in the form of their (spiritual) state.

In the former case, he continues, 'that (form) is the inner reality of that prophet and his spirit, or the form of an angel like him, (who) knows his sharia from God.... And we ourselves have often received in this way the form of many things among the divinely revealed judgments (ahkam shar'iya) which we had not learned about from the learned or from books. For if the form is not that of (that person's) prophet, then it still necessarily refers to their spiritual state or to the stage of the shar' with regard to that moment and that (particular) situation in which (that person) saw that vision....'

And even in that instance, 'apart from what is forbidden or enjoined (by the Sharia), there is no restriction on what (that person) accepts from (that vision), whether with regard to beliefs or other things-for God's Presence includes the totality of beliefs (jami' al-'aqa'id).'

The Book of What is Essential, Concerning What Is Indispensable For the Spiritual Seeker

Translated by James Morris

You asked, O seeker, about the essential core of what the seeker must do, so I have answered you in these pages. And it is God Who brings to fulfillment-there is no Rabb but Him!

Know, O seeker-may God bring you and us to the fulfillment of willingly obeying Him, and may He cause us and you to know what pleases Him!-that (our) closeness to God is only known through His informing us of that. Now He has already done that-all thanks and praise be to God!-through His sending the Messengers and sending down the Scriptures and making clear the Paths leading to the eternal bliss. So once we have faith and hold (this) to be true, there only remains putting into practice (a) those actions regarding which one has faith, and (b) through applying the revelation (shar') in its appropriate place, with regard to what has become established in the souls of those who have faith.

[2.] Then after that, o seeker, you should have faith in the Messengers-may God's blessings be upon them-and in what they have brought (from God) and what they have informed us about Him...

Next, you should accept and acknowledge the people of this Path, with regard to all the stories that are recounted about them (i.e., their qualities and accomplishments) and with regard to everything you see from them which the (ordinary) mind and (worldly) knowledge cannot encompass. In general, you should hold a good opinion of everyone, and your heart should be at peace with them. You should pray specially, in secret, for the people of faith. And you should serve the poor, recognizing their excellence and nobility in that they are content with your helping them, and in their bearing patiently with their discomforts and troubles and difficulties.

except for remembering/mentioning God (dhikr Allah), reciting the Noble Qur'an, guiding in the right way someone who's gone astray, exhorting to do what is right and forbidding what is wrong, reconciling those who are disputing, and encouraging acts of charity-indeed every form of good.

[4.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is searching for someone who is right for you, who will help you to (attain) what you are pursuing and to (pursue) the way leading there. For the person of faith means a great deal to his brother, [alluding to such hadith as "the person of faith is the mirror of the person of faith," etc.] And take care to avoid the company of the person who is fundamentally opposed (to your quest).

[5.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is a master and spiritual guide (shaykh, murshid). Now (with regard to finding such a guide), inner sincerity of intention (sidq) is the very watchword of the spiritual seeker, because if the seeker is truly sincere with God, He will turn every (outward) "satan" for that person into an angel guiding them directly to the good; and He will inspire in that person (the awareness of) what is good. For inner sincerity is the ultimate Elixir (the "perfect cure"), one that can only be applied to the heart of our essential being.

[6.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is seeking out this (licit) source of support (luqma: literally, sustaining "morsel" of food), since the very foundation of this Path is a licit livelihood. The pillar of this Path rests on that foundation (of right livelihood): do not burden anyone, and do not accept (inappropriately) from anyone, but earn your own living. And always be attentively conscientious about what you acquire, and about what you say, see, hear and all your other actions.

[7.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is eating little. For hunger brings about an increase in spiritual energy for following God, while it takes away spiritual laziness.

[8.] You should properly cultivate and fill the moments of the night and the day:

[10.] And if you are among those who know how to read, then make it your duty to pray (in addition) a full section of the Qur'an from the written text. In each chapter, ask and inquire (of God) what you ought to ask about, and try to figure out the special relevance (for your immediate case: the i'tibar) of each verse. Continually reflect and meditate on each verse, (to come to understand) what is its relevance and applicability, what those (divine?) Attributes are indicating (to you): reflect on those (Attributes) you have and those which you are missing. Then-give Him thanks for those which you have and those which you haven't (yet) realized! And when you read about the attributes of the hypocrites and those who reject (God), then reflect as to whether or not some of those attributes are also in you.

[11.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is that you should observe and take account of your carnal soul (muhasabat al-nafs) and pay close attention to your inner thoughts and impulses (khawatir) at every moment of time. After doing so, you should feel shame in your heart before God. For if you are ashamed before God, then He will prevent your heart from experiencing a thought or impulse that is contrary to the revelation (shar') or from carrying out any action displeasing to Him/Right (al-Haqq).

Indeed we once had a master who would record his actions (during the day) in a notebook, and then when night came he would set them out before him and take an account of his carnal soul according to what was noted there. And I added to my master's practice by recording my inner thoughts and impulses as well.

[12.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is continually being aware of (the correspondence between) one's inner thoughts and impulses and the (spiritual demands of) every moment of time....

And if you start to do a religiously prescribed act that brings you closeness (to God), don't tell yourself that you will be alive after that to do something else. Instead, make that your last action in this world, the one in which you will encounter your Lord! For if you do that, you will be released (or completed: khalas)-and with that release comes (God's) acceptance.

[13.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is that you should always sit down in a state of Purity. So when you become impure, purify yourself....

[14.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is to seek to realize the noble virtues of character (makarim al-akhlaq).

[15.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is to keep away from those who are open enemies [literally "opposites," addad: the stress of this term is on the opposition of ends, not on outward relations, beliefs or emotional states of mind.] and those who are not of your (spiritual) like-but without your holding them to be evil, or even ever having such a thought occur to you! Instead, (what is essential is) having your intention (niyct) on keeping company with the Truly Real and His people, and having your preference be for them.

[16.] Likewise, you should treat these animals with loving sympathy and compassion (rahma) for them, because they are among those whom God has caused to be of service (or "subjugated": taskhir) to you. So don't impose on them (work) that is beyond their capacity, and do not mount (or "load") those of them you mount heedlessly.

Likewise with regard to whatever slaves your right hand possesses, because they are your brothers and God has only let you control them so that He can see how you treat them. For you are His slave! So whatever way you would like Him to treat you, then do precisely that with your own male and female servants. Indeed God will surely requite you (accordingly), so whatever evil and ugly deeds you would love to have Him pass over in your account, act precisely that same way with regard to them. For all (creatures) are God's family, and you are a member of that whole Family. If you have a child... oblige them to observe the appropriate behavior of the revealed Path (adab al-shari'd) and the character traits of true Religion. Induce them to kindness and non-attachment (to this world, zuhd) from infancy onward, so that they become habituated to those qualities. And don't encourage desires and cravings in their heart, but rather diminish the attractions of the life of this world..... But don't do any of that out of stinginess with your money or property!

[17.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is that you shouldn't even come near the gates of the powers-that-be (al-sultan), nor should you keep company with those who are competing and striving for (the things of) this world, since they will distract your heart from God. But if something should force you to keep their company, then behave toward them with frank good counsel (nasihd), and don't try to fool them (by pretending to agree with them). For (in reality) you are (always) doing business with the Truly Real, and whatever you do (i.e., as long as it is for God's sake), they will be made to be of service to you through (their impact on) your wider spiritual situation. Therefore always keep your intention directed toward God, (knowing that) He will deliver you from the situation you are in through the means that are best for you with regard to your true Religion.

[18.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is to always be present with God-may He be exalted!-in all of your actions and all your states of rest. [NB: note that this saying is approximately halfway through the whole treatise.]

[19.] Among what is indispensable for the seeker is to always be giving, whether you have much or little, whether you are in straightened circumstances or at ease.

[20.] You must restrain your anger. For that is a sign of the breadth of capacity of your heart.

Now when you restrain your anger, you please the All-Compassionate (al-Rahman).... You have also brought delight to the heart of the person from whom you withheld your anger, by not requiting them in kind for their (originally offending) action. And that can be a cause of their returning to what is right and just and recognizing their own unjust and offensive treatment of you; indeed they may even repent for what happened as a result of their behavior.

So you must know the right ways to receive and welcome (offense and hostility), and strive to take on that character trait.... So struggle (to realize) the qualities (of Mercifulness and Compassion), since they give rise to love and affection in people's hearts. Thus the Prophet already ordered us to practice mutual affection and to love one another. And this (i.e., restraining one's anger) is one of the highest of the causes helping to realize Love.

[21.] You must practice ihsan (doing/creating what is good and beautiful), for that is a sign of your shame (or "conscience": haya') before God, and of the glorification of God in the heart of the person who is muhsin. For Gabriel said [in the famous hadith on the 3 aspects of true ReligionA/w]: "What is ihsan? And the Prophet-may God's blessings and peace be upon him!-replied: "It is that you should worship/serve God as though you see Him. For even if you don't see Him, He sees you!"....

[22.] You must practice dhikr (remembering God) and asking His Forgiveness. For (asking His forgiveness) after you've sinned effaces and removes it, while doing so after you've been willingly obedient and done good (ihsan) brings "light upon light" and joy upon joy. As for dhikr, that unifies the (scattered) heart and purifies your inner thoughts and intentions...

[23.] You must strive to loosen the knot of persistence and stubborn insistence (on opposing God: israr) in your heart.

[24.] You must remain cautiously conscious of God (taqwa), both with regard to your inner life and outwardly....

[25.] You must avoid spiritual self-deception (ightirar), which is when your carnal soul deludes you concerning God's graciousness and forbearance, while you are still persisting in your sinful-disobedience.

[26.] You must practice spiritual conscientiousness (wara'), which is an intuitive avoiding (of something wrong, illicit, etc.) that you feel in your heart (sadr). The Prophet-may God bless him and give him peace!-said: "Abandon what disturbs you for what does not disturb you." So even if you are in need of that (which disturbs you) and you can't find anything to replace it, then leave that (need) to God: He will provide you in exchange with what is better than that.... For this conscientiousness (wara') is the very foundation of true Religion. So as you begin to apply it in practice, your actions will become purified, your conditions (inner and outer) will become successful, your words will become perfected, blessings of divine grace (karamat) will hasten toward you, and you will be protected and preserved by a divine protection in everything you do, without any doubt. By God, by God, my brother! (Practice) conscientiousness, conscientiousness!

[27.] And you must practice non-attachment (zuhd) regarding this world, reducing your desire for it.... And Praise be to God, the Lord of the Worlds! And God's blessings and peace be upon our master Muhammad and His Family and Companions!

Ibn al-Qayyim's Kitāb al-Rūḥ

Some Literary Aspects

Y. Tzvi Langermann

1. Preface: An Essay in Progress

This project originally grew out of my interest in some early medieval discussions whose purpose is to distinguish between the two concepts, nafs and rūḥ.¹ Each of the two terms carries a variety of psychological, medical, and metaphysical or religious meanings; some of the earliest writers in Arabic on science and philosophy, such as Qusṭā b. Lūqā (d. 300/912–913) and Isaac Israeli (d. ca. 343/955), perceived a need to sort matters out in special monographs. I was drawn to Ibn al-Qayyim's Kitāb al-Rūḥ because it is a vast repository of information, much of it drawn from early sources. As I studied Ibn al-Qayyim's book more closely, my interests expanded, and some additional topics suggested themselves; one study has already appeared. However, it also became increasingly clearer that there are some basic literary issues that must be dealt with. Though I have no reason to doubt that Ibn al-Qayyim authored the materials that make up the book (as we shall see, some do question its authenticity), I do not believe that Ibn al-Qayyim intended to present this book to his audience in the form in which it now circulates. I am more and more convinced that the book that has been such a resounding success was left unfinished by its author.

Kitāb al-Rūḥ is without doubt Ibn al-Qayyim's most successful book, if we measure success in terms of printings, circulation, and so forth. Birgit Krawietz has called it "a real best-seller" and adds that it "gained him a reputation even in circles opposed to him other ways.”² It was first printed in Hyderabad, by the Dāʿirat al-maʿārif al-nizāmiyya, in 1318/1900–1901, then again by that same institution in 1324/1906/07 and 1357/1938–1939. For the purposes of this study I have used the most recent version, put out by Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Makkī, and published by Maktabat Nazār Muṣṭafā al-Bāz, Mecca, 1425/2004. I have also consulted the second and third Hyderabad printings, the Cairo printing (Maktabat Naṣīr, 1979), and most of the manuscripts as well.³

As far as I know, only two studies on this important book have been published. The very rich article of D. B. Macdonald on the notion of “spirit” in Islam, published in 1931 and cited by Carl Brockelmann in his entry on Kitāb al-Rūḥ, devotes a considerable amount of space to the book of Ibn al-Qayyim.⁴ Four years later, Francis T. Cooke published a paper devoted entirely to Kitāb al-Rūḥ.⁵ The two studies differ considerably. Macdonald exploits a great number of sources, ranging from pre-Islamic literature to the Egyptian press of the early twentieth century; his article supplies rich annotations to the secondary literature available at the time. Cooke, by contrast, limits his focus exclusively to Kitāb al-Rūḥ, and his study has no footnotes.

On the other hand, both articles share an important common feature: both authors choose to concentrate upon Ibn al-Qayyim because the views he expresses have become dominant in Islam. In other words, whoever wishes to understand what Muslims think about “spirit” had better know what Ibn al-Qayyim says in Kitāb al-Rūḥ. Macdonald observes,

A good statement and study of the position of the corporeal school, which is undoubtedly the fundamental position of orthodox Islam, is to be found in the Kitāb al-Rūḥ of Ibn al-Qayyim al-Djawzīya [...] its influence has not been simply among Ḥanbalites and Wahhābites.⁶

Calverley) avers, the entry on nafs in the second edition of the EI (which incorporates the discussion of rūḥ as well) is heavily dependent upon Macdonald.

Cooke puts it this way: “Ibn al-Qayyim’s view of al-rūḥ and al-nafs is important, for it represents the belief of the great majority of Muslims to the present day.”⁷

It seems, then, that the concerns of scholarship have come full circle, at least for some, or in some way. Macdonald and Cooke were interested primarily in understanding the contemporary Muslim mind, if I may phrase it that way. Indeed, Macdonald caps his essay with some observations, and impassioned pleas, about the situation in his own day.⁸ He opines that the “nexus of ideas and hypotheses” found in the authors covered in his study – some 25 in addition to Ibn al-Qayyim – represent “the creative religious thought of Islam.” However, this thought “must fight for its life against western influences in education and general civilization which are specifically non-philosophical or materialistic and mechanical in their philosophy.” Moreover, another, even more pernicious element from the West has entered into the fray: “modern spiritism.” Macdonald bemoans the fact that Islam, unlike the West, is not endowed with any such “preliminary prejudice against spiritual manifestations as exists with us.” Hence the danger that spiritism may latch on to the type of ghost stories found, i. a., in the book of Ibn al-Qayyim, and gain thereby legitimacy among Muslims.

For many decades after the appearance of these two studies, it seems that western scholarship on Islamic thought abandoned the concerns expressed by Macdonald and Cooke; research was motivated by an intrinsic interest in the history and transmission of philosophical, religious, and scientific thought, without any abiding worry about “understanding” Muslims or Islam. In recent years, all that has changed, for better or for worse.

2. Manuscripts and Epitomes

Kitāb al-Rūḥ has never been properly edited. The many printings, as far as I can tell, all derive from the original Hyderabad issue. It is not known which manuscript was used for that version; the manuscripts known to exist in European and American libraries were almost certainly not consulted. Moreover, Kitāb al-Rūḥ has spawned a small satellite literature, mainly in the form of epitomes, and these have not been surveyed. In the following section I present some information about copies that I have seen.

The following manuscript copies of the complete work have come to my attention. The first five are listed by Carl Brockelmann.⁹ I have examined, in part or in their entirety, all but the Princeton manuscript:

- Escorial, Derenbourg 1590, dated 798/1395–1396
- Escorial, Derenbourg 1592
- Escorial, Derenbourg 699, dated 920/1514
- London, British Library, India Office Loth 172
- Vienna, Austrian National Library, Cod. Mixt. 186 (= Flügel 1533)
- Leiden, Or. 3001, dated 1204
- Princeton, Yahuda 3866, ff., 194a–302a, Rajab 1058/1648¹⁰

This list is certainly not complete. The Salafi scholar Mashhūr Salmān owns a manuscript; see below. One would presume that the Hyderabad printing was made from a manuscript found in an Indian library, but I have not been able to learn which.

The earliest dated exemplar is Escorial 1590,¹¹ which was copied just one generation after Ibn al-Qayyim's demise in 1350, and well before the times of al-Biqā'ī (d. 1480), who, as we shall see, may have authored the preface to the printed version of Kitāb al-Rūḥ.

The colophon to the Leiden manuscript indicates that that text has been abbreviated from the twelfth mas'ala onwards.¹² I have looked at the final few folios of this manuscript, and they display the full text; hence the intention of the colophon remains to be established. Another manuscript at Leiden, Or. 12.055, has, beginning on f. 98b, a treatise entitled Fī Taḥqīq al-rūḥ, said to be extracted (lakhkhaṣṭuhu) from Ibn al-Qayyim's Kitāb al-Rūḥ. "Extracts" from Kitāb al-Rūḥ are found in three other Yahudah manuscripts now at Princeton: 336Y, 38b-43a; 976Y, 147b-163b; 2798Y, 32a-41b. I have no information about these remains of the text.

The opening folios of the India Office manuscript appear to have undergone serious damage since it was described by Otto Loth well over a century ago.¹³ The manuscript comprises 331 folios, which obviously contained much more than Kitāb al-Rūḥ as we know it. It bears the longish title, Kitāb fī al-Kalām 'alā al-rūḥ al-arwāḥ fī taḥqīq aḥwāl mā ba'd al-mawt wal-ākhirā wal-barzakāh. Loth of course had no printed version with which to compare his manuscript; nonetheless he indicated the India Office has some materials in addition to Ibn al-Qayyim's book. Loth further observes that "by mistake" only nineteen queries are counted in this manuscript.¹⁴ There certainly was some oversight on the part of the copyist, who gave the seventh query the number five, even though the fifth query had already been correctly numbered earlier on. As we shall see in the following section, the preface in this copy is particularly interesting, though it too is now in a sorry condition.

Several epitomes of Kitāb al-Rūḥ are known.¹⁵ A small (eight pages) manuscript found at al-Azhar (no. 302737) and available online¹⁶ contains an epitome of the entire text by one Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad b. Rakīn. Ibn Rakīn limits himself to the question posed in the title of each of the 21 queries that make up Kitāb al-Rūḥ; nearly all of the numerous proof-texts and sources are omitted, as well as the fuṣūl that are found in most of the queries and which treat of diverse issues, closely or distantly related to the question posed at the beginning of the ma'sala. For the most part he is interested in the spirits of the dead, their fate after leaving the body, and the implications for the legal and religious status of the graveyard. Interestingly enough, though, he does devote a good deal of space to the numerous theories displayed in response to the 19th query, which asks, “What is the true reality (ḥaqīqa) of the soul (nafs)?” This is the most philosophical section of Kitāb al-Rūḥ. As we shall see in the next section, there are reports of an abridged version prepared by Burhān al-Dīn al-Biqāʿī.

15 Derenbourg, in his description of Escorial 699 (Catalogue, I, pp. 495–496), calls MS Escorial 1591, which is a copy of Ibn al-Qayyim's Hādī al-arwāḥ, an abrégé of Kitāb al-Rūḥ. This is incorrect. Hādī al-arwāḥ covers the whole slate of issues connected to al-janna, and it has little if anything to do with the topics covered in Kitāb al-Rūḥ.

3. The Preface to Kitāb al-Rūḥ

The printed versions of Kitāb al-Rūḥ all carry an introduction that is clearly not written by the author, but rather penned by someone else, who observes that the book simply plunges into the topic with a series of queries and replies.¹⁷ Kitāb al-Rūḥ clearly stands in need of an introduction, and, therefore, the anonymous prefacer will supply it. Most printings have a note to the passage, indicating that the preface was supplied later by Burhān al-Dīn al-Biqāʿī. The most extensive and penetrating footnote is found in the third Hyderabad printing (1357 A. H.):

You will learn in the course of this address [to the reader] that is not from the pen of Ibn al-Qayyim. Perhaps it is from the pen of al-Biqāʿī. For in Kashf al-Zunūn, after mention is made of Ibn al-Qayyim’s Kitāb al-Rūḥ, are these words: ‘It was epitomized by Burhān al-Dīn Ibrāhīm bin ‘Umar al-Biqāʿī, and he called it Sirr al-rūḥ. He died in the year 885/[1480–1481]. The incipit is, al-ḥamd lil-lāh al-muttaṣif bi-ṣifāt al-kamāl, etc.’ It seems as if the author of Kashf al-Zunūn had some misgivings, so he claimed that al-Biqāʿī epitomized the book of Ibn al-Qayyim.¹⁸ It appears that al-Biqāʿī only supplied the book of Ibn al-Qayyim with this preface. It is as if on his own he called it Sirr al-rūḥ, because Ibn al-Qayyim did not give a name to his book. It rather became known as Kitāb al-Rūḥ, because it is a book about the meaning of rūḥ. This [title] then became widely known. God only knows!¹⁹

The anonymous Hyderabad editor picked up the uncertainty of Ḥājji Khalifa, who, so he understands, noticed that the preface is not by Ibn al-Qayyim, and therefore decided that the book that reached us is 17 The web version, available for download at www.al-mostafa.com (accessed April 4, 2010), carries no introduction at all. This has not been scanned from any printing, but rather copied out from one of the printings; I presume that the webmaster(s) decided to dispense with the introduction.

al-Biqā'ī's epitome, known as Sirr al-rūḥ ('The Secret of the Soul'). The Hyderabad editor disagrees, apparently (he does not tell us) because there are no internal grounds for questioning the authenticity of Ibn al-Qayyim's authorship. Instead he suggests that al-Biqā'ī merely added the preface.

Note also the remarks about the title in this learned footnote: Ibn al-Qayyim gave the book no title. Eventually, it became known as Kitāb al-Rūḥ simply because that seemed to the most appropriate title, given the book's contents. Sirr al-rūḥ is not an epitome, according to the writer of this erudite note, but rather the title suggested, unsuccessfully as it turns out, by al-Biqā'ī. In fact, as we shall see, Ibn al-Qayyim mentions more than one title because, as we shall claim, parts of the book were originally intended as independent essays.²⁰

There are other difficulties as well with the anonymous preface. Its author states that this is the first book devoted to the topic of rūḥ, but this seems not to be the case. For example, Ibn al-Qayyim himself cites early on p. 35 a Kitāb al-Nafs wal-rūḥ by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥāfiẓ.

Of the manuscripts that I have seen, only the copy in Vienna displays the preface found in the printed edition.²¹ Two of the Escorial manuscripts, nos. 699 and 1592, as well as the copy found at Leiden, have an introduction written in the first person. It purports to be from the pen of Ibn al-Qayyim himself, for all that I can tell, it indeed is. I publish the Arabic text and an English translation as the final section of this study.

Beyond the standard pious remarks of belief and devotion, Ibn al-Qayyim's preface contains only a citation, interspersed with occasional explanations and expansions, from Sūrat al-Mu'minūn (Koran 23:12–14), which describes the formation of the human being. In fact the very same verses are cited, along with much the same commentary, in the introduction to Ibn al-Qayyim's Tuhfat al-mawdūd.²²

20 Nonetheless, the Hyderabad printing carries a very long title, beginning: Kitāb al-Rūḥ fī al-kalām 'alā arwāḥ al-amwāt ... Some manuscripts well have title pages displaying a longish title; in general, we have not paid attention to these in this study.

21 This manuscript has a heavily annotated title page which, however, is quite damaged, and I have not reaped any information from it for the present study. In fact, the Vienna copy has more marginalia and corrections than the others, and for that reason alone it would repay further study.

22 Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya, Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad: Tuhfat al-mawdūd, ed. by Muḥammad 'Alī Abū al-'Abbās, Cairo 1988, p. 10.

Why are these verses, and their proper interpretation, so important for Ibn al-Qayyim? I believe that the answer lies in the fourth query of Ibn Ḥanbal's (d. 241/855) al-Radd 'alā al-zanādiqa wal-jahmiyya, a formative text for the Ḥanbalī school.²³ In that query, Ibn Ḥanbal answers the complaint of the heretics that the Koran has a confused, if not self-contradictory, account of the creation of man: in different verses he is said to have been made from earth (turāb), clay (tīn), choicest clay (sulāla), mud (ḥamā), or dry clay (ṣalṣāl). Ibn Ḥanbal replies that the Koran's account is completely consistent; the different materials mentioned refer to different stages in the formation of man, beginning with earth, the fundamental constituent of the human body, and culminating with the drop of sperm (the Koran's sulāla), by means of which the human race propagates itself. The polemical edge to this account was probably lost by Ibn al-Qayyim's day. Nonetheless, Ibn al-Qayyim may well have wanted to remind his readers of the consistent and full description of man's creation found in the Koran, much along the lines that the Shaykh of his madhhab had established.

Two manuscripts have other texts in lieu of the preface printed in the Hyderabad editions. Escorial 1590 exhibits at the beginning a brief biography (tarjama) of Ibn al-Qayyim, taken from an unidentified source. The India Office manuscript has, or should I say had, an extensive preface; in the present state of the manuscript, I cannot say whether it purports to be written by Ibn al-Qayyim himself. The opening page is now torn and damaged, and the photocopies that I received are barely legible. Loth, however, copied out this opening sentence, which differs from any of the other prefaces I have seen:

"Praise to God, Who raises in esteem whosoever obeys Him, and humbles whosoever transgresses His command and disobeys Him..."²⁴

The end of the preface is legible; I copy out here the final few lines:

فلم يزل صلى الله عليه وسلم مشهراً في ذات الله لا يرده عنه راد صادعاً بامر له لا يصده عنه صاد حتى طلع فجر الايمان واشرق شمس التوحيد والعرفان وسارت دعوته مسيرة الشمس في الاقطار وبلغ دينه ما بلغ الليل والنهار فصلى الله عليه وعلى آله الطيبين الطاهرين صلوة دائمة بدوام السموات والارضين وسلم وبارك

23 Ibn Ḥanbal's tract has been published several times, and it is available on the web as well. The most widely available version is found in the edition by 'Alī Sāmī al-Nashshār, Alexandria 1971.

He continued – may the prayer of God and peace be upon him – to proclaim the essence of God. No opponent could stop him. [He continued] to execute His order, and no resister could restrain him, until the dawn of belief rose, and the sun of unicity and gnosis (irfān) shone. His call moved along like the sun to the ends of the earth, so that his creed reached what day and night have reached.²⁵ So may the prayer of God be upon him and his kinsfolk, good and pure, an eternal prayer, as eternal as the heavens and earths, and peace and blessing.²⁶

It seems, then, that the preface found in the Hyderabad edition, which so exercised the anonymous editor, is a fluke of whatever manuscript was used for that edition. The Hyderabad printing, unfortunately, gives no information about the manuscript or manuscripts that were utilized. Presumably the manuscript(s) are found in Indian libraries.²⁷ However, the fact that the same preface reappears in all subsequent printings, rather than the authentic preface by Ibn al-Qayyim, proves that all subsequent printings derive from the Hyderabad version. None of the later “editors” seems to have gone to the trouble of checking manuscripts.

4. The Composite Nature of Kitāb al-Rūḥ

In the opening section of this paper I suggested that Kitāb al-Rūḥ was left unfinished by Ibn al-Qayyim. It is my opinion that he intended to form the book out of several essays that he had written, suitably edited and sutured together. He did not finish this project, and the textus receptus reveals signs of the composite and unpolished state that it was left in. The most important clue to this state of affairs is found in Ibn al-Qayyim's reference, within Kitāb al-Rūḥ, to another writing of his, which he calls “our large book on knowing the spirit and the soul” (kitābunā al-kabīr fī mārifat al-rūḥ wal-nafs). Specifically, he 25 Just like the nycthemeron encompasses the entire earth, so also has Islam spread throughout the world.

26 Ms India Office, Loth, Catalogue, 172, f. 3b.

asserts²⁸ that he will there provide “more than one hundred proofs” in favour of the view of the Sunna that the spirits that depart from the body are “self-standing entities that rise up and go down, join and disengage, etc.”.²⁹ Scholars have noticed this passage and speculated as to the meaning of the reference.³⁰ However, as far as I know, no one has realized that the discussion Ibn al-Qayyim refers to there is found in maʿāla 19 of Kitāb al-Rūḥ. One finds in that chapter 100 proofs for the assertion that “humanity” is “a body different in its quiddity from sensible body, [and also] luminous, supernal, etc.”. The terminology is of course quite different from that found in the cross-reference, but the idea is very much the same: spirit, soul, the essence of humanity, whatever one wishes to call it, is a substance, a self-standing body, different from earthly bodies, and by no means merely an “accident” (in the Aristotelian sense) of the earthly body. It may also be noticed that, as part of the very long title of the nineteenth query, one finds the following: Mā Ḥaqīqat al-naḥs...wa-bal ḥiya al-rūḥ am lā? A question of this sort is appropriate for a work entitled Fī Maʿrifat al-rūḥ wal-naḥs, and it would fit into the well-established genre of inquiries into the difference (if there is any) between the two terms. Yet this issue is not addressed in the nineteenth query. The twentieth query, however, is devoted entirely to the question, whether soul and spirit are “one thing, or two things, distinct from one another.” Whatever Ibn al-Qayyim may have intended to publish as kitābunā al-kabīr fī maʿrifat al-rūḥ wal-naḥs, large chunks of it appear to have been included in Kitāb al-Rūḥ.

The composite nature of Kitāb al-Rūḥ may also be seen, perhaps paradoxically, from the recent publication of its final section (maʿāla 21) as a separate volume by one Abū Ḥudhayfa Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad.³¹ The 21st query discusses the three souls recognized by Muslim tradition (al-ammāra, lawwāma, mutmaʿinna, respectively the commanding, the rebuking, and the serene; see the conspectus below).

29 Ibid., p. 44.

30 A reference in exactly the same words is found in Ibn al-Qayyim's Miftāḥ dār al-sāʿada; Abū Zayd takes this to be a reference to our Kitāb al-Rūḥ and therefore proof for its authenticity. In his bio-bibliography, item 48 (pp. 258–259), he lists al-Rūḥ wal-naḥs as a separate work, no copy of which is known, and which Ibn al-Qayyim refers to three times in Kitāb al-Rūḥ.

31 Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya, Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad: al-Furūq al-naḥsiyya bayn ṣifat al-naḥs al-ṭayyiba wal-khabītha, ed. by Abū Ḥudhayfa Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, Ṭantā n.d.

Abū Ḥudhayfa acknowledges that this section was not presented by Ibn al-Qayyim as an independent literary creation. Nonetheless, by publishing this section separately from the rest of the book, he in fact acknowledges that it can stand alone – and perhaps was meant to, at least when Ibn al-Qayyim first wrote it. Abū Ḥudhayfa offers a few short quotations, without comment, in which Ibn al-Qayyim refers to his writings on this subject, including the reference to the “large book” referred to above. His intent seems to be that Ibn al-Qayyim considered writing an independent book, and, if none has reached us, this section of Kitāb al-Rūḥ can serve the purpose just as well. As far as I am concerned, the point here is that, as Abū Ḥudhayfa's booklet shows, this section can indeed stand alone as a separate treatise; perhaps, then, that is how it was planned to be by Ibn al-Qayyim.

5. The Authenticity of Kitāb al-Rūḥ

The authenticity of Kitāb al-Rūḥ has been challenged in recent years, apparently on dogmatic grounds rather than on the basis of any literary or historical qualms. Information about the debate is found mostly on the internet; the relevant websites will be cited in the notes to this section.

The Saudi scholar Bakr Abū Zayd, author of several books on Ibn al-Qayyim, takes up the question of the book's authenticity. He writes:

Some students have spread the word that Kitāb al-Rūḥ of Ibn al-Qayyim is not really by him, or that he wrote it before he came into contact with shaykh al-islām, Ibn Taymiyya. This is what some tongues have spread, and this is what has reached [our] ears in various settings and investigations. I have not seen it written down in a book; perhaps something of this has been written down, but it is not easy to get hold of it.³²

Abū Zayd proceeds to refute both allegations by means of a variety of cross-references to Kitāb al-Rūḥ in other writings of Ibn al-Qayyim, numerous citations by later authors, and some stylistic and methodological considerations. Similarly he cites several references to Ibn Taymiyya in Kitāb al-Rūḥ for proof that the book was written after Ibn al-Qayyim had met his master.³³

32 Abū Zayd, Bakr: Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya. Hayātuhu āthāruhu mawāriduhu, Riyadh 2002, p. 254; <http://saaid.net/Doat/Zugail/61.htm> (accessed April 4, 2010).

The same question was taken up, and the same affirmative answer given, by Mashhūr Salmān on a Salafi website in April 2005. In order to come to a decision, Salmān studied the book closely, making use also of a manuscript in his possession. He found a cross-reference to Kitāb al-Rūḥ in yet another book of Ibn al-Qayyim, al-Tabayīn fī aqsām al-qurʾān.³⁴

It has been intimated that the late ʿAbd al-Azīz b. ʿAbd Allāh Ibn Bāz, “grand mufti” of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, was behind the allegations that the book was not written by Ibn al-Qayyim. I gather as much from the response of a Kuwaiti scholar, Sayyid Yūsuf al-Rifāʿī, a respected jurist (of the Shāfiʿī school), a Sufi leader, and a former government minister, in his “Advice to Our Brothers the Scholars of Najd”. In section 47, al-Rifāʿī says,

You accuse the Muslims who differ with you of being deviant Jahmis or Muʿtazilīs. The truth is, you are the Jahmiyya because you agree with them in some of their doctrines and you are the Muʿtazila because you concur with them in denying sainthood and saints as well as their miraculous gifts, the life of the dead, and the arbitration of reason in matters of the unseen in religious issues.

There is a footnote after the phrase, “the life of the dead”, which reads: “Hence they deny that Ibn al-Qayyim authored al-Rūḥ!”³⁵ Another website identifies “ʿAbd al-Azīz b. ʿAbd Allāh Ibn Bāz, the late (d. 1999) nescient mufti of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, government scholar par excellence, and major innovator whose influence on spreading deviant beliefs is incalculable” as the target of al-Rifāʿī’s Naṣīḥa li-ikhwāninā ʿulamāʾ najd (Advice to Our Brothers the Scholars of Najd).³⁶

34 <http://www.aqsalaf.com/vb/showthread.php?p=12052>, (accessed April 4, 2010).

35 <http://www.rifaieonline.com/advice.htm> (accessed April 4, 2010). The “life of the dead”, I presume, is a poor English rendering of the revivification of the dead. Jahm’s (d. 128/746) role here seems to be very much that of the arch-heretic. Ibn al-Qayyim (Kitāb al-Rūḥ, p. 151), beginning of 17 maṣʾala accuses the mutakallimūn who deny that spirit is created of being followers of Jahm; see also the conspectus of that query below. On Jahm and his connection to the early Muʿtazila, see Pines, Shlomo: Studies in Islamic Atomism, Jerusalem 1997, appendix A, pp. 142–150.

36 <http://answeringwhabismandsalafism.wordpress.com/2008/01/11/abd-al-aziz-ibn-abd-allah-ibn-baaz-a-concise-guide-to-another-primary-innovator-in-islam/> (accessed April 4, 2010).

I have found one fatwa (all are published online) in which Ibn Bāz takes note of Ibn al-Qayyim's leniency with regard to prayer and Koran recitation at the gravesite. The fatwa³⁷ addresses the long-standing controversy within Islam whether acts of devotion are permitted in the cemetery. The applicant has heard that Ibn Bāz forbids this, and, moreover, that the mufti has demanded that anyone who allows it should substantiate his view. To this end, the applicant writes to Ibn Bāz that he has found proof in Kitāb al-Rūḥ; Ibn Bāz responds that "whatever depends upon the sayings of individuals" carries no weight at all if it contradicts the Koran and the Sunna. Thus, rather than challenging the authenticity of Kitāb al-Rūḥ, Ibn Bāz rejects its authority, as he consistently rejects outright the right of anyone to rule against the Koran and the traditional sources of legal authority.

I am not worried about the authenticity of the book (which I see no reason to doubt). On the other hand, the allegations are of interest. Neither Abū Zayd nor Salmān intimates why the authenticity of the book has been called into question. Clearly, Ibn al-Qayyim's endorsement of practices that some groups of Muslims find to be both forbidden and reprehensible furnishes a strong incentive to deny that Ibn al-Qayyim authored Kitāb al-Rūḥ. Given Ibn al-Qayyim's very high stature within those same groups, the easiest and most logical course would be to reject the book as a forgery. However, the wide-ranging use of philosophical or scientific idiom that is employed in Kitāb al-Rūḥ may just as well have aroused the suspicion of some Salafī students (tullāb).

6. Conspectus of the Book

We have already observed that the preface found in the various printings is not found in any manuscript that we have seen. However, the basic plan of the book is the same in all the manuscripts, and it indeed conforms to the printings (similarly, spot checks of some passages against manuscripts have not revealed any differences that are worth noting here). Kitāb al-Rūḥ is divided into 21 "queries" (masā'il) of varying length. Some are subdivided into fuṣūl or contain supplementary fuṣūl on issues related to the theme of the chapter.

37 Ibid., fatwa no. 4296, Monday, 10 Rabi'a I 1429/[2008].

Here follows a list of the 21 queries, as well as some information about the contents. In order to give the reader a sense of the relative lengths of each section, I put in parentheses the page numbers in the Mecca printing that I have used for this study.

1. Are the dead aware of the visit of the living [to the cemetery] and their greeting, or are they not? (pp. 9–21)
faṣl: Additional proof from the practice of talqīn al-mayyit, “whispering” to the recently buried advice as to how the answer Nakīr and Munkar.³⁸
2. Do the spirits of the dead meet each other, visit each other, and remember each other, or not? (pp. 22–25)
3. Do the spirits of the living meet the spirits of the dead, or not? (pp. 26–39)
4. Does the spirit die, or does death appertain to the body alone? (pp. 40–43)
5. After they [the spirits] depart from the body and become denuded [of matter], by what means are they distinguished one from the other, so that they can be recognized and meet each other? And, after they have become denuded [of matter], do they take the shape of the body that they were once in, garbing themselves in its form; or [if not], then just what is their situation? (pp. 44–46)
6. Does the spirit return to the grave of the departed at the time of the interrogation, or not?³⁹ (pp. 47–66)
 Several fuṣūl take up related issues, especially the correct understanding of the “punishment of the grave” and whether it is corporeal as well.
7. The question is posed: what is our reply to the nonbeliever and heretics who deny the punishment in the grave, its wideness or narrowness;⁴⁰ that it is either a pit from among the pits of hell, or a garden from among the gardens of paradise; and that the dead neither sits nor stands in it? (pp. 67–79)

38 Nakīr and Munkar are the two angels who interrogate the newly departed in the grave.

39 The query refers to the interrogation of the newly departed about his faith, as described in the traditions cited at length by Ibn al-Qayyim.

40 According to Muslim tradition, the grave of the Muslim will be widened (allowing his body to rest in peace), but that of the hypocrite will be so narrowed that his bones will be crushed.

This chapter is divided into ten fuṣūl, which function as sub-chapters, each of which is devoted to sequentially numbered issues (umūr) related to the question posed. Ibn al-Qayyim knows that much is at stake here. The nonbelievers (al-malāḥida wal-zanādiqa), as well as “their brothers”, “the folk of invention and misdirection (ahl al-bidʿa wal-dalāl)”, i. e. philosophers and philosophically-inclined mutakallimūn, challenge all traditions that appear to be irrational. Ibn al-Qayyim addresses this core issue, as well as the specific punishments said to be meted out in the grave.

8. The question is posed: what is the wisdom in not mentioning the punishment of the grave in the Koran, though there is a strong need to know it and to believe in it, in order that one take heed and take care? (pp. 80–81)
9. The question is posed: what are the causes for punishment of those who are in the grave? (pp. 82–84)
10. The causes relieving one of the punishment of the grave. (pp. 85–89)
11. Is the interrogation in the grave [of the departed] universal, applying to Muslims, Hypocrites (munāfiqūn), and Deniers, or is it limited to Muslims and Hypocrites? (pp. 90–92)
12. Is the interrogation of Nakīr and Munkar limited to this nation [of Islam], or does it hold for others as well? (pp. 93–94)
13. Are children examined in the grave? (pp. 95–96)
14. His statement: is the punishment of the grave eternal or delimited? (pp. 97–98)
15. Where do the spirits settle in [the period] between death and the resurrection? Are they in heaven or on earth? Are they in paradise or not? Are they placed within bodies other than those that they had been in, and enjoy or suffer therein, or are they denuded [of body]? (pp. 99–124)

This is a key question in Islamic theology. Accordingly the chapter is lengthy, and, like the seventh masʿala, it is composed of many fuṣūl, each of which usually deals with one of the many opinions that have been expressed in reply to the query.

16. Do the spirits of the dead derive benefit from any effort of the living on [their behalf], or not? (pp. 125–150)
- “The living (al-ahyāʾ)” refers here to two very distinct groups: it refers to the dead, while they were alive, and it refers as well to those who survive the deceased. In the first instance, the question is this: do the dead derive any benefit from the lasting effects of good works they performed in the course of their lives, e.g., righteous children? In the second instance, the query once again raises the issue of prayers said for the deceased, or other religious acts that are performed on their behalf. In both cases, Ibn al-Qayyim answers in the affirmative, taking pains to muster the necessary proof texts as well to answer the objections that have been raised. The great bulk of the chapter is concerned with the second instance, raising such particular questions as this: can one dedicate half or quarter of a religious acts for the benefit of the deceased? The fuṣūl here function as chapters in a well-constructed essay.

17. Is spirit pre-eternal, or is it generated and created? (pp. 151–163)

Ibn al-Qayyim asserts that the spirit is created, assigning the doctrine of pre-eternality to assorted deviants and heretics.⁴¹ One faṣl displays twelve proofs for its being created; the following one answers the claim that the Koran is unclear or equivocal on this issue; and the last answers the claim the human spirit is divine, hence uncreated.

18. Are the spirits created before the bodies, or are they created only after they [the bodies] are? (pp. 164–182)

Ibn al-Qayyim leans towards the second alternative, but he far less insistent than he is in the preceding query. The scriptural and traditional evidence are weighed in several fuṣūl; the final faṣl displays the clinching proof that the spirit is created after the body.

19. What is the true reality (ḥaqīqa) of the soul? Is it one of the parts of the body, or one of its accidents, or a body living together with it (musākin lahu) lodged within, or is it a non-material (muḥarrad) substance? Are the commanding (al-ammāra) soul, the rebuking (lawwāma) soul, and the serene (muṭmaʿinna) soul [all three of them] one single soul that bears these attributes? (pp. 183–221).

I have already argued that this maṣʾala comprises an independent treatise that Ibn al-Qayyim refers to in other writings of his as kitābunā al-kabīr fī maʿrifat al-rūḥ wal-naḥs (our great book on knowing the spirit and the soul). The chapter contains much tradition and evidence for irrational (so we would say) phenomena. However, it is mainly concerned with answering the philosophical questions, especially the materiality or immateriality of spirit (or soul), in a philosophical idiom. Despite the last part of the chapter's title, there is no sustained discussion here of the three traditional "souls" (al-ammāra, lawwāma, muṭma'inna), which form instead the first topic in the 21st maṣ'ala.

41 The Jahmiyya are named here in a long citation from Ibn Taymiyya, who in turn refers to Ibn Ḥanbal's Radd. Here again we observe Ibn al-Qayyim and Ibn Taymiyya maintaining a firm and consistent line on a point of doctrine first established by Ibn Ḥanbal in his formative manifesto of Islamic belief. Note also the emphatic assertions in this query that the spirit of Jesus is created.

20. Are spirit and soul the same thing, or two different things? (pp. 222–224)

This very short chapter takes up the same questions of the very long chapter that precedes it, repeating some of the answers. It is hard to imagine it forming an independent chapter in a well-planned book. Rather, it would seem to be a short essay on the same theme of the 19th maṣ'ala; according to our hypothesis, both would then have been incorporated in the draft of Kitāb al-Rūḥ. I presume that Ibn al-Qayyim would have wanted to edit these two essays, so that they would fit together as chapters belonging to a single book.

21. Is the soul one or three? (pp. 225–270) As noted above, this chapter treats of the three souls widely recognized by Muslims. The discussion of the natures of these three souls, all of which have strong religious significance, leads Ibn al-Qayyim to write about the religious mind – for example, the "flashes" (burūq) that the faithful can hope for, the tranquillity and certainty of the true believer. The great conflict is between, on the one hand, al-muṭma'inna, which is identified with holiness, and, on the other hand, al-ammāra, which is associated with damnable thoughts and traits. However, as Ibn al-Qayyim, explains, the Muslim is not always faced with stark alternatives, one of which is clearly good and the other definitely evil. Instead, one must often face up to two aspects of a certain trait or issue, both of which may appear to be laudable, but one of which is surely wrong. "A single thing has a single form, which is split into laudable and disgraceful things; for example, joy and sorrow, regret and anger, self-respect (ghayra) which, if innately strong and fortified by the believer, leads to tranquillity and conceit, (...)" (p. 235). Consequently, most of the chapter consists of a series of fuṣūl, each of which begins wal-farq bayna and elucidates the difference between a pair of antitheses (not necessarily those listed in the sentence just cited).

Hence the great bulk of this very lengthy chapter is an essay on morals. Rūḥ is not discussed here at all; the connection with the theme of the book is by way of the three "souls" and the issue, discussed in earlier chapters, whether soul and spirit are the same thing.

The masā'il fall quite neatly into three groups, and, in fact, they are organized into three parts (ajzā') in the earliest manuscript, Escorial 699. Part one, comprising masā'il 1–16, treats of the spirits of the dead, their status and fate, and, in particular, the legitimacy of practices at the graveyard after interment. Part two (masā'il 17–18) delves into the nature of spirit and soul. Part three is made up of the final three masā'il. We have already suggested that the nineteenth mas'ala, the most “philosophical” of them all, was originally written as an independent treatise. The final mas'ala is for the most part a treatise on morals. However, it also contains some emphatic passages of religious insight on epistemology, illumination, and, towards the end, some statements on theology as well.

Each mas'ala is well-organized. Some of the longer ones display a clear internal structure. On the other hand, the masā'il do not cohere well as chapters in a book. In particular, there seems to be a fair amount of repetition.

Appendix: Ibn al-Qayyim's Preface

I have found thus far two nearly identical prefaces, but the differences between them are significant enough of them that I have chosen to publish them separately, rather than producing a single “edition” of the two texts.⁴² Only in the Escorial version does the preface begin with qāla al-shaykh [...] Shams al-Dīn [...] Ibn al-Qayyim al-Jawziyya, thus indicating unambiguously that the Ibn al-Qayyim is the author. However, the substantive part of the preface, that is, the section describing the formation of man that I have discussed earlier, is much cleaner in the Leiden manuscript. The Leiden manuscript also hints that the Ibn al-Qayyim answered these queries in response to questions that were posed to him; but this may be a calque on the famous verse of the Koran. Finally, note that the Leiden manuscript alone states clearly that there are 21 queries in the book.

⁴² The preface is found in Escorial 699 as well, but it is badly damaged, and I have not taken it into account here.

Introduction

THE importance of Ibn 'Arabî for Islamic intellectual history is well-known. His school determines the course of most metaphysical speculation within Sufism from the 7th/13th century onward, and in addition it profoundly influences later Islamic philosophy, especially in Iran.¹ The importance of Ibn 'Arabî's Fusûs al-hikam (usually translated as the "Bezels of Wisdom") as the quintessence of his writings and thought and a major source of his influence is also well-known,² and is attested to by the more than one hundred commentaries written upon it.³

Ibn 'Arabî is also the author of a work called Naqsh al-fusûs (the "Imprint" or "Pattern of the Fusûs"), in which he summarizes briefly the main discussions of the Fusûs itself. Because of the importance of the Fusûs the Naqsh al-fusûs also takes upon a special importance, and for this reason it has been commented by a number of well-known figures of the school of Ibn 'Arabî, including Sadr al-Dîn Qunyawî and 'Abd al-Rahman Jâmî.⁴

Jâmî's work, Naqd al-nusûs fî sharh naqsh al-fusûs, written in the year 863/1459 is particularly famous in the East. This is indicated by a number of facts,

² See S.H. Nasr, Three Muslim Sages, Cambridge (Mass.), 1964, pp.98-99.

including the large number of manuscripts of it which exist in various libraries.⁵ The title of this book, whose text is two-thirds Arabic and one-third Persian, means "Selected Texts in Commenting the Naqsh al-Fusûs", and indeed one of the most interesting points of the work is the large number of quotations gathered from various Sufi authors, which Jâmî has chosen with both metaphysical and mystical insight and literary taste.

In the introduction to Naqd al-nusûs, Jâmî writes as follows: "These are a few words gleaned from the texts of the spiritual elite which comment upon the meaning of the Naqsh al-fusûs, which Ibn 'Arabî . . . abridged from and dedicated to the principles and essential elements of the Fusûs al-hikam, which is the seal of his writings . . . (The present work is) like the patch-work cloak of the Sufis, each patch acquired from a different place and sewn to the others with the thread of appropriateness and the tie of harmony . . . Some (of these texts) are the blessed words of the magnanimous Shaykh (Ibn 'Arabî) himself, and some are the sacred sciences expounded by his followers, among the great Masters: such as ... Sadr al-Dîn Muhammad ibn Ishaq al-Qunyawî and his disciples and beneficiaries, including the perfect gnostic, Mu'ayyid al-Dîn al-Jandî, who is the first commentator of the Fusûs al-hikam, and Shaykh Sa'd al-Dîn Sa'îd al-Farghânî, who is the commentator of the Poem of the Way of Ibn Fârid; and others, . . . especially the commentators of the Fusûs al-hikam".

The three names mentioned in the above passage are of particular importance, for they signify that in Jâmî's mind the most important figures in the school of Ibn 'Arabî are, after the Magister Maximus (al-Shaykh al-Akbar) himself, first Sadr al-Dîn Qunyawî (d. 673/1274-5) and then his disciples, Jandî and Farghânî. The fact that Qunyawî is the most important expositor of the doctrines of Ibn 'Arabî in the eastern lands of Islam has indeed been recognized,⁶ although it is remarkable that, as far as the present writer knows, no study of him has been made in Western languages.⁷ The reason that an intellectual figure of his magnitude – who should be considered second only to his master in the exposition of theoretical gnosis ('irfân-i nazarî) in Islam – could have gone so completely ignored⁸ can only be his proximity to Ibn 'Arabî, so ⁵ Yahya mentions twenty in Le texte des textes, but I was able to find about fifty in the famous catalogues and another 25 in the Solaymaniyyah Library in Istanbul — and by no means can I claim to have done a thorough job of searching. It has also been printed in lithographed editions at least three times in India and Iran.

that like the moon he has been effaced by the sun. In any case there is no doubt that all of the followers of Ibn 'Arabî's school in the East see their master through Qunyawî's eyes or the eyes of his immediate disciples. The disciples and students mentioned by Jâmî – only two of dozens of important figures, including such men as Fakhr al-Dîn 'Irâqî and Qutb al-Dîn Shîrâzî – are also of prime importance in Ibn 'Arabî's school and deserve serious study.⁹ Jâmî goes so far as to say that all of the commentaries upon the Fusûs go back to that of Jandî,¹⁰ and a study of two of the most famous of these, by Qaysarî and Kâshânî, has shown that at least some of their material has been derived almost word for word from his work.¹¹

What is presented below is a complete translation of Ibn 'Arabî's Naqsh al-fusûs along with an abridgement of Jâmî's commentary, representing perhaps 15% of the total work.¹² Because of the extreme conciseness of Naqsh al-fusûs it is almost impossible to understand it without a commentary, and in fact a rather detailed one. I have tried to supply the minimum commentary necessary for an understanding of the text, as well as a few gleanings from Jâmî's detailed selections from other texts which comment upon the main themes. The first and last chapters are translated more extensively – but by no means totally – both because of their importance and also to give the reader a better idea of the style of the complete commentary. Certain difficulties in understanding Ibn 'Arabî's work no doubt remain, but it is hoped that the publication of the translation of the whole text with clarifications where necessary will eliminate these. I have not indicated the sources of the material employed by Jâmî, except where he indicates it himself. The indication of sources along with numerous other notes and comments, will have to wait for the publication of the whole book.

The material in darker type is the text of Ibn 'Arabî's work. Additions in parentheses are my own. Finally it should be added that for a good deal of the terminology employed in the translation I am indebted to T. Izutsu's brilliant study of Ibn 'Arabî,¹³ probably the best work in European languages for explaining the intricacies of Ibn 'Arabî's doctrine, including many of the discussions dealt with here.

four of his works were published in lithographed editions in Iran in the nineteenth century.

⁹ Sayyid Jalâl al-Dîn Âshtiyânî has fortunately just recently begun the edition of both works mentioned by Jâmî, Jandî's commentary on the Fusûs, which has never been printed and the Persian version of Farghânî's commentary on the Poem of the Way. Farghânî also translated this work into Arabic and it was published in 1293 A.H. apparently in Cairo.

¹² Naqsh al-fusûs was published in the Rasâ'il of Ibn 'Arabî in Hyderabad-Deccan, 1361/1948, but I have followed the far better text which has been established through a critical edition of Jâmî's Naqd al-nusûs based on six manuscripts (five of which were written during Jâmî's lifetime). I have also translated the remainder of Naqd al-nusûs and am preparing it for publication.

IN THE NAME OF GOD, THE COMPASSIONATE, THE MERCIFUL

I

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of (the Name) Allah in the Logos of Adam

The fass of a thing is its epitome and quintessence. The fass or "bezel" of a ring is that with which it is decorated and upon which the name of its owner is written. "Wisdom" is knowledge of the realities, attributes and properties of things as they are in themselves and knowledge of words and of volitional acts in a manner which requires them to be appropriate to the circumstances (when they appear from the possessor of wisdom). Al-ilâhiyyah ("the Divinity" or "Allah") is the name of the ontological level which embraces all of the levels of the divine Names and Qualities.

Therefore "the quintessence of the wisdom of (the name) Allah" consists of the epitome of all of the knowledge and religious sciences pertaining to the level of Divinity; or it is the place where that knowledge and those sciences are inscribed, i.e., the heart of the Perfect Man. So the purport of the title of this chapter is that the quintessence of this knowledge and these sciences, or the locus which is receptive toward them, is actualized in the Logos of Adam. And what is meant by "logos" throughout this work is the very prophet in question in respect of his particularities and the allotment determined for him and for his community by God.

Know that the Most Beautiful Divine Names, which if considered in principle number 99 or 1001, but if considered individually and in detail are beyond reckoning, for the Names are the determinations of the Name "Allah" within the realities of the possible beings (mumkinât), and they are infinite because of the infinity of the possible beings, demand in themselves the existence of the world in order that it become a mirror for their concealed lights and the locus of manifestation of their hidden secrets, in respect to which God said, "I was a hidden treasure and I wanted to be known, so I created the world." And verily the Shaykh (i.e., Ibn 'Arabî) attributed this demand to the Names – which are the Essence qualified by attributes – and not to the Essence Itself, because the Essence in respect of Its absoluteness (itlâq) can have no property attributed to It, nor does It become determined by any quality or delimitation. So God in respect of the Name "Allah" brought the world into being as a body made complete (and ready for a spirit) and made Adam its spirit; and I mean by "Adam" the existence of the human microcosm. And He taught him the Names, all of them.

One of the Sufis has said concerning His words, "He taught Adam the Names, all of them" (Quran II, 31), "i.e., He placed within Adam's primordial nature the subtle essence (latîfah) of each of His Names, and through those subtle essences prepared him to realize all of the Names of Majesty (jalâl) and Beauty (jamâl), which He referred to as His two hands. For He said to Iblîs, 'What prevented thee from falling prostrate before that which I created with My two hands?' (XXXVIII, 76). Everything other than Adam had been created with one hand, because it was the locus of manifestation of either the attributes of Beauty, like the angels of mercy, or those of Majesty, like the angels of chastisement and the satans."

God only taught the Perfect Man His Most Beautiful Names and placed them within him, because the Perfect Man is the spirit of the world and the world is his body – as was mentioned – and because the spirit governs the body and exercises free disposal (tasarruf) within it through its spiritual and corporeal faculties, just as the Names are like spiritual and corporeal faculties for the Perfect Man. Just as the spirit governs the body and controls it through faculties, in the same way the Perfect Man governs the affairs of the world and controls them by means of the divine Names.

Know that every one of the realities of the essence of the Perfect Man and of his ontological level is an isthmus (barzakh) in terms of its comprehensive unity (ahadiyyat al-jam'), standing between one of the realities of the Sea of Necessity (wujûb) and a reality which is its locus of manifestation within the sea of possibility (imkân) and which is its "throne", upon which that Necessary reality is seated.¹⁴ So when the perfect comprehensive theophany (tajallî) descends upon its locus of manifestation, the Perfect Man, he receives it through his perfect, comprehensive and unified reality, and that theophany courses through all of the realities within his nature. Then the light of theophany flows out from him onto that which is in conformity with it within the world. Therefore the bounties and blessings which descend upon the realities of the world through the theophany of the All-merciful only reach these realities after having become determined within the Perfect Man and colored by an added hue which did not exist before the determination of the theophany within him. Therefore the realities and archetypes of the world are his subjects, and he is the vicegerent (khalîfah) over them. And the vicegerent must look after his subjects in the most fitting and best manner. It is here that some of the Perfect Men are superior to others.

God manifests Himself to the heart of the Perfect Man, who is His vicegerent. And the reflection of the lights of His self-manifestation overflows into the world, which remains in existence by receiving this effusion (fayd). As long as this Man is in the world, he seeks from God the aid of the theophanies of the Essence and of the "Merciful" and "Compassionate" Mercy¹⁵ by means of the Names and Qualities of which the beings are the manifestations and the loci upon which they are "seated".¹⁶ So the world is preserved by this seeking of aid and by the effusion of theophanies as long as the Perfect Man remains within it. Therefore no meaning passes from the Inward (bâtin) to the Outward (zâhir) except by his command. Therefore even if he does not know it because of the domination of his human qualities, he is the isthmus between the two seas – i.e. the two seas of the Outward and the Inward – and the partition between the two worlds. And to him is the reference in His words, "He let forth the two seas that meet together, between them an isthmus they do not overpass" (Quran LV, 19).

Therefore, or because the world is like the body and the Perfect Man is like the spirit, it is said that the world is a "great man", for just as man consists of a body and a spirit which governs it, the world is made up of these two, although it is larger than man in form; but this statement is only true on condition of the Perfect Man's existence within it, or the world, for if he did not exist within it, it would be like a discarded body without a spirit.

And the Perfect Man is a book, the epitome and summary of the Mother of the Book, which consists of the ontological plane of the comprehensive Unity of the Name "Allah", which comprises the Necessary and active realities pertaining to the Names and the subtle essences of the Qualities pertaining to the level of Lordship, such that nothing escapes them, save inherent Necessity (al-wujûb al-dhâtî), for the contingent and possible being has no share in that, or else the realities of things would be reversed.

And therefore, i.e. because man is the epitome of the ontological plane of "Allah" and comprises what it contains of the realities of the Names and Qualities in a comprehensive unity, He singled him out for the divine Form, even if the world also is in accordance with the Form, for whatever is nearer to oneness is more deserving of being attributed to God and the form of man is the form of His comprehensive Unity, while the form of the world is His particularized form. For He said through the mouth of the Holy Prophet, "Verily God created Adam in His" divine and perfect "form" and according to His own all-comprehensive qualities of Lordship. And since it is possible that the pronoun in "His form" refers to Adam, as some people have claimed, he followed this with his words, and in another version, "in the form of the All-Merciful".

It has been said that "form" means appearance, and so it can only apply to bodies. So what is meant by "form" in this hadîth is "attribute", i.e., "Adam was created according to the Attributes of God", or, living, knowing, willing, powerful, hearing, seeing and speaking. Since Reality appears outwardly through form, the term has been applied figuratively to the Names and Qualities; for through them God appears in external reality. This is the point of view of the exoteric authorities.

But in the view of those who have attained the Truth, form is that without which the unseen and disengaged (mujarrad) realities cannot be conceived or manifested. And the form of God is Being determined by the other determinations through which It is the source of all acts relating to perfection and all active properties.

One of the Sufis has said, "If a questioner asks how 'form' can be attributed to God, we will answer that according to the exoteric authorities it as a figurative attribution, not a real one, because for them to apply the word 'form' to sensory beings is true and correct, and to intelligible beings is figurative. But for us, since the world in all of its spiritual, corporeal, substantial and accidental parts is the particularized form of the ontological plane of 'Allah', and the Perfect Man is His summary form, the attribution of form to God is true and correct, and to what is other than He is figurative; for in our eyes nothing other than He possesses existence."

And He made him, or the Perfect Man, the sought-after goal and the desired end in the creation and maintenance of the world, like the rational soul, which is the goal in making perfect the body and harmonizing the natural and bodily constitution of the human individual.

The universal goal and the primary intention in the creation of the world was the knowledge and vision of the sons of Adam. The lamp of the determinations of contemplation's light and the mirror of the variegations of Being's manifestation are his pure heart and penetrating understanding; and the focus of all of the kinds of knowledge and perception is the comprehensive unity of his knowledge and perception.

When man's created attributes are transformed into uncreated ones and the eyes of his spiritual insight are anointed with the antimony of Oneness, by means of all of his faculties and sense organs he contemplates the beauty of God and perceives absolute Being in all of the loci of theophany and manifestation. The fruit of the tree of his creation is nothing other than this knowledge and vision.

Man is eye, and the rest is skin: true sight is seeing the Friend.

When there is not sight of the Friend, the eye is better blind; were he Solomon, an ant is better than he.¹⁷

Therefore, or because the goal of the creation and maintenance of the world is the Perfect Man, just as the goal of perfecting the body is the rational soul, the world is destroyed with his disappearance, i.e., the disappearance and transferral of the Perfect Man from it, just as the body decays and disappears when the rational soul leaves it; for verily God does not manifest Himself within the world without the intermediary of the Perfect Man. So with his withdrawal the replenishment which brings about the subsistence of its existence and perfections is discontinued. Hence the world is transferred with his transferral, and all of the meanings and perfections which were within it depart for the hereafter.

Sadr al-Dîn al-Qunyawî writes in al-Fukûk: "The true Perfect Man is the isthmus between Necessity and possibility and the mirror which embraces the attributes and laws of Eternity together with those of contingency. He is the intermediary between God and creation, and through him and from his ontological plane the divine effusion and grace, which are the reason for the subsistence of 'other than God', reach the world, all of it, both the celestial and the terrestrial. If it were not for his being the isthmus which is not opposed to either of the two sides, nothing in the world would receive the unique succour of God, because of the lack of affinity and relationship; the succour would not reach the world and therefore the world would cease to exist.

"Verily the Perfect Man is the pillar of the Heavens and the earth. And because of this mystery, when he leaves the center of the Universe – that Universe which is the outward form of the divine All-comprehensiveness and of its Unity and the station of the vicegerency of the ontological plane of 'Allah' – and goes back to the Noble Pedestal and the Majestic Throne, which encompass the Heavens and the earth, the order of the Universe will be destroyed and the earth and the Heavens will be changed into other than themselves.

"Therefore the Prophet has said, 'The hour (of the Resurrection) will not come as long as there is someone in the world who says "Allah, Allah".' And he emphasized by repetition that he means, 'as long as there is someone in the world who truly says "Allah", for if he meant 'someone who says the word "Allah", he would not have emphasized it by repetition. And there is no doubt that no one mentions 'Allah' with true mention – and in particular with this greatest and all-embracing Name, which contains in itself all of the Names – except he who knows God with perfect gnosis. It is as if he said, 'The hour will not come as long as there is a Perfect Man in the world.'

It is he who is referred to as 'the maintaining pillar' or 'he for whose sake (the world) is maintained.' So when he is transferred (to the other world), the heaven will be split asunder, the sun will be darkened, the stars will be thrown down and scattered, the mountains will be set moving, the earth will be shaken and the Resurrection will come.¹⁸

"Moreover, if it were not for his immutable permanence – in respect of his being a locus of manifestation – within Paradise, whose place is the Noble Pedestal and the Majestic Throne, the situation of these two would be like that of the earth and the heavens (they would also be destroyed). And verily I have qualified his immutable permanence with my words, 'in respect of his being a locus of manifestation', because of what God has informed me concerning the fact that Paradise does not encompass a Perfect Man. Of his reality there will only be in Paradise what is compatible with that world and what that world necessitates from God in respect to what it contains of man.

"Rather, I even say, 'If hell were empty of him, it would not remain in existence; and it is through him that it is satiated.' The Prophet refers to the Perfect Man with his words 'the Foot of the All-Compeller' in the hadîth, 'Verily hell will not cease to say, "Are there any more?", until the All-Compeller places His foot upon it. And when the All-Compeller places His foot upon it, parts of it will withdraw into other parts, and it will say, "Enough! Enough!"' I was told by God that the foot placed in hell is what is left over in this world from the forms of the Perfect Men and is that which does not accompany them in the paradisaal state. And this remnant was alluded to as 'the foot' because of a subtle and sublime correspondence: the foot is the last part of man's body; in the same way his physical form itself is the last of the parts of the absolute human form, for the forms of the world are all like bodily organs of the absolute and true human form. The physical state is the last form in which the human reality appears; and through the absolute and true human form all of the forms which I said were like bodily organs are supported and maintained."

And the edifice is transferred to the hereafter because of him, i.e., because of man, or by reason of his being transferred there. As long as the Perfect Man is in the world, the world is preserved and the divine treasures protected. But when he is transferred from this world to the next and leaves the lower world to reside in the hereafter, and when no one remains among men who is qualified by the divine perfections and able to take his place, and when God makes him the treasurer of His own treasures, then all of the perfections and meanings which exist in the treasures of the world are removed along with that Perfect Man, the small amount which is in the world joins that which is waiting in the hereafter, and the work of keeping the treasury and being the vicegerent goes to the next world.

Hence he, or the Perfect Man, is the first in intention and desire, since God made him the intended aim and the final cause of the creation of the world. And it is in the nature of the final cause to be prior in knowledge and will, just as it is in its nature to be posterior in existence, as the Shaykh has indicated with his words, the last, i.e., the Perfect Man is posterior to other than himself, in creation in the chain of existent beings, for the first thing He created in external existence was the Supreme ¹⁸ The last sentence is a reference to a number of Quranic verses: LV, 37; LXXXII; LXXXII, 2; LXXX1,3 and XCIX, 1.

Pen, then the Guarded Tablet, then the Mighty Throne, then the Noble Foot-stool, then the elements, then the seven heavens, then the productions¹⁹ then man: for he is the end of these creatures and the locus of their integration. And man is the outward, or that which is perceived, in his elemental and corporeal form and the inward also, or that which is not perceived, in station or rank, for this is in respect of his spirituality. Or we can say that man is the outward in the realm of concrete existence, through his comprehensive and unified form composed of body, soul, intellect, faculties and other things which can be called "created"; and he is also inward, but through his station, which is his vicegerency.

So in respect of his elemental and corporeal form, or the form of his comprehensive unity, he is a servant of God (Allah), created to worship his Lord; and in respect of his meaning and spirit, or his station, a lord, whose lordship is actualized in relation to the individual beings of all the world.

The Shaykh writes in Inshâ' al-dawâ'ir: "Man is two copies: an outward copy and an inward copy. His outward copy corresponds to the world in its totality, and his inward copy corresponds to the ontological level of the Divinity. Thus man is the universal in reality and unconditionally, for he is the receptacle for all beings, whether eternal or contingent. But beings other than he are not the receptacle for all beings, for the particular beings of the world are not receptacles for Divinity, and God is not a receptacle for servanthood. Rather the whole world is a servant, and God – glory be to Him alone – is a unique and eternal God who cannot be qualified by that which contradicts the attributes of Divinity, just as the world cannot be qualified by that which contradicts the attributes of contingency and servanthood. So man is the owner of two complete relations: a relation through which he enters the ontological level of Divinity, and a relation through which he enters the ontological level of the cosmos. So he is called a 'servant' in respect of his being addressed by revelation and since he was not, then he was, like the world. And he is called a 'lord' in respect of his vicegerency, his Form and his Fairest Stature (Quran XCV, 4)."

For that reason, i.e., because man has an aspect of lordship through which he is in conformity with God, and an aspect of servanthood through which he is in conformity with creation, He made him a vicegerent and in the same way He made his perfect sons vicegerents in all of the world, and his sons who have not reached perfection vicegerents in that which pertains to them, like the governance of a kingdom by the king and the running of a family by its head. And the lowest form of governing is the governing of the body by the individual. But the Greatest Vicegerency belongs only to the Perfect Man. And therefore, i.e., because the meaning of Adam comprises the two aspects of Lordship and servanthood, none of the creatures of the world has claimed for himself lordship except man, because of what he possesses of power and mastery, by being qualified by the attributes of Lordship and the active Qualities of the Necessary Being. So when he observed them in himself, but God had not opened the eye of his spiritual insight, he did not understand that they are the attributes of God reflected in the mirror of his preparedness (istidâd); and he imagined that they belonged to him personally. Therefore he claimed lordship and divinity, like the pharaohs. And in the same way no one in the world consolidated the station of servanthood in himself through falling down to its lowest levels except man, for when he observed those attributes and qualities in others and he imagined that they belonged to them personally, he acknowledged his servanthood to them, like those who worship idols. Therefore he worshipped stones and other minerals, which are the lowest and the most debased kind of being, for the ontological qualities in their receptive potency, such as life, knowledge and their concomitants, have not become actualized.

So there is nothing greater and of higher rank than man in his lordship, or by reason of his being qualified by and manifesting the attributes of Lordship, for no rank is higher than this, and in the same way nothing is more lowly than him in his servanthood, or by reason of his being qualified by the attributes of servanthood, for just as Lordship is the highest of ranks, its opposite, i.e., servanthood, is the lowest.

Man is a two-sided mirror. On one side the properties of Lordship and on the other the defects of servanthood are reflected. When you look at the properties of Lordship, he is greater than all beings; and when you count the defects of servanthood, he is lower and more insignificant than all creatures.

When I find a trace of Thy Qualities in myself, God forbid that someone should be better than I!

But when my glance falls to my own state, in the two worlds there is none worse than I.

So if you have understood the preceding explanation, I have explained to you what is meant by "man". Look at his grandeur, which he has attained through the Most Beautiful Names, or having become qualified by them, and the fact that they seek him to be their perfect locus of theophany and their all-embracing locus of manifestation. Through their seeking him and their requiring his existence, you will come to understand his majesty and nobility, for the grandeur and nobility of the sought is only to the extent of the grandeur and nobility of the seeker, and in the same way through his appearance through them, or through those Names, and his existence through them, although in his own essence he is nonexistent, you will understand his lowliness, for there is nothing more lowly than to be subject to the laws of nothingness and to stand in need of another for one's existence. So understand!

From this, or from this station, according to which it has been understood that man is a lord in respect of his inward part and a servant in respect of his outward, it is understood that he, or man, is a copy of the two forms, and corresponds to them: the form of God, which is embraced by the state of his inward all-comprehensiveness and concentration and the form of the world, which is encompassed by the state of his outward differentiation and dispersion. And these two forms are the two hands of God with which He created man.

What is man? An all-embracing isthmus, the form of creatures and of God placed within him.

He is a copy in synopsis whose content is the Essence of God and His ineffable Attributes.

Connected to the subtleties of the World of Power, inclusive of the verities of the World of Dominion,

His inward is drowned in the sea of Unity, his outward dry-lipped on the shore of separation.

There is not one of the Attributes of God which is not manifest in his essence.

He is knowing, hearing and seeing, speaking, willing, alive and powerful.

In the same way, of the realities of the Universe, everything is incorporated within him:

Take the Heavens or the elements, or take minerals, plants and animals;

The form of good and bad are written within him, the behaviour of devil and beast are kneaded in him.

If he was not the mirror of the Face of the Everlasting, why did the angels prostrate themselves to him?

He is the reflection of the beauty of the Immaculate Presence; if Iblīs cannot fathom this, so what?

II

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of In- and Ex-spiration in the Logos of Seth

The first of the ontological levels which can be conceived of is the determination (ta'ayyun) which embraces all determinations and which possesses the comprehensive Unity (ahadiyyat al-jam'). The level which follows it is the level of Principiality (masdariyyah) and Effusion (fayyâdiyyah). Adam was the form of the first level, just as Seth was the locus of manifestation for the second. Therefore the first fass to be mentioned was that of Adam, and it was followed by the fass of Seth, in keeping with external existence itself.

Since Adam after the loss of Abel sought a gift from the ontological level of God as "the Giver" to alleviate his grief, God bestowed upon him Seth purely as a gift and bestowal. In addition everything which Seth attained came purely as a gift. Therefore the Shaykh inevitably speaks about gifts and some of their kinds in this fass: Know that gifts of God are comprised of numerous kinds: among them is that He should give a gift especially to manifest His bounty, without expecting anything in exchange from him who benefits, in terms of praise, thanksgiving, or what have you, by means of His Name "the Giver". And it, or the gift received from the Name "the Giver", is of two kinds: one is the gift of the Essence, pertaining to the Unity of all of the Names, for the Essence as It is in Itself does not bestow gifts or manifest Itself through theophanies, and the second is the gift of a Name.

Now if you should say, "The gifts pertaining to the Name 'the Giver' are gifts of a Name, so how can they be divided into gifts of the Essence and gifts of a Name?" I would reply, "What is meant by 'gift of the Essence' is the gift whose source is the Essence without taking into account any one of the divine Qualities along with it – even though such a gift is not given without the intermediary of the Names and Qualities, for God does not manifest Himself in terms of His Essence to the existent beings except from behind the veil of one of the Names. And what is meant by 'gift of a Name' is a gift whose source is one of the Attributes in respect of its being distinguished and differentiated from the Essence."

The gifts of the Essence occur only through a "divine" theophany, i.e., through the theophany of the Presence of the all-embracing Name "Allah", which is the comprehensive Unity of all of the Names, not through the manifestation of the Essence, since there are no properties, designations, names, theophanies or anything else within the Unity of the Essence. Therefore the determination of the theophany comes from the ontological level of the divinity, and for this reason the theophany is attributed to the divine Essence, not to the Essence without restriction.

And the theophany from the Essence can only be according to the form of the locus of theophany – which is the servant – and according to his preparedness (isti'dâd), just as God appears in the mirrors of the beings according to their preparednesses and receptivities, by manifesting His properties within them. Other than this is impossible.

But as for the gifts of a Name, they always are accompanied by a veil, i.e., the veil of determination according to a Name, according to which a particular Name becomes differentiated from the others. And the recipient does not receive this gift, whether of the Essence or of a Name, except according to his actual preparedness, for the theophanies in the Presence of Holiness and the Spring of Oneness are one and whole in description, but they become colored when they descend according to the preparednesses of the recipients, their spiritual and physical levels, their times and places, and all of the concomitances of these things, like states, constitutions and particular attributes. So people think because of the diversity of effects that the theophanies themselves are multiple in reality, but this is not so. God said, "Our command is but one, as the twinkling of an eye" (Quran LIV, 50). Just as God is one in every respect, so also His effusion and His command have no multiplicity except in relation to the recipients.

It, or the preparedness, is what is meant by His words, "He gave everything its creation" (Quran XX, 50). So from that is the preparedness.

It may be that the gift, whether from the Essence or a Name, is due to asking on the part of him who has received it by the state of his preparedness, or the state which causes man to ask verbally. There is no escape from it, or from asking by the state.

Or it may be that the gift is due to asking verbally. Verbal asking is of two kinds: one is asking according to nature, in that the reason for asking is man's natural wish to hurry, for man was created ever hasty, and the second, which is asking but not according to nature, is also divided into two kinds. The first is asking in obedience to the divine command, according to His words, "Call upon Me and I will answer you" (Quran XL, 60), and the second is asking according to the demands of wisdom and gnosis, for he, or the asker according to the demands of wisdom and gnosis, is a commander who directs his subjects – whether they be all the inhabitants of the world, or those of a kingdom, or his family, or his body, and a master of the reins of their affairs, a protector of their interests, and one who knows that there are certain of their interests which divine Providence has ordained to be dependent upon asking. So he asks God and prays to Him to take care of these affairs. It is obligatory for him, or that asker, to strive to the extent possible to see that every one of his subjects who has a right receives it; what indicates this obligation is like his, i.e. the Prophet's, words, "Verily you have a duty toward your family" i.e. those who are worthy of your instruction and education, like wives and children in the macrocosm and like physical and spiritual faculties in the microcosm, "your soul, your body and your guests."

III

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the "Most Glorified" in the Logos of Noah

Since the Wisdom of the "Most Glorified" (al-subbûh) consists of the knowledge of the sciences pertaining to the "purification" (tanzîh) of God, the Shaykh begins the text concerned with this Wisdom with a discussion of purification: Purification on the part of him, or the servant; who purifies God of certain things in accordance with the approval or disapproval of his ordinary mind and his reason is a delimitation and a specification by him of Him who is purified, in terms of what is other than those things purified from Him, for he has distinguished Him from that which does not accept to be purified from those things. So by analogy the absoluty also of whatever must be given this description is a delimitation through this absoluty. Therefore there is then naught but a limited being or a divinity, which he, or the servant who purifies it, has raised up by attributing absoluty to it.

Just as the knowledge of him who purifies God with his mind is incomplete – for he is restricting the Unrestricted and delimiting the Limitless – in the same way he who "assimilates" (tashbîh) God to the creatures without purifying Him is mistaken, for assimilation is also delimitation and restriction of the Unrestricted – who has no limit which defines or confines Him.

But he who combines purification and assimilation, maintains each of them as permanent concerning Him and describes Him by both is the true gnostic and the realized Perfect Man. The Shaykh has said:

If you purify Him, you delimit; if you assimilate Him, you restrict.

But if you do both, you have been shown the right way: you are a leader in the gnostic sciences, a master.

And since the Shaykh has pointed out the deficiency of the knowledge of God according to attributes which only purify Him, and the situation of knowledge which only assimilates Him has become known by analogy, he now mentions explicitly the perfect knowledge of God combining purification and assimilation, which the servant is commanded to attain by the Prophet, and for which according to the religious law he will be rewarded: Know that the way of the truth through which He has sought that they know Him in words like the hadîth, "I wanted to be known, so I created the world", is what the tongues of the Revelations have brought. So no intelligence can overstep it. Rather, everyone must believe in it in the manner in which God meant it and not by interpreting it according to his own ideas. His mental "purification" must be in accordance with what God has sent down upon the tongues of His prophets and within the Books He has revealed to them; for otherwise, God is purified from the purification of the thoughts of human reason, for human reasons, which are determined within the particular and limited faculties of man's constitution, are particular and limited in accordance with these faculties. And how should the limited and particular perceive absolute and disengaged realities in themselves unless it escape from its own limitations, or unless those absolute realities become limited according to its vision and existence?

But before the coming of the Revelations and the acquisition of knowledge and gnosis through them, knowledge of Him is to purify Him of the characteristics of contingency. So the gnostic ('ârif) possesses two knowledges: a knowledge acquired by reason and demonstration before the coming of the Revelations, and a knowledge received from the bringer of the Revelation, but whose condition is that he turn over to God the true understanding of that with which they, or the Revelations, have come and stay away from rational demonstration; and that he believe in this knowledge in the way that God meant it without interpreting it with his reason or imposing his own ideas upon it, for verily the Revelations have only been sent by God because it is impossible for human reason to perceive by itself the verities as they really are within the divine Knowledge.

And if He unveils for him the understanding of it, i.e., of what the Revelations have brought, and if He gives him knowledge of what His intention is through the conditions imposed by the divine Law (shar'), which the reason cannot attain through its mental processes, that unveiling and awareness is because of the divine Gift relating to the Essence, which was already mentioned in the chapter on Seth.

IV The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the "Most Holy" in the Logos of Idris

The Shaykh saw fit to devote this Wisdom to Idris because he was a prophet who went to the greatest lengths in purifying his soul through arduous ascetic practices and in sanctifying himself from the attributes of animality, until his spiritual nature gained complete sway over his animal nature and he totally cast off his body and made a journey to the Heavens (mi'râj), where he spoke to the angels and the disengaged Intellects. And it is said that for sixteen years he neither ate nor slept, until only a transcendent intellect remained.

And since it is mentioned in the Quran concerning Idris that "We raised him up to a high place" (XIX, 57), and since "elevation" is of two kinds, the Shaykh alludes to these with his words, Elevation is of two kinds: One of them is elevation of place (makân), which is attributed to God according to various texts, like His words, "The All-Merciful sat Himself upon the Throne" (Quran XX, 5), and like the cloud mentioned in the words of the Prophet, "He was in a cloud, above which there was no air, and below which there was no air", in his answer to the bedouin who asked, "Where was our Lord before He created His creation?", and like the heaven mentioned in His words, "And it is He who in heaven is God" (Quran XLIII, 84); and the second is elevation of position (makânah) or rank, which must be attributed to God according to verses like: "All things perish, except His Face" (Quran XXVIII, 88).

And mankind are described by the two elevations, for they are moving about between knowledge of God and works for him. So some of them rise in the levels of the knowledge of God, like the gnostics; and others become ranked in the degrees of works, like the worshippers and ascetics; and some of them combine the two, like those who have reached perfection. So works pertain to place, i.e., they result in the elevation of place, like Paradise and its various degrees, and knowledge pertains to position, for it results in elevation within the degrees of nearness to God. This is because position pertains to the Spirit, just as place pertains to the body. So each of them necessitates what resembles and is similar to itself.

Hence elevation of position belongs to him who knows, and elevation of place to him who performs works. And whoso combines the two perfections possesses both elevations.

But as for the elevation of relative superiority (mufâdalah), i.e. the elevation in which certain of the elevated are superior in relation to others, that is His words, or must be attributed to God according to His words, "And you are the uppermost, and God is with you" (Quran XLVII1, 35) where He affirms that those whom He is addressing possess a higher elevation and that He is with them in this elevation. Hence higher elevation must also be attributed to Him. So this, i.e., elevation of relative superiority, refers to His theophany in His loci of self-manifestation, which are multiple and graded in ranks. It does not refer to the Unity of His Essence. For in one theophany He is higher in elevation than in another theophany, like His words in the Quran, "Nothing is like Him" (XLII, 11) and like "Surely I am with you, I hear and I see" (Quran XX, 46) and like His words in the hadîth, "I was hungry and you fed me not". So it becomes obvious that His elevation of relative superiority is from the point of view of the multiplicity of theophanies and aspects, not in respect to the Unity of the Essence, for verily at the level of Unity there is only real and intrinsic elevation, not relative elevation.

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Ecstatic Love in the Logos of Abraham

Since Abraham had realized the state of annihilation (fanâ') in God, and since it is possible that someone might imagine that he who has attained annihilation is purely and simply nothing, and "nothing" cannot be described by positive attributes, the Shaykh rejects this notion with his words, There is no escape in the station of annihilation in God from affirming the real existence of the servant who has been annihilated within Him, since here by "annihilation" is not meant that the existence of the servant becomes absolutely nothing. Rather, what is meant is that his human aspect is annihilated in his lordly aspect, since every servant possesses an aspect deriving from the divine Presence, which is referred to in His words, "Every man has his direction to which he turns" (Quran II, 148). And annihilation is only attained through perfect attentiveness directed toward the Presence of God, the Absolute, for by means of this the servant's godly aspect is strengthened until it gains ascendancy over the creaturely aspect to the point of subduing and annihilating it. And this attentiveness is only possible through the inherent love hidden within the servant. Its appearance can only come about through avoiding that which opposes it and is incompatible with it, i.e., through fearing God with respect to what opposes it. So love is the mount and godfearingness is the provision. And this annihilation necessitates that the servant become determined with godly determinations and lordly qualities, that he attain subsistence (baqâ') in God. Then these determinations will never disappear from him.

The annihilation of the possible being in the Necessary Being is through the disappearance of the effects of possibility, not the destruction of his reality, like the disappearance of luminosity in the light of the sun.

In the presence of the sun, the lamp is caught between existence and nonexistence.

Shaykh Junayd has said, "When the contingent is joined to the Eternal, not a trace of it remains."

When the Attributes of the Eternal have shone forth, then the mantle of temporality is burned.²⁰

And the disappearance of the effects of possibility takes place in the subtle consciousness of the gnostic, in his awareness and perception, not in his body, spirit and humanity, even though in accordance with the saying, "The earth has a share from the cup of the generous", these also participate to some extent.

O brother, you are this very thought (of yours); as for the rest (of you), you are (only) bone and fiber.²¹

So you are that intelligence, the rest is covering, lose yourself not, busy yourself not with vain striving.

And then, when the existence of the servant who has been annihilated in God is affirmed, it is correct for things to be attributed to him and for God to be his hearing, his sight, his tongue, his hand and his foot.²² So He pervades his faculties and his organs with His He-ness (huwiyyah) according to the meaning which is appropriate to Him. And this, or God's being the hearing and seeing of the servant and His pervading all of his other organs and faculties, is the result of the love pertaining to supererogatory works (hubb al-nawâfil) and the proximity attained through it on the journey undertaken by the lover, within which wayfaring (sulûk) takes priority over divine attraction (jadhbah) and annihilation precedes subsistence, for God manifests Himself within the Name "the Inward" and becomes the organ of perception for the servant who is the locus of theophany.

But as for the love pertaining to obligatory works (hubb al-farâ'id) and the proximity attained through it, or the result achieved through this love and proximity on the journey motivated by the Beloved, within which divine attraction takes priority over wayfaring and the primordial subsistence takes precedence over annihilation, since God manifests Himself in His Name "the Outward" and the servant who is the locus of theophany becomes the organ through which God perceives; that is that God should hear through you, in that the perceiver is God, and you are His organ of perception, and see through you. But the love pertaining to supererogatory works, or its result, is that you hear and see through Him, in that God is the organ of your perception.

So you perceive through supererogatory works according to the measure of the preparedness of the locus, which is you yourself, since God has manifested Himself in you through the attributes of hearing, seeing, etc. – for His theophany, according to whatever attribute it may be, is always in keeping with the measure of the preparedness of the locus of theophany, not according to what He is in Himself, for that cannot be embraced by any locus nor grasped by any place of manifestation. And He perceives through obligatory works every object of perception, without one being specified over another, for the perceiver in this case is God, and the effect of His all-embracingness penetrates to the organ. So understand.

²¹ Mathnawî, II, 277.

²² Reference to the well-known hadîth qudsî which God says (according to one of its versions), "The servant does not cease approaching me through supererogatory work until I love him, and when I love him I am the hearing through which he hears, the sight with which he sees, the tongue with which he speaks, the hand with which he seizes and the foot with which he walks."

VI The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Truth in the Logos of Isaac

Since the plane of limited imagination (khayâl-i muqayyad) is an image and an exemplar of the World of Absolute Image-Exemplars (mithâl-i mutlaq), and since everyone experiences this plane, anyone can find his way to the absolute (image) by observing the relative. By perceiving the characteristics of the branch he can gain insight into the root. Therefore the Shaykh does not refer to the World of Absolute Image-Exemplars, but limits himself to mentioning the plane of limited imagination. He says, Know that the plane of imagination, i.e. the level which embraces all of the images which take form within the imaginal faculty (al-quwwat al-mutakhayyilah) contiguous to the human level and within any imager whatsoever – a level which is also called "the level of limited image-exemplars", just as the World of Image-Exemplars is called "absolute imagination" – and whose relationship to the World of Image-Exemplars is like the streams which branch off from a great river, is the plane which encompasses and includes every thing existent in the external world and every non-thing, for it possesses the power to represent both. And all of it, i.e., the plane of imagination and the forms which appear within it, is veridical and corresponds to reality and is divided into two kinds: a kind in which the image imagined corresponds to the form in the external world, or in a plane external to the plane of imagination; and this is called "unveiling" (kashf); and a kind in which it does not correspond. Within the latter interpretation takes place.

And mankind here, or in the knowledge of the second kind of dreams and visions, are of two kinds: the knower, who knows what God means by the observed image, and the learner, who does not know, but who has the aptitude and capacity to advance to the level of knowledge. The knower is true to the vision, i.e., he gives it its due; and the learner deems the vision to be true, i.e. he takes the observed images as veridical and corresponding to reality in the external world, until God teaches him what He meant by the image which He has revealed to him and unveiled for him in the dream, like Abraham, when he saw in his dream that he was sacrificing his son, but it was a ram which appeared in the form of his son. So he deemed his vision to be true and did not interpret it, because the majority of the things which the prophets and the Perfect Men observe take place in the World of Absolute Image-Exemplars. And everything which occurs within it is necessarily true and in correspondence with reality. So he thought he was observing within that world, and hence he did not interpret his dream. Therefore he deemed his vision to be true until God taught him that what was meant by the form of his son was the ram.

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the All-High in the Logos of Ishmael

Since Ishmael was a locus of manifestation of the divine Name "the All-High", which is one of the names of the Essence, the Shaykh decided to explain in his Wisdom the two levels which this Name possesses: the Unity of the Essence, and the Unity of the multiple Names. Therefore he says in order to introduce his subject matter, The existence of the world – which was not, and then was –, as the Prophet said, "God was, and nothing was with Him", necessitates multiple relations (nisab) within its Originator, or Names or Attributes, etc., – whatever you like to call them. So say, for it is incontestable, "There is no escape, in the existence of the world from that", or from the actualization of the multiplicity of the Names in its Originator. And through the totality of these relations and Names and the Unity of their multiplicity the world comes into existence, not in respect to the Unity of the Essence, for the One inasmuch as He is One is not the source of multiplicity inasmuch as it is multiplicity, for it is not correct to say that there should appear from something - whatever it may be – what is opposed to it in reality. And it is clear that Unity is opposed to multiplicity and the One to the many. So it is impossible that one of them should originate from the other. However, the One and Unity possess numerous relations, and multiplicity possesses a fixed unity. So when one of them becomes related to the other, it is in terms of this connecting link.

So the world with its true multiplicity and relative oneness comes into existence from an Originator who is the One in Essence, or One with an inherent and true Oneness, to which is attributed a Unity of the multiplicity of relations in respect to the Names and Qualities, because the realities of the world demand that, i.e., this Oneness of the multiplicity of the Names, from It, i.e., the Originator.

Then the world, if it were not a possible being, would not be a receptacle for existence; but it is a receptacle for existence, so it is possible. And the possible being is that for which existence and nonexistence are equal. So in order to exist, it needs an agent to give predominance to its existence over its nonexistence, as well as receptivity towards existence on its own part. So the world did not come into existence except from two things: from a divine power, to which is attributed what we mentioned, i.e. a Unity of the multiplicity of the Names and Qualities in order to give predominance to its existence over its nonexistence, and from a receptivity towards existence on the part of the world; for if it had not been receptive, it would not have been a possible being, and its Agent and Originator could not have brought it into existence, for what is impossible does not accept to be brought into existence. Therefore, i.e., since the world only exists because of these two things, when He said "Be", which indicates that He possesses the power over the desired thing, He said "and it is", in such places as the verse, "His command, when He desires a thing, is to say to it 'Be', and it is" (XXXVI, 82). So He attributed the coming into existence to the world in respect of its receptivity.

One of the Sufis ('Abd al-Razzâq al-Kâshânî) has said, "The essence of the Name 'the Inward' is the same as the essence of the Name 'the Outward'. And the Recipient is the same as the Agent So the uncreated archetype (of every being) is His Essence. And Act and Receptivity are His two hands So He is the Active Agent with one of His hands, and the Recipient with the other. The Essence is one, and the multiplicity is formed by various imprints and pictures So it is correct to say that He has never brought anything into existence but His Own Self, and there is nothing but His Self-manifestation."

Although forms are many in your eyes, when you look closely, one Being has come repeatedly.

If we possess power and acts, they are not because of us; they are because He has come to appear through us.

VIII The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Spiritual Ease in the Logos of Jacob

"Religion with God is Islam" (Quran III, 19), and its meaning, or the literal meaning of the word "Islam", is obedience. Whoever has something sought from him and obeys the seeker in what he sought is a "Muslim", So understand, for this principle pervades all the creatures (i.e. all creatures are obedient to God and therefore "Muslim"), whether they are in agreement with or opposed to the divine command (or what God has "sought" from them). As for the extension of this principle to those creatures who are in agreement with and obey the divine commands and prohibitions, the reason is obvious and needs no explanation. But as for those who are opposed to and do not obey God's commands and prohibitions, the reason is that the divine Command is divided into two parts: the "volitive" (irâdî) and the "prescriptive" (taklîfî). So if certain people are opposed to God and do not obey the prescriptive command (according to which through religion God prescribes what the creatures should and should not do), they do obey the volitive command (or what God wills for them). One of the Sufis has expressed this as follows: "Verily God has an obligatory command and an ontological command; therefore that which cannot be disobeyed is the ontological command." Among the Persian verses which allude to these points are the following:

O Thou for whom everything I have hidden is manifest! I disobeyed Thee only in the hope of Thy forgiveness.

I gather that I have done many things against Thy command: But, did I not do all that Thou desired?

Thou said, "Do it!" and bound my hand; Thou said, "Fire the arrow!" and cut off my thumb.

Although I am not obeying Thy command, in any case I am following Thy will.

And religion is two religions: a religion commanded by God, which is what the prophets have brought; and a religion deemed valid by God in the same way that He deems the religion He has sent valid, for the aim of this second religion is in agreement with what God has desired from the Law established by Him, i.e., the perfection of souls in both knowledge and works. The latter is invention (al-ibtidâ') within which is the glorification of God. So whoso observes it as it should be observed, seeking the good-pleasure of God, has attained salvation.

And the divine command is two commands: a command through an intermediary, or the intermediary of the prophets and messengers; so inasmuch as it is a command through an intermediary and does not take into account the ontological command, it contains nothing but its grammatical, i.e., imperative, form; and a command without intermediary. It is the latter command, the ontological command, which is actualized by the word "Be!" and which pertains to the coming into being of that which possesses no external existence but is known in the divine Knowledge. So it is this command whose disobeyal cannot be imagined, because it is impossible for the desired thing to contradict His will, as He says, Our only command "to a thing, when We desire it, is that We say to it 'Be', and it is" (XVI, 41), while that command through the intermediary may be disobeyed, or it may be disobeyed by him who is commanded to do something. And that would be when it is not in accordance with the command without intermediary.

Just as the existence of the servant is caused by God's bestowing existence upon him, in the same way the existence of the act which has been commanded is also by His bestowal. So as long as the ontological command does not attach itself to the commanded act, it is impossible for the servant to obey the prescriptive command. Indeed, how can a thing which does not possess existence in itself bestow existence upon another nonexistent entity and bring it from the concealment of nothingness to the wide-open plain of being? My friend, read the verse, "And God created you and what you do" (XXXVII, 96), and know that your being and acts come from the ineffable One.

If someone asks what profit there is in God's commanding the servant to do something and not wanting that thing to come to pass through him, we would answer that prescription is one of the states of the immutable archetype ('ayn thâbitah) of the servant, and the servant has a particular preparedness vis-à-vis the prescription which is opposed to the obeying of that command. So the archetype of the servant asks God according to its special preparedness to prescribe for it something the possibility of whose acceptance He has not placed within its preparedness. So God prescribes for it according to the wish of the special preparedness, but He does not want the servant to perform the thing which he has been commanded, for He knows that in reality he does not possess the preparedness to accept that thing. Therefore He expects him to perform the opposite of what he has been commanded. And the profit and wisdom in this is the distinguishing of him who has the preparedness to accept the command from him who does not have it. And God knows best.

And that which is commanded without intermediary is nothing but the thing nonexistent in the external world but known in the divine Knowledge and existent with Him who commands in the particular manner (pertaining to the divine Knowledge), not that which exists (in the world) before the issuing of the command, for obviously it is impossible to bring into being that which (already) exists. This is in contrast to that which is commanded through an intermediary, for this is nothing but that which exists in the external world, since it is impossible to prescribe commands and prohibitions for that which does not exist externally.

IX The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Light in the Logos of Joseph

Since luminosity dominates the World of Image-Exemplars, because of its proximity to the World of Spirits and the Worlds of the Names and Qualities above it – just as darkness dominates over the forms of the world of generation and corruption, since it is opposite to the World of the Spirits, which is the World of Light – and since it is the rule concerning everything which is an intermediary between two things that when its relation to one of the two is stronger than its relation to the other it is described by what the dominating side is described by and called by its name, the Shaykh called this Wisdom by the name "light". For in reality it is the wisdom of "brightness" (diyâ'), not of pure light (nûr), which is not different from the Being of God.

The Shaykh calls brightness "light" when he says, Light, or other than true Light, which is the Essence of God, is unveiled or perceived in itself, and through it unveiling, or perception of other things, takes place. And the most complete and penetrating light is the light through which it is unveiled and perceived what God means by the forms seen by the imagination in dreams, i.e., the science of interpretation (ta'bîr); for a single form appears in the imagination of different individuals in many and various meanings, because of the differences of the preparednesses of these individuals, the discrepancies among their constitutions, their differences in place and time, etc., but one of which is meant in the case of him who has seen the form. So whoso unveils it, i.e., the intended meaning, and distinguishes it from other meanings and interprets the form which has been seen, by means of that complete intelligible light is the possessor of the most complete light. His light is the most complete light because he discerned by means of it that which was in the extremity of obscurity and at the limit of ambiguity. And we only said that the one form appears in many meanings because in a dream one person of a group is called, so he makes the hajj in the World of Sensory Forms, and another of them is called, so he steals; and the form of the calling is one, but the interpretation is different, because of the differences between those who see the form. And in the same way another person sees in a dream that he is called, so he invites to God with sure knowledge: and another person sees that he is called, so he invites to error. This is because the calling shares with these two invitations in invitation as such; but that to which the viewers invite differs because of their disparity.

Know that everything which appears in the sensory world is like that which appears in sleep. But people are neglectful of perceiving the realities and meanings which are embraced by the forms which appear in the world, just as the Prophet said, "People are asleep, and when they die, they awake." And just as the gnostic knows through interpretation what is meant by the forms which are witnessed in dreams, so the gnostic who knows the realities of things also knows what is meant by the forms which appear in the sensory world. Therefore he passes from them to their intention. So when the gnostic sees a form or hears some words, or when a meaning falls into his heart, he infers from them their principles and knows what God means by them. For this reason it has been said, "Verily all things that happen in the world are messengers from God to the servant delivering their messages. He understands them who understands them, and he turns away from them who is ignorant of them." God said, "How many a sign there is in the heavens and the earth that they pass by, turning away from it" (Quran XII, 105), because of their lack of comprehension and the duration of their forgetfulness.

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Unity in the Logos of Hûd

Since Hûd was dominated by the contemplation of the Unity of the multiplicity of Lordship, for he was observing the directing of the one Lord (rabb) in the multiple vassals (marbûbât) which are His loci of Self-manifestation, the Wisdom of Unity – i.e., the Unity of the Lordship – had to be set aside for his Logos.

The ends of the paths traversed by wayfarers, whether physical or spiritual, are all at God, and God is their end. This is because since God encompasses all things in being and knowledge and accompanies all things with a "withness" (ma'yyah)²³ pertaining to His Essence and pure of mixture, incarnation, division and all that does not befit His Majesty, He is the end of every path and the goal of every wayfarer. In the Quran He added after His words, "And thou, surely thou guidest unto a straight path – the path of God, to whom belongs whatsoever is in the heavens, and whatsoever is in the earth", the words, "Do not all things reach God at last?" (XLII, 52). Thus He announces that the end of all things is God. And everything walks upon a path, either spiritual or physical according to the traveller. And God is its end, for, "Unto God is the journeying" (Quran III, 26).

So each of them, i.e., each of the paths, is a straight path, but there is no glory in His unrestricted relations where all differences are removed, like His unrestricted "withness" and accompaniment (of every being), the unrestricted straightness of His path, the fact that all Paths without restriction lead to Him in respect of His all-embracingness, and the unrestricted attention of His Essence and Attributes to creation – for verily there is no difference between His attention toward creating the Throne and the Supreme Pen on the one hand and His attention toward creating an ant on the other in respect of the Unity of His Essence and in respect of the act of paying attention. He said, "Thou seest not in the creation of the All-Merciful any disparity" (LXVII, 3). And this is also the case with the "withness" and the accompaniment by the Essence, for He encompasses "everything in mercy and knowledge" (Quran XL, 7). And here His mercy is His Being, for it is existence alone which things have in common despite their disparities and differences. And His knowledge at the plane of the Unity of His Essence does not differ from His Essence, nor is it distinguished from it, for here there is no multiplicity in any respect.

Therefore if it is merely established that He is the goal of everything, the end of every path and with everything, and that He encompasses both the inward and outward aspects of all things, the benefit does not become general, nor does felicity become complete. The benefits only appear according to the differentiation of degrees and stations, the differences among directions and paths, and the discrepancy among those things to which He calls and attracts you. Therefore God calls us to worship ²³ Just as "God is with the patient" (II, 153), "with the godfearing" (II, 194), "with them while they meditate at night discourse displeasing to Him" (IV, 108), etc., He is also with all other things as well, for He "embraces every thing in mercy and knowledge" (XL, 7). The term "withness" refers to this quality of not being separate from any being.

Him according to the path which connects us to our own particular felicity - which is the attainment of salvation and high degrees – not any path, for surely although every path will take us to Him according to one of the Names – for in one respect, every Name is the same as the Named – this brings no benefit or felicity; for the Names are different in respect of their natures and effects. How is "He who harms" comparable to "Him who gives benefits", or "the Bestower" to "the Preventer"? And how is "the Avenger" comparable to "the Forgiver", or "the Benign Benefactor" to "the Vanquisher"?

And it, i.e., the path which leads to our felicity, is what He prescribed for us through the tongue of the Prophet.

So owing to the first thing mentioned, i.e., that He is the end of every path and encompasses all things, His "mercy embraces all things" (Quran VII, 156); therefore the outcome and the ultimate issue is felicity, wherever the servant may be, whether in Paradise or hell. And since someone might imagine that felicity is to reach Paradise and its various degrees – so how should the end of everyone be Paradise, when some of them remain forever in the Fire? – the Shaykh generalizes his statement by saying, and it, i.e. felicity, is attaining that which is in agreement (mulâ'im) with the constitution of the servant, whether it be the degrees of Bliss or the levels of hellfire.

The divine mercy is of two kinds: first is the absolute mercy of the divine Essence, the "mercy of gratuitous gift" (imtinân), and it is this mercy which "embraces all things" (Quran VII, 156). From this mercy is derived every gift which is given without having been asked for, without a need existing, and without its being the recipient's due or the result of a merit permanently fixed within him or an act resulting in God's good-pleasure, as for example the blessings which are received in Paradise by a certain people in keeping with the mystery commonly known as "grace" (inâyah) and referred to in the hadîth of the Prophet which says that there will remain empty places in the Garden which God will fill with some of His creatures who have never done any good, to accomplish His previous decision and His words (in the hadîth), "To each one of you two (Heaven and hell) your fill."

The other mercy flows from the mercy of His Essence but is separated from it by certain conditions, including the "prescription" referred to in His words, "Your Lord has prescribed for Himself mercy" (Quran VI, 54) and "I shall prescribe it (My mercy) for those who are godfearing" (Quran VII, 156). So it is limited and conditional upon certain acts, states, etc.

The Shaykh refers to these two kinds with his words, And among mankind is he who attains mercy from pure gratuitous gift and sheer grace, without a precedent act which would require it or works which would attract it; on the contrary, by means of it he gains the power to perform all of his acts and works. And among them is he who attains it in respect of obligation, or in respect of its being obligatory upon God, since He has obligated Himself to bestow it in recompense for acts which He has prescribed. But this also is a gratuitous gift, for the servant is obliged to obey his master and carry out his commands. So when he obliges himself to give something in return, that is a mercy and gratuitous gift to the servant. The Shaykh refers to this point with his words, And he attains the reason for gaining it, i.e., the reason for gaining the "mercy of obligation", which is the obligation itself, from pure gratuitous gift.

But as for the godfearing servant, for whom God has prescribed mercy, as He says, "I shall prescribe it for those who are godfearing", he has two states: the first of them is a state in which he is a protection²⁴ for God from blameworthy things and from imperfections, by attributing them to himself, not to Him. And this is necessitated by fathoming the reality of things, for blameworthy and ugly things are all the effects of the nothingness which pertains to the servant, the possible being who receives existence. And the second is a state in which God is a protection for him from attributing to himself praiseworthy things, for he attributes virtues, beauties, praiseworthy qualities and perfection to God. So He is a protection for him from attributing to himself those things which do not truly pertain to his individual reality, for they are ontological matters, and Being belongs to God alone, or rather, Being is God in reality. And it, or God's being a protection for him, is obvious, because things pertaining to Being obviously return to Him.

XI

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Divine Opening in the Logos of Sâlih

Since the realities require and the knowledge of them as they are in themselves demands that results, whether in the mind or in the external world, only issue from numerical oddness, and since three is the first of the odd numbers, since oddness as usually defined is that a number capable of being subdivided into whole numbers cannot be subdivided into two equal parts, whereas the number one cannot be subdivided into whole numbers; God brought about the effusion of existence upon the world from three things: His Self or Essence, His Will and His Word. And the Reality, i.e. the divine He-ness in these three forms, is one, while the relations are different. Therefore He said, alluding to the three things, "Our only words to a thing, when We desire it, is that We say to it 'Be', and it is" (Quran XVI, 40), thus alluding to the Essence in three places ("We" and "Our"), to the Will in one place ("desire") and to the Word in two places ("words" and "say").

And do not let the combination of the premisses in philosophical reasoning veil you from confirming what we have said about oddness being necessary for a result to be achieved, even though the premisses are made up of four parts, i.e. the subject and object of each of the two premisses, for in reality they are three, since a single one of the four, i.e., the middle term, is repeated in the two premisses. So understand this. Therefore it remains valid to say that it is triplicity which brings about results, whether in the mind or in the external world. And the world is a result, without doubt.

²⁴ Here it is helpful to know that the word translated as "godfearing" (al-muttaqî) comes from the same root as the word for "protection" (al-wiqâyah) and means literally "protecting oneself", "being wary", or "fearing", and hence also "protecting God's interest in something", "fearing God with regard to something" or "showing regard for something for God's sake"

XII

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the Heart in the Logos of Shu'ayb

Know that the heart, that is, the heart of the knower of "Allah", for the heart of other than he is not called a heart in Sufi terminology, unless metaphorically, as has been said:

The heart is a window upon the Lord: why do you call the house of the devil a heart?

That which you have metaphorically called a heart – go, throw it to the dogs!

And I said the knower of "Allah", because the heart of the knower of any of the other divine Names does not possess the comprehensiveness which will be mentioned shortly. The Name "Allah" is the comprehensive unity of all of the divine Names. So any heart which comes to know it has come to know all of the Names. But no knower of any of the other Names knows the Name "Allah", for the knowledge of these Names does not necessitate its knowledge. Concerning such a heart the poet has said,

This is a pearl from the ocean of Intimacy, not a heart, the divine Majesty's spring of effusion, not a heart.

The story has become long and words drawn out: it is the sum of the mysteries of God, not a heart.

Although it, or the heart, comes to exist through the mercy of God, it is nonetheless wider than the mercy of God, because God has let us know that the heart of the servant embraces Him, for He said through the tongue of His Prophet, "Neither My earth nor My heaven embrace Me, but the heart of My believing servant does embrace Me". In contrast His mercy does not embrace Him, for its sway is only exercised over contingent beings. And this is a wondrous matter, if you understand.

When God – as reported in the collections of hadîth – undergoes constant changes of form on the Day of Resurrection, i.e., the forms of the beliefs of men in accordance with their receptivities and preparednesses, although in Himself He does not change from what He is in respect of Himself, then hearts which receive theophanies are for Him like containers for water. The water assumes form according to the form of the containers, although in itself it does not change from its essential reality. So understand the symbol we have mentioned, in order that you might understand the state of Him who is symbolized, for just as water has no shape in itself by which it becomes determined – rather, it takes the shape of its container – in the same way God, the Absolute, has no particular form in His Essence according to which He manifests Himself. On the contrary, He manifests Himself in the form of the servant who receives the theophany; for theophany only descends upon its loci in accordance with their preparednesses and their ontological receptivities. Likewise their preparednesses within the plane of objective existence are only the result of their Unseen and "unmade" (al-ghayr al-maj'ûl) preparednesses in the ontological level of the Essence's Knowledge of Itself. So whenever a locus on the plane of objective existence receives a theophany, it only reaches him in the form of his eternal and immutable archetype.

The theophanies of God follow the beliefs of men, and the beliefs of men follow individual ontological preparedness, and individual ontological preparedness is in accordance with the universal unmanifest preparedness, which is the attribute of the immutable archetypes of those who receive the theophany. And the immutable archetypes are the effusion of the Most Holy Emanation, which is the theophany of the Essence in the forms and preparednesses of the archetypes. And here there is a great difference, for some of the archetypes are the form of particular Names, with their differences in degree; some of them are the form of universal Names, likewise with their various differences; and some are the form of the Name which embraces all the particulars and universals.

So God has two theophanies: one is the unmanifest theophany of the Essence, which is the effusion of the immutable archetypes along with their general preparednesses – and there is no doubt that the scope and capacity belonging to the preparedness of the locus of theophany is in accordance with the scope and capacity of the archetype. And the second is the ontological and visible theophany, which follows the preparedness, compass and scope of the locus.

And since beliefs are various, and preparednesses are different, whenever God manifests Himself, anyone who has limited Him to the form of a particular description denies Him in other than that form. Whereas whoever has disengaged Him from the limitation of one form other than another – like the Perfect Men and the gnostics – does not deny Him in any form of theophany. Rather, he glorifies Him as he should and performs the worship worthy of His station, for the theophanies of God possess no end at which the perfect gnostic and the understanding knower of God might stop.

Wear the turban, or the dress, or the robe! By thy father, it will only increase my love!

Do you not see that God "Every moment is in a state" (Quran LV, 29)? In the same way, the heart is constantly undergoing transformation in accordance with His transformations in the states of its consciousness. Therefore He said, "Surely in that", i.e. in the Quran, "there is a reminder to him who has a heart" (L, 37) which undergoes transformation according to different forms and attributes. He did not say, "who possesses a reason", because the reason becomes limited according to particular beliefs, so the Divine Reality – Who is infinite – becomes restricted in that which it perceives, in contrast to the heart, for since it is a locus for diverse theophanies from the levels of Divinity and Lordship and since it undergoes transformation according to the forms of these theophanies, it remembers its forgotten existence before it appeared in this physical and elemental level, and it finds here what it had lost, as the Prophet said, "Wisdom is the believer's stray camel." So understand!

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the Power in the Logos of Lot

God said, "God is He that created you of weakness, then He appointed after weakness strength, then after strength He appointed weakness" (XXX, 54). Now the first weakness without dispute is the weakness of the constitution in the understanding of both the majority and the elite (the exoteric authorities and the Sufis). And the strength which is after it, or after the original weakness, is the strength of the constitution, to which is added in the understanding of the elite the strength of the spiritual state (hâl), which gives man the power to exercise free disposal (tasarruf) and domination (ta'thîr) in the world through Intention (himmah).

And the second weakness is the weakness of the constitution, to which is added in the understanding of the elite the weakness attained through knowledge, or the knowledge of God, which weakens man and extracts him from his accidental strength and returns him to his original weakness, until it joins him to the clay which was his origin. So he has no power over anything, and he becomes in himself and in his own personal essence, disregarding the manifestation of the divine Qualities within him, in his own eyes like a suckling infant with its mother, for just as the infant sees no power or strength in itself and entrusts itself completely to its mother, who feeds and nurtures it, the gnostic assumes the same relation to the Real Being and Absolute Lord.

And therefore, because of the weakness resulting from the knowledge of God and the lack of power to exercise free disposal over anything, Lot said, "O would that I had power against you", i.e., O would that I had power in the form of a strong Intention with which to resist and oppose you, "or might take refuge in a strong pillar" (Quran XI, 80), meaning by "strong pillar" according to the exoteric interpretation the strong tribe, which vanquishes its enemies. And the Prophet says, indicating what Lot meant by "strong pillar" according to the esoteric interpretation, "God have mercy on my brother Lot. He was taking refuge in a strong pillar", meaning by that, "the weakness resulting from knowledge", i.e., through these words he indicates the weakness which had overcome Lot because of his knowledge of God, since he first shows his sympathy for him by praying for mercy for him, and this tells of his weakness and incapacity. Then he links him to himself through brotherhood, which shows that Lot shared with the Prophet in this weakness, which is so obviously actualized in the latter. So the "strong pillar" is God, who governs him and nurtures him.

XIV

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Destiny in the Logos of Ezra

"To God belongs the argument conclusive" (Quran VI, 149) against His creatures, for they are the known by God, and the known, whatever it may be, bestows upon the knower of it, whoever he may be, or makes him perceive what it is in itself, i.e. in its own essence in terms of the states which occur for it for all eternity and their preparednesses, and that perception is knowledge. And knowledge has no effect upon what is known, in the sense that it might occasion within the known that which is outside of its own essence; rather, it follows the known, and judgment concerning the known is subordinate to it. So there is no judgment by the knower concerning the known except according to it. i.e., according to the known and what it requires in respect of its particular and universal preparedness. Therefore God did not appoint unbelief and disobedience for the creatures by Himself. Rather, He appointed it because of the requirements of their immutable archetypes and because of their seeking through the tongue of their preparedness that He make them unbelievers and disobedient, just as the individual essence of a dog requires the form of a dog and that it be considered ritually impure. And this is the very secret of destiny.

Now if you say, "The archetypes and their preparednesses are an effusion from God; therefore He has made them like that"; I will answer, "The archetypes are not 'made' (maj'ûl), they are intelligible forms belonging to the Divine Names which are not posterior to God except at the level of their own reality, but not in respect to time. So they are eternal, unchanging and immutable. When it is said that they are an 'effusion', this means that they are posterior to Him considered at the level of their own reality (not that they are created)."

Know that every messenger is a prophet, and every prophet is a saint; so every messenger is a saint. So the messengers are of the highest rank, since they combine the three levels; then the prophets, since they combine two. But the level of their sanctity is higher than that of their prophecy, and their prophecy is higher than their messengerhood, for their sanctity is their aspect of divinity, since they have been annihilated in God; and their prophecy is their angelic aspect, since through it comes their relation to the angelic world, from which they receive revelation; and their messengerhood is their aspect of humanity, which corresponds to and establishes contact with the human world.

The Shaykh writes, "When you hear from one of the people of God (the Sufis), or it is related to you that he has said, that sanctity is higher than prophecy, he does not mean anything other than what we have said", i.e., that the sanctity of the prophet is higher than his prophecy. "Or if he says that the saint is above the prophet and the messenger, verily he means by that 'in the same person'. This is because the messenger in respect of being a saint is more perfect than he is in respect of his being a prophet or messenger, not that the saint who follows him is higher than he."

XV

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Prophecy in the Logos of Jesus

Among the properties of the spirit, which is a breath of the Merciful possessing life as one of its inherent attributes, is that it never passes over a thing from among the receptacles and it never touches anything with its form pertaining to the World of Image-Exemplars without that thing coming to life. But when that thing comes to life, the power of free disposal of the spirit will be according to that thing's constitution and preparedness, not according to the spirit itself, for it is sacrosanct and has no fixed measure or particularized aspect. So if that thing possesses a harmonious constitution receptive to life, all of the properties of life including sensation and movement will appear within it according to its particular constitution. And if not, then a trace of life will appear in it, according to its form, like the low of the Calf as will be mentioned.

Do you not see that God's breathing (nafkh), or the divine spirit breathed, into bodies made complete (and ready) to receive the breathing of the spirit, in spite of its being pure of the characteristics of those bodies and (in spite of) the elevation of its ontological level in itself and the fact that it is situated at a level where it is beyond being delimited by their attributes, how its free disposal, or the free disposal of the spirit within the body into which it has been breathed or within other things by means of the body, will be to the extent of the preparedness of that body which is breathed into and its receptivity, not in accordance with the spirit in itself? Do you not see how the Samaritan, when he understood the effect of the spirits upon that which they pass over and touch "seized a handful of dust from the messenger's track" (Quran XX, 96), i.e., from the track of the Faithful Spirit, or Gabriel, whose image-exemplar had appeared upon Burâq²⁵, who was also a spirit appearing in the form of an image-exemplar? So the spirit affected the dust which it had passed over, causing life to course through it, and the Samaritan knew this through his inner light and the power of his preparedness. So he seized a handful of dust from his track and cast it into the form of the Calf made from the ornaments of the people. So the Calf lowed after it came to life (cf. Quran VII, 148), and that is the result of the preparedness of its constitution, which followed the form of the Calf. And had it been the form of another animal, the sound appropriate to that form would have been attributed to it.

XVI The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the All-Merciful in the Logos of Solomon

Since she, or Bilqîs (the queen of Sheba), belonged sincerely to him, or Solomon, in that she was obedient to him and believed in him, without being aware of it, she said to her people concerning the letter of Solomon when the Hoopoe cast it to her, and she showed it to them (Quran XXVII, 29), with the aim of manifesting the power of her Intention and exercising free disposal with it among them so that they would obey him, that it was "an honorable letter" (Quran XXVII, 29).

When Bilqîs opened Solomon's letter and became aware of its contents, the divine grace which had encompassed her beforehand and the link formed by her innate compatibility came into motion. She believed and obeyed, and presented its contents to her followers and adherents, in order that everyone who shared with her in that homogeneity and compatibility would come forward and accept what the letter had said. For the basis of faith in the prophets and messengers is this compatibility and homogeneity, not the observing of miracles or the witnessing of wonders.

And Âsif, Solomon's vizier, only manifested the power and concentration of Intention to bring the throne, or the throne of Bilqîs from Sheba before the viewer's glance returned to him, without Solomon, although Solomon was stronger and more powerful than he, in order to let the jinn know that Solomon's eminence was mighty, since this ability and powerful exercise of free disposal was possessed by one of his attendants. So what would have been the case if Solomon himself had exercised free disposal?

The superiority of Âsif over that jinn who said, "I will bring it to thee, before thou risest from thy place" (Quran XXVII, 39), was in the exercise of the power of free disposal through his soul with the aid of cosmic influences and the natural properties of things, for the returning of the glance to the viewer is faster than his rising from his place (referring to Âsif's words in the Quran, "I will bring it to thee, before ever thy glance returns to thee" (XXVII, 40). So Âsif's action was more perfect than that of the jinn, for he exercised his free disposal upon the individual essence (âyn) of the throne by depriving it of existence and recreating it in one instant. He deprived it of existence in its (original) position and gave it existence in front of Solomon, for the word of the Perfect Man is like the word of God concerning something he wants to come into existence. When he says "Be!", at that very instant that thing comes into existence – however, with the permission of God – because God has become his members and his physical and spiritual faculties. And it was because of this relationship (between him and God) that this Perfect Man was the vizier of Solomon.

And since she, or Bilqīs, said in answer to the question concerning her throne, which was, "Is thy throne like this? (Quran XXVII, 42), "It seems the same" (XXVII, 42), one can detect her knowledge of the renewal of creation at each instant, for she said, "It seems". And he showed her the pavillion of crystal, so she supposed it was like a spreading water "and she bared her legs" (Quran XXVII, 44) so the water would not touch her clothing. But it was not a spreading water in reality, just as the visible throne brought into existence before Solomon was not the same throne which she left in Sheba in respect of its form, for it had discarded the first form and assumed another, while the substance, upon which the two thrones imposed successively their forms, was one. So he showed her by that that the state of her throne was like that of the pavillion: as for the throne, because it was deprived of existence, and what the Creator created was similar to that which had vanished; and as for the pavillion, because in its extreme delicacy and limpidity it became similar to clear water, while (in reality) it was different. So he showed her with his actions that she was right in her words, "It seems the same."

And this, or the renewal of creation at each instant, is not particular to the throne of Bilqīs; rather it is valid in all of the world, both its celestial and terrestrial parts, for the whole world is in constant change, and the individual determination of everything that changes is perpetually renewed. So in each instant a determination other than the determination which existed in the previous instant comes into being, although the One Essence which undergoes these changes remains in its state; for the One Essence is the Reality of God, which becomes determined according to the First Determination as necessitated by His knowledge of His Essence. And It is the same as the intelligible substance which receives these forms which are called "the world." All of the forms are accidents which It undergoes and which change at every instant. But those who are veiled do not know this, so they are in doubt about this constant renewal in all things (reference to Quran L, 15: "Yet they are in doubt about a new creation.")

The sovereignty which will not belong to anyone after him, referred to in Solomon's prayer, "My Lord! Forgive me and bestow upon me a sovereignty such as shall not belong to any after me" (Quran XXXVIII, 36), is manifesting within the visible world (shahādah) the totality of the sovereignties pertaining to the world by way of exercising free disposal within it, i.e., within the world, not manifesting only some of these sovereignties, for each of the individual sovereignties which God bestowed upon Solomon has been shared (by one or another of the prophets and saints); and not the power and ability over the totality without manifesting it, for the Poles and Perfect Men before and after him realized this station, but they did not manifest it.

The subjugation of the winds (cf. Quran XXXVIII, 36) with which Solomon was distinguished and preferred over others and which God made part of the sovereignty which was not bestowed upon any one after him, is the subjugation of the fiery spirits, which are the spirits of the jinn, as God said, "And He created the jinn of a smokeless fire" (LV, 15), because they, or the fiery spirits, are spirits which exercise free disposal in the winds, which are like their bodies.

God's words, "Without reckoning", when He said to Solomon, "This is our gift; bestow or withhold without reckoning" (Quran XXXVIII, 39), mean: Thou wilt not, O Solomon, be made answerable in the hereafter for them, or for what God granted thee of sovereignty, wealth, subjugation of the winds, etc. The Shaykh says in the Fusûs, "We know from the direct tasting granted in this path that Solomon's asking (for a sovereignty such as would not belong to anyone after him) was by the command of God. And when petition occurs according to the divine command, the petitioner receives the full reward for his petition", because he is obedient to his Lord and following His command. "And if God wills, He fulfills his wish in what he has sought from Him; and if He wills, He withholds, for verily the servant has carried out what God has made obligatory upon him in terms of obeying His command in what he asks of his Lord. Now if he asked this on his own without the command of his Lord, he would be asked for an accounting of it."

XVII

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Existence in the Logos of David

Since the station of prophecy and rank of messengerhood are a distinction conferred by God and one of the infinite divine gifts – not a reward deriving from a previous act, nor a gift springing from the expectation of a subsequent thanksgiving or worship – and in the same way since most of the gifts which derive from this station are effusions of pure bounty and beneficence and of perfect mercy and gratuitous gift, in this Wisdom the Shaykh alludes to some of the gifts which David received with his words, He gave David as a bounty, i.e., as grace and gratuitous gift, knowledge of Himself not necessitated by his works. For if his works had necessitated it, it would have been a reward, whereas it has already been mentioned that prophecy and messengerhood are a distinction conferred by God and unrelated to acquisition and effort, just as are most of the gifts and favors which pertain to this station. And in the same way he gave him Solomon, for He said, "And we gave unto David Solomon" (XXXVIII, 30). And there remain His words, "And We gave David bounty from Us" (XXXIV, 10). Was this gift referred to as a "giving of bounty" the giving of a reward for his works, or did it mean a gratuitous gift? Obviously it is the second, because He mentioned that He gave David bounty, and He did not say that He gave him what He gave him as a reward for his works; and He did not seek recompense from him for that bounty. When He did seek thanksgiving for that through works, He sought it from his House, not from him, as He said, "Perform works, O House of David, as thanksgiving" (XXXIV, 13), because blessings upon the forebears are blessings upon the descendents. So in David's case it was the bestowal of a gratuitous gift and a grace, and recompense was sought from his House. And He said, after seeking thanksgiving from the House of David in the form of works, "and few are those who are truly thankful among My servants" (XXXIV, 13), employing the intensive form, or "truly thankful" (shakûr), in order that it might embrace "prescriptive thanksgiving" (shukr al-taklîf), which the servants are required to perform according to the prescriptions of the Divine Law, and "voluntary thanksgiving" (shukr al-tabarru'), which is not prescribed, but which the servants perform voluntarily, for to intensify one's thanksgiving is to perform both of its kinds. Voluntary thanksgiving is referred to by the words, "Shall I not be a thankful servant?" – the words of the Prophet, when he stayed awake the whole night until his feet became swollen, and it was said to him, "Refrain, for God has forgiven thee thy early sins and the later," and he answered the above. And prescriptive thanksgiving is that which is commanded by God, like His words, "And give thanks to God" (11, 172) and His words, "And be you thankful for the blessing of God" (XIV, 114). And between the two kinds of thanksgiving there exists a difference of degree or qualitative disparity which is equivalent to the difference between the two kinds of people who render thanks; so just as he who renders thanks voluntarily is more excellent than he who renders it as a result of prescription, in the same way voluntary thanksgiving is more excellent than prescriptive thanksgiving. This is patent and obvious for him who understands things from God, and not on the basis of his own reason.

And David is specifically appointed to the vicegerency (khilâfah) by God to judge among men and exercise free disposal among men, for God said, "David, behold, We have appointed thee a vicegerent in the earth, therefore judge between men justly" (XXXVIII, 26); and the imamate, i.e., he is also specifically appointed to his imamate, for imamate in relation to vicegerency is like sanctity in relation to prophecy, since every vicegerent is an imam but not the reverse. Whereas other than he, or other than David, like Adam or Abraham, is not so. As for Abraham, this is because God's words concerning him were, "Behold, I make you an imam for the people" (II, 124). He did not say "vicegerent", even though we know that here the imamate is a vicegerency; but it is not as if He had mentioned it by its most particular name, i.e., vicegerency itself. And as for Adam, although his vicegerency was stipulated by the text of the Quran, it is not like the stipulation concerning David. For God said to the angels, "I am setting in the earth a vicegerent" (II, 30); He did not say, "I am setting Adam as a vicegerent". And what is mentioned afterwards in his story does not indicate that he is that very vicegerent whom God stipulated in the Quran. And also He did not make explicit His appointing him a judge among men. And here we are only talking about explicit mention in the text of the Quran.

And he who has been given general vicegerency by God has been given rule and free disposal in all the world; and David was of this type, and therefore he was given the power of free disposal over the various kinds of beings, as the Shaykh indicates with his words: the mountains' echoing God's praise with him – for whenever he chanted and echoed the praise of God, the mountains would chant and echo it with him (cf. Quran XXXIV, 10) – and likewise the birds' echoing praise with him announce the agreement, or the agreement of these two kinds of being with him and their obedience to him. And the reason these two kinds were specified as agreeing and concurring is that they are the beings the most disdainful of man, the most elevated above him, and the most inclined to reject obeying him, because of the sway which hardness and lightness hold over them. Obviously both of them refuse to obey or to accept the power of free disposal over them: as for the first, because of the extremity of its "grossness" and heaviness, which refuses to be influenced; and as for the second, because of its extreme lightness and the fact that it is not fixed before the agent when it is influenced and controlled. Evidently if these two extremes with their exaggerated refusal and their disdain do obey David and agree with him, the agreement of man with him is more suitable, for man has a position between the mountains and the birds and approaches a state of equilibrium. Necessarily David's relationship to man is firmer and more manifest (i.e., it was much easier for him to exercise free disposal over man).

XVIII

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Breath in the Logos of Jonah

His blessing, or the blessing of Jonah, returned upon his people, for they believed, and their belief profited them and removed the chastisement from them (Quran X, 98), because God attached them to him in the way that the part is attached to the whole or the branch to the root; and the properties of the root are valid for the branch. Therefore, when the grace and mercy of God reached Jonah, it also reached his people, as He said, "Why was there never a city that believed, and its belief profited it? – Except the people of Jonah" (X, 98). And that, or the return of his blessing upon his people, was in spite of his anger for Him, when his breast became straitened by the extent to which he reminded them but they did not remember and continued in their disbelief, so he left them. And he thought that would be permissible, since he only did it out of anger for God, zeal in His religion and hatred for disbelief and the disbelievers. But he should have been patient and awaited permission from God to leave them. So he was stricken with the belly of the fish. And since his blessing returned upon them in spite of his being angry with them for God, how would it have been if his state with them had been the state of satisfaction?

He thought well of God, as He reported, "And he thought that we would not straiten him" (XXI, 87), or We would not harass him for his leaving his people without waiting for God's command, so He delivered him out of grief because of the blessing of that thought. Even so does He deliver the believers (cf. Quran XXI, 88), i.e., those who are sincere in their states, like Jonah was sincere in his state, i.e., his anger in God. And in His kindness and His grace towards him, He "caused to grow over him a tree of gourds" (XXXVIII, 146) – for one of the benefits of this kind of tree is that flies do not gather near it – so he took shelter in its shade when he came out of the fish's stomach like a baby bird without feathers; for if flies had alighted on him, they would have annoyed him. Then when he cast lots with them, i.e. the people of the ship, when he left his people in anger and boarded the ship, and it stopped; so they said, "There is a runaway among us", it being the belief of sailors that a ship will not move if it is carrying a runaway; he made himself one of them, i.e., one of the people of the ship, so he said, "Cast lots", and the lot came out against him, so he threw himself in the water. So the mercy embraced all of them as a result of the blessing of his making himself one of them during the casting of lots; for the fish swam along with the ship, lifting its head out of the water while Jonah breathed within it and praised God. And it did not leave them until they reached the shore. It spit him out healthy, nothing of him having changed. So when they saw that, Mercy encompassed them, and they submitted their wills to God.

XIX

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the Unseen in the Logos of Job

Since complaint to God does not contradict patience – and therefore God praised Job for his patience even though he prayed for the removal of his affliction – nor did he, i.e., Job, oppose the divine Omnipotence by being patient and refraining from complaining to Him; rather he complained and called out to Him, "Behold, affliction has visited me, and Thou art the most merciful of the merciful" (Quran XXI, 83); and this lack of opposition was known from him, God gave him his household by bringing to life his sons and daughters who had died and He provided him with children the like of them with them.

And he stamped his foot at his Lord's command, since God commanded Job with the words, "Stamp thy foot! This is a laving-place cool, and a drink" (XXXV1I1, 42). So he removed through that stamping his pains and his ills, and there sprang up also through that stamping from beneath his feet water, which is the secret of life, and its root, for verily through water come alive those physical and elemental bodies which are alive. Therefore it is the root of life, or the life which courses through every natural, or physical and corporeal, living thing. For from water he was created, and through it he recovered from his pains and ills. So He made it a mercy from Him and a reminder to us and to him.

And He treated him kindly in the oath he had made, when he swore during his illness to beat his wife with a hundred lashes if he recovered. So when he recovered, God ordered him to take a bundle of rushes and to strike his wife with it (Quran XXXVIII, 45). So God expiated his oath with the easiest thing for him and for her. And He told us about this to teach us and to authorize us to discriminate among those who fulfill their oaths, for we still have this authorization (to act gently in fulfilling oaths). It has been related that the Prophet was brought a weakling who had committed adultery with a slave girl. So he said, "Take the branch of a date tree containing a cluster of one hundred stalks, and strike him with it once."

And expiation was appointed and promulgated in the community of Muhammad to veil them from the punishment directed toward them for breaking oaths. In this sentence there is an allusion to the fact that the word "expiation" (kaffârah) comes from the root "to cover" (kufra), since it covers the person who makes the oath and protects him from the punishment for breaking it. Expiation is an act of worship which God commanded, and commanding it before the fact is to command the breaking of oaths, since the actualization of the first is dependent upon the actualization of the second. Therefore breaking oaths is commanded by God, but when he, or the person who has made the oath, has seen something better than what he had sworn to do. Then He will respect the oaths, i.e., God will respect their right because they include His remembrance (dhikr), since He has prescribed expiation as a means to prevent the swearer from being punished. Even though he is committing an act of obedience, he is remembering God in his oath with one of his members. So the member which remembers Him, which is the tongue, seeks the result of His remembrance in terms of mercy, reward and His protecting it – along with the other members – from punishment; for it is the part which remembers which protects the others, just as the world is protected by the existence of the Perfect Man. The fact that he is disobedient or obedient is another factor, which in no way affects that member which remembers in terms of reward or punishment; for man in respect of his being compounded of different spiritual and physical realities is a multiplicity, even though he is one in terms of his unified whole. And the obedience or disobedience of one part of him does not necessitate the obedience or disobedience of another part.

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Divine Majesty in the Logos of John

Know that there is no being in existence whose multiplicity of attributes and acts is consumed by the oneness of its essence in such a way that every number and everything numerable are annihilated within it except God. So part of His grace to John was that He gave him a share of this perfection, and so He placed him in His Own station. He incorporated his name, his qualities and his acts into the oneness of his essence by combining within his name the denotation of all these three. Thus they became united in verbal existence: his name denotes his essence by being his proper name; it denotes his acts because it is a form (Yahyâ) related to a verb which indicates his revivification (ihyâ') of the remembrance of Zachariah; and it denotes his qualities because he only revivified the remembrance of Zachariah by becoming qualified by his attributes and manifesting them.

Since oneness requires priority (awwaliyyah) and not being preceded by others, He placed him, or John, in His position in the priority of names, for just as the Name "Allah" possesses priority in that no one was named by it before Him, He bestowed upon him priority in his name; for He did not appoint for him beforehand a namesake (Quran XIX, 7). And after that, i.e., after He gave him priority in that name, he was followed in his name by others, in order that it might trace back to him and he might be the source of designation by this name.

The Intention, which is one of the inward causes (of things and events), of his father, Zachariah, affected him when his heart, or the heart of Zachariah, was filled with the love of Mary, for verily the first reason for the existence of John was that his father deemed Mary's state to be good. So he concentrated his Intention while seeking refuge in God through supplication, and his Lord answered him and bestowed upon him John. So He made him chaste through this mental image, i.e., by reason of Zachariah's forming an image of Mary and deeming her states to be good while he directed his Intention toward the existence of John.

And the philosophers have come to know of the likeness of this, for (they say) when a person has intercourse with his wife, at the time of discharging sperm into her womb he should maintain within his soul and she should also maintain within her soul the image of the most excellent of beings, for the child will partake of that image, from its states, attributes and moral qualities, to an ample degree and full share, if not completely, for the child only takes form according to those psychic qualities and attitudes, physical contingencies and imaginal and mental forms which hold sway over the parents.

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the Master in the Logos of Zachariah

You have already come to know that Intention is one of the inward causes, and inward causes are stronger in their domination than ordinary outward causes and more deserving of being attributed to God. For this reason the inhabitants of the World of Command (amr) are stronger than the inhabitants of the World of Creation. In addition, let us remember the matter of, "And We set his wife right for him" (Quran XXI, 90), for if it were not for the succour of God to Zachariah and his wife by means of an Unseen power of Lordship outside of ordinary causes, his wife would not have been set aright and she would not have been able to bear a child. Therefore when God gave him the good news of John, he found it strange and said, "O my Lord, how shall I have a son, seeing my wife is barren, and I have attained to the declining of old age" (XIX, 8). So God answered him with His words, "Said He, 'So it shall be; the Lord says, 'Easy is that for Me, seeing that I created thee aforetime, when thou wast nothing '' (XIX, 9); i.e., even if something like this is difficult, or rather impossible, in terms of outward causes, in respect to the Possessor of Perfect Power, of Strength and of Might it is easy. Then just as that power coursed from God into Zachariah and his wife, it went from them to John. Therefore God said to him, "O John, take the Book forcefully" (XIX, 12).

When Zachariah attained to the mercy of Lordship, i.e., God's nurturing him through bounty and succour and accomplishing that which was for his well-being, and also setting things right for him, as indicated by His words, "And We set his wife right for him", he concealed his call to his Lord and his prayer to Him from the hearing of those present. So he called Him in his secret center (sirr) (cf. Quran XIX, 3), in order that his Intention might be the most concentrated and the farthest from dispersion and its effect might be the greatest. So it, i.e. his secret call, gave rise through the power of its effectiveness to that which is not usually given rise to, i.e., John, who was born between a declining old man and a barren old woman, for whom it is not usual to bear children, for barrenness prevents production. Therefore He said, "the barren wind" (LI, 41), and He distinguished between it and "the winds fertilising" (XV, 21), for these are such winds as produce good by bringing forth rain clouds, whereas "the barren wind" is what is opposed to them, for wherever barrenness exists, it prevents production. And God made John the inheritor of what he, or Zachariah, possessed, i.e., knowledge, prophecy, prayer for guidance, the avoidance of error, etc., through the blessing of his prayer, when he said, "So give me from Thee a kinsman who shall be my inheritor and the inheritor of the House of Jacob" (XIX, 5-6). So he, or John, was similar to Mary in inheritance, for when Zachariah became Mary's guardian, he caused her to be his heir in some qualities of perfection; or (he was similar to her) in being chaste; for she was one of the things which was with Zachariah, because he was her guardian. So when John inherited what was with him, he inherited some of her qualities, so he resembled her in them. And in the same way He made him inheritor of a group of the House of Abraham, i.e., prophets, saints and men of knowledge, in the above mentioned things.

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Intimacy in the Logos of Elias

He, that is, Elias, says, addressing his people who adhered to the worship of an idol whom they called "Baal", "Do you call on Baal, and abandon the Best of creators?" (Quran XXXVII, 125), and thus he makes creatorship a quality shared by God and what is other than He. And God says, "Is He who creates as he who does not create?" (XVI, 17), affirming that creation belongs to Him and negating it from others. So apparently there is a contradiction between these two verses. Therefore the Shaykh points to their reconciliation with his words, so the "creation" by mankind understood from Elias's words is determination (taqdîr), and the other creation is the bestowal of existence (ijâd).

XXIII

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Virtue in the Logos of Loqman

Since Loqman knew that associating others with God is a mighty wrong to that which is being associated with Him, because that which is associated is a determined being identical with the Absolute Being of God according to the determination, which is one of His states or theophanies; while the associator believes that it is a being other than and sharing with Him in the level of Divinity – thus he has not put it in its place, which is precisely how "wrong" is defined – then it, or association, is one of the wrongs done to the servants in Loqman's mind, because that which is associated, whatever it is, is one of His servants.

And he, or Loqman, possessed directives concerning the Divinity, such as belief in Him, not associating anything with Him, obeying His commands and avoiding what He prohibited, the directives of the messengers. And God witnessed that He gave him wisdom (hikmah) (Quran XXXI, 12) – so he bridled (hakama) his soul with it – and when He gave him wisdom, He gave him the comprehensive good, or the good which comprehends and embraces many particulars, as He said, "And whoso is given wisdom has been given much good" (II, 269).

XXIV

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of the Imamate in the Logos of Aaron

Aaron to Moses, when he made him vicegerent over his people and went to meet his Lord at the appointed time, is in the position of the deputies (nawwâb) of Muhammad to Muhammad after his withdrawal from this physical level of existence on his way to his Lord. So just as Muhammad's deputies among the Perfect Men and the Poles are his heirs and vicegerents in his community – they exercise free disposal within it as he did – so Aaron was the heir to Moses and his vicegerent among his people and exercised free disposal among them as he did. So let the saint who is an heir and inherits from the prophets before him consider from whom he inherits, for the heir is either Muhammadan, or non-Muhammadan; and the non-Muhammadan may be the heir to Moses, Jesus, Abraham or others of the prophets; and let the heir also consider in what he is asked to act as deputy and heir, whether in knowledge, state and station altogether, or in knowledge without state and station, or in knowledge and state without station. So the soundness and strength of his inheritance from the prophet will help him to take his benefactor's place in it, or take the place of that prophet who is as it were his benefactor in what he has been asked to act as deputy. So he takes knowledge for example from the source from which the prophet from whom he inherits also takes it. For verily the sciences of the prophets are divine gifts and are the result of unveiling through theophany; they are not acquired or earned. Therefore it is necessary that true inheritance also be the result of a gift, not transmitted or rational, and that the saint-inheritor inherits his knowledge from the source from which the prophet and messenger acquired their knowledge. The king of the gnostics Abu Yazid al-Bastami said to some of the exoteric scholars and transmitters of laws, traditions and sayings, "You take your knowledge dead from the dead, and we take our knowledge from the Living who does not die." The same is true of states and stations. So whoso does not take them from God as the men of old took them, but rather memorizes their words and sayings and transmits from them, is not a true inheritor, but is only so figuratively speaking.

So whoever of the saint-inheritors partakes of his character traits, i.e., the character traits and attributes of the prophet from whom he inherits, in his exercise of free-disposal is as if he were he, as the Prophet said, "The men of knowledge of my community are like the prophets of the Children of Israel."

XXV The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Elevation in the Logos of Moses

Know that when God willed to manifest His perfect signs in the Logos of Moses, and the effect of this will coursed through the celestial and terrestrial causes – such as the positions and movements of the heavens which prepare the substances of the world, the mixtures of the elements, and the preparednesses made receptive and ready to manifest all of this – and when the time of his appearance drew close, numerous human constitutions became determined in accordance with the realities of what existed within Moses's spirit before the determination of his perfect and prophet-worthy constitution, and to these constitutions particular spirits became attached. At the same time the sages of the period told Pharaoh that his end and the end of his kingdom would be at the hand of a child born in that time. So Pharaoh ordered the death of all of the sons born to the Children of Israel as a precaution against what God had foreordained and predestined, not knowing that there is no way to resist His destiny or delay His command. Hence this became the cause of these spirits being combined in their own world, their becoming attached to the spirit of Moses and their not being dispersed and scattered far from him by means of bodily attachments and being immersed in the physical world. Therefore he became strengthened by them, their characteristics combined within him, and he was aided by their faculties. All of this was a particular favor of God to Moses and a confirmation, by aiding him with those spirits, like His aiding him with the celestial Spirits. So when Moses's spirit became attached to his body, those spirits, as well as the celestial Spirits, cooperated in aiding him with power and victory, and their life coursed into him. To this the Shaykh alludes with his words,

The life of everyone whom Pharaoh killed for his sake coursed into him. Therefore his flight when he was afraid that they would kill him was only to save the life of those who had been killed. So it is as if he fled for the sake of others, i.e., those children who had been killed. Therefore, because of his mercy and compassion for others, God bestowed upon him messengerhood, which is a particular rank within prophecy, speaking (to him) without intermediary (cf. Quran VII, 144) and the imamate, which is dominion, or domination over and the exercise of free disposal in the world. Then, since He had given him the gift of speaking (to him), He spoke to him in the very form of his need, i.e., in the very form of what he required, or fire, because of the complete concentration of his Intention upon it. So we come to know from the theophany of God in the form of the fire because of the concentration of Moses's Intention upon it that concentration produces effects. And it, or concentration (jam'iyyah), is acting and producing effects through Intention, which is aspiration and the turning of one's attention toward something with all of one's faculties.

And when the like of this was known by him who knew among the believers and those who obey God, as well as others, he, or some of them, strayed from the path of his own guidance by acting through the concentration of his Intention in something not pleasing to God, while other than he was guided by it, i.e., by acting through the concentration of his Intention in something pleasing to God. So He put it, or acting through Intention and concentration, in the place of the Quran in the similitude struck concerning it: He said, "Thereby He leads many astray, and thereby He guides many; and thereby He leads none astray save the ungodly" (II, 26), and they, or the ungodly, are those who have deviated from the Path of Guidance which is in it. Here the Shaykh alludes to one of the inner meanings of this verse, for "Qur'an" means literally "gathering" and "concentration."

XXVI

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Everlasting Refuge in the Logos of Khalid

He, or Khalid, made his sign indicating his prophecy to be after he departed for his Lord, so he let his sign perish, since he did not manifest it during his lifetime, and he let his people perish also, for he did not show it to them, so they let him perish. Therefore the Prophet said to Khalid's daughter, "Welcome to the daughter of a prophet whose people let him perish!" And it was only his sons who let him perish, since they did not let the people who were believers open his grave because of the shame which befalls the Arabs resulting from their customs pertaining to the zeal of the "Age of Ignorance" (before Islam).

Khalid's story is as follows: he dwelt with his people in Aden. A great fire came out of a cave and destroyed the farms and flocks, so his people sought refuge with him. Khalid began to beat the fire with his staff until it retreated before him back into the cave. Then he said to his sons, "I shall enter the cave after the fire and extinguish it." And he ordered them to call him after three full days, for if they were to call him before that, he would come out and die. But if they waited three full days, he would come out healthy. So when he entered, they waited two days. Then Satan filled them with unrest and they did not wait the full three days but thought that he had died. So they called him, and he came out of the cave with a wound on his head which had been produced by their call. So he said, "You have caused me to perish, and you have let my words and instructions perish."

Then he told them that he would die and ordered them to bury him and watch over his grave for forty days, for a flock of sheep would come to them led by a donkey whose tail had been cut off. So when the donkey stopped before his grave, they should open it and he would rise up and tell them about the states of the Isthmus with certainty and having observed them. So they waited forty days, and the flock came led by the bob-tailed donkey. It stopped before his grave, and the believers among his people made as if to open it. But his sons refused to let them in fear of disgrace and lest they be called "the sons of him whose grave was opened." So it was the pagan ignorance of the Arabs which prompted them in this manner, and they caused his instructions to perish and let him perish.

XXVII

The Quintessence of the Wisdom of Singularity in the Logos of Muhammad

The Wisdom of Singularity was dedicated to the Logos of Muhammad because he is the first determination with which the One Essence determined Itself before it manifested Itself in any of the other infinite Self-determinations. And these Self-determinations are ranked according to genus, species, kind and individual, some of them included under the others. So he encompasses all of the Self-determinations, and he is one and singular in existence, without parallel, for no Self-determination is equal to him in rank; and there is nothing above him but the Absolute One Essence, which is "purified" from every determination, attribute, name, designation, definition and description. So to him belongs the absolute singularity. In addition, singularity was actualized for the first time through his immutable archetype, since the first archetype to be effused by means of the Most Holy Emanation was his. So he attained through the unique Essence, the level of Divinity and his immutable archetype the supreme singularity.

His miracle (mu'jizah), which proves his prophecy, is the Quran, which is his self and his reality in respect of its embracing all realities, or the verbal expression which is indicative of this all-embracingness and which came to him from God. In either case, the Quran is miraculous, for this all-embracingness and concentration is not possessed by any of the realities, because all of the realities are contained within the Muhammadan Reality as the part is contained in the whole; nor does any revealed book denote such an all-embracingness and concentration, for the Quran is the comprehensive unity of all the divine books.

God in His Essence is independent of the world and its inhabitants. But His infinite Names require that each have a locus of manifestation, so that the effect of that Name will appear in that locus, and the Named – which is the Essence – will reveal Itself in that locus to him who professes the divine Unity. For example, "the Merciful", "the Nourisher", and "the Vanquisher" are each a Name of God, and their manifestation takes place through the merciful and the object of mercy, the nourisher and the nourished, and the vanquisher and the vanquished. So as long as there is no merciful or object of mercy in the world, mercifulness will not become manifested; and in the same way nourishing and vanquishing. Moreover all of the Names must be judged analogously. Therefore the reason for the manifestation of all particular beings is the demand of the Names of God. And all of the Names are under the sway of the Name "Allah", which encompasses and comprehends them. Moreover this Name also necessitates a universal locus of manifestation, which because of its all-comprehensiveness would correspond to the all-comprehensive Name and be the vicegerent of God in conveying effusion and perfections from the Name "Allah" to what is other than it. That all-comprehensive locus is the Muhammadan Spirit, which is referred to by the hadîths, "The first thing created by God was my Spirit" or "my Light."

The root and the origin of all creatures is the ontological level of the Reality of Realities, which is the Muhammadan Reality or the Light of Ahmad, the form of the One Unique Presence. That ontological level embraces all divine and cosmic perfections and establishes the measure of all the levels of human, animal and angelic harmonies. The world and its inhabitants are the forms and the parts of his particularization, and Adam and his children are subjugated toward the goal of his perfection. To this reality refer the words of the hadîths. "I am the master of the children of Adam" and "Adam and those who come after him are under my banner."

And since one of the inner meanings of the word "Quran" is concentration of the Intention, as was indicated in the chapter on Moses, the Shaykh wants to show that this concentration is also a miracle, so he says, And concentration upon one thing is a miracle, because of the multifarious realities which man embraces and his multiple and various spiritual and physical faculties. And each of these realities and faculties has a particular requirement and a determined property which differs from the requirements and properties of the others. So concentration -which is the absorption of that multiplicity by oneness – shatters the habits of the majority, and thus it is a miracle.²⁶ Now man, who is multiple through his different faculties, is like the Quran, which is multiple and diverse through its multiple verses and through its being the Word of God unconditionally, without quoting the words of others, and the words of God, in the sense that He has spoken them, but quoted by God from others. So in respect of its being the Word of God unconditionally, it is miraculous, although not in respect of its quoting the words of other speakers; and it, or the Quran's being multiple through its multifarious verses and one in its being the Word of God, is concentration which demands that it be miraculous. So also is the concentration of the Intention of man with its multiple realities..

God said, "Your companion", i.e., Muhammad, "is not possessed" (LXXXI, 22), the word usually understood to mean "possessed" (majnûn) being from the root jnn, which means to hide or conceal, i.e., nothing has been concealed from him; "and he is not niggardly" (LXXXI, 24), so he was not niggardly with anything belonging to you, i.e., with anything which you are worthy of and your preparedness demands; "and he is not suspected", as some authorities have read this same verse, i.e., no one ever suspected him of being niggardly with anything which he had from God which belonged to you, for he delivers to everyone who has a right his due and effuses upon him everything he needs and is entitled to.

Since fear is not actualized unless accompanied by being astray (dalâl), which is bewilderment (hayrah); for fear is the heart's being stripped of the serenity of security because of expecting the possible occurrence of something distasteful; and there is no doubt that expecting the distasteful without being sure of it is a kind of bewilderment and uncertainty. So since the Shaykh wants to negate fear from him, he points out that he was not astray, just as God said, "Your companion is not astray, neither errs" (LIII, 2). But it is necessary to know that "being astray" has three stages: a beginning, a middle and an end, and the straying which is negated from him is the first two stages, for the third stage is his spiritual station in which he sought increase with his words, "My Lord, increase my bewilderment in Thee." It is to this that the Shaykh alludes with his words, i.e., he did not fear in his bewilderment, which is the third stage and which is desired by the Perfect Men and never surpassed by them. And he did not fear in this stage because it was his nature to know that the ultimate goal in the knowledge of God is bewilderment, and he who knows that the ultimate goal in the knowledge of God is bewilderment has been guided aright and is thus the possessor of guidance and eloquence in affirming bewilderment. And bewilderment is the goal, so how should he fear within it?

Know that the first stage of being astray pertains to the bewilderment of the beginners, or the generality of men, the properties of the second appear in those of intermediate rank among those who possess unveiling while still being veiled, and the properties of the third pertain to the greatest of those who have attained to the Truth.

The cause of the first and common bewilderment is that man is an indigent seeker in his essence. So not one instant passes him by without his being in search. In reality this search is directed at the Perfection which is the true goal of the seeker, but the goals become determined according to the aspirations, intentions and relationships which motivate and incite. So as long as a goal to which he gives foremost importance or a religion or belief to which he binds himself does not become determined for man, he remains bewildered and agitated. The first thing which removes this bewilderment is the determination of a quest to which he gives first importance, then the knowledge of the path to attain it, then the factors which can bring about its attainment, then those things to which recourse can be had to attain the goal, then the knowledge of the obstacles and the way of eliminating them. So when these things are actualized, the bewilderment disappears.

Then, once a goal has been determined for man and he has given first importance to something which he sees as his end, his state is one of two kinds: either that thing embraces him in such a way that nothing remains with which to seek for more, such as is for the most part the state of the people of religions and creeds; or some sobriety remains, and you see that although he leans upon a certain state and a particular thing, he sometimes inquires and looks around, wondering if he might not find something more perfect than what he has embraced. So if he finds that which agitates and awakens him, he moves on to the compass of the second stage.

His state in the second stage is like his state in the first in that either he remains listless and indifferent towards seeking for more, or something remains in him which prevents him from finding rest and peace – especially when he sees that the people of the intermediate stage have split up into numerous factions, each of which sees that it and those who agree with it have attained the goal and that others have gone astray. And he sees the source and place of adherence of each denomination and that none of them has a leg upon which to stand. He sees possibilities knocking and contradictions manifest, so he becomes bewildered and does not know which of the beliefs is the most correct in reality. He remains bewildered until at last the qualities of one of the stations upon which the people of religious beliefs support themselves gain sway over him so that he is attracted to it and gains tranquillity; or else grace – or grace along with his sincerity in aspiration, his earnest determination and his strenuous efforts – lifts from him the veil, so he becomes one of the people of unveiling.

His state at the beginning of the station of unveiling is like his previous states in that when he hears the celestial voice speaking to him, when he contemplates exalted visions and when he sees how well God has dealt with him and all that he has attained which has eluded most of the people of the world, some or all of this either entralls him completely, or there remains something in him of the burning thirst of aspiration. So he looks at God's words, "It belongs not to any mortal that God should speak to him, except by revelation, or from behind a veil, or that He should send a messenger and that he reveal whatsoever He will, by His leave; surely He is All-high, All-wise" (XLII, 51), and its like among the divine allusions and prophetic admonitions, and he becomes aware that in the case of everything that arrives through a veil or becomes determined through an intermediary, necessarily the veil and the intermediary have a certain effect, so that which arrives does not retain its original purity. Then possibilities begin knocking, especially when he comes to know the secret of his spiritual state or station and the attributes which dominate it, and that each of these has an effect which manifests itself to him and is brought into relation with him. So he does not become tranquil, and no desire remains in him for the divine presence from a particular aspect or special point of view. He goes beyond the levels of the Names and Qualities and all of the properties, acts and theophanies which pertain to them. So God does not become determined for him according to a particular spiritual or physical aspect with respect to the Outward or the Inward or according to various fields of knowledge, modes of perception, beliefs, visions, traditions or descriptions, because of his awareness of the Majesty of God and of the fact that He is not limited to all or any of these things, and because he does not become satiated, nor does his Intention stop at one of the goals at which the people of the stopping places²⁷ stop – even though they are right and they have stopped with God, for Him and in Him. Rather he perceives through his primordial nature that without any doubt he has a resting-place within His Being, and he turns toward it with the greatest part of himself, or rather with all of himself, and he places his presence in his attention to God in the manner that God knows Himself in Himself by Himself, not in the way He knows Himself in other than Himself, nor in the way that others know Him, and not in accordance with knowledge accorded by grace or earned.

And this state is the first of the states of the people of the final bewilderment, which is desired by the greatest spiritual luminaries but which they do not exceed; rather they ascend in it for ever and ever, in the world, in the Isthmus and in the Hereafter. They have no fixed goal in the Outward or the Inward, for they do not hold God to be determined by any station according to which He becomes delimited in their inward or outward parts, and therefore distinguished from any other quest. Rather He has shown them that He encompasses them from all of their hidden and manifest directions and that He reveals Himself to them in them, not in any one thing, direction, name or level. So they enter the Trackless Desert in His contemplation, and their bewilderment is from Him, through Him and in Him.

Divine "Imagination" and the Intermediate World: Ibn 'Arabî on the Barzakh.

For centuries after the time of the Andalusian mystic Ibn 'Arabî, his remarkable discussions and conceptions of the "Imagination" (al-khayâl) were elaborated by Islamic philosophers, poets, artists and critics in order to explain, interpret and justify the full range of artistic and creative activities carried on within later Islamicate cultures, as far away as India and Indonesia.¹ Modern western students of Ibn 'Arabî writing on such themes have tended to focus on the development of those ideas in his celebrated Fusûs al-Hikam ("The Bezels of Wisdom") and its long line of traditional philosophic commentaries.² But another major source of those classical Islamic understandings of the Imagination was in the Shaykh's many discussions of the eschatological "Barzakh" or "intermediate world" of the divine Imagination--as well as his accounts of his own striking experiences and decisive spiritual encounters there--which are scattered throughout his magnum opus, al-Futûhât al-Makkîya ("The Meccan Illuminations").

One of his most extensive and widely influential discussions of the Imagination/Barzakh, in all its humanly relevant dimensions, was in the set of five eschatological chapters (61-65) within the long opening section of the Futûhât--chapters first brought to the attention of a wider Western audience in the famous studies by Asin-Palacios of Islamic themes in Dante's Divine ¹Thus the incomparable architectural accomplishments of the Tâj Mahâl turn out to have been inspired, from the overall plan down to sometimes minute details, by the elaborate eschatological discussions and diagrams of the Futûhât: see the detailed explanations in W. Begley, The Myth and Meaning of the Taj Mahal. Two of the most elaborate and influential later Islamic philosophic developments of Ibn 'Arabî's eschatological conceptions--including many of the key images mentioned here in chapter 63 of the Futûhât--are the theories of imagination of the Iranian Shiite thinker Mulla Sadra (d. 1640) and the South Asian author, Shah Walîullâh of Delhi (d. 1762). The literal inspiration of Ibn 'Arabî's thought (and indeed of this particular chapter) is clearly visible in such translated works as our The Wisdom of the Throne: An Introduction to the Philosophy of Mulla Sadra (Princeton, 1981) and Shah Walîullâh's Lamahât, tr. G.N. Jalbani (Hyderabad, 1970).

Comedy. Those chapters, whose arrangement follows the traditional popular ordering of the symbolic "events" and "places" of the Resurrection mentioned in Islamic scriptures, begin with descriptions of Gehenna and the "Fires" and other torments of its residents (chapters 61-62) and conclude with the stages of redemption and eventual bliss of souls who have reached the Gardens of paradise (chapters 64-65).³ The chapter translated here⁴ is therefore the centerpiece of this broader eschatological section and focuses relatively more on the "theoretical" dimension of the Imagination, on the ontological and epistemological underpinnings of the spiritual experiences and phenomena discussed in greater detail in many other sections of the Futûhât.

It is always a challenge, and often a near-impossibility, to attempt to outline the structure of any of Ibn 'Arabî's writings in a linear and straightforward fashion. (And serious attempts to convey something of their deeper inner structure inevitably require an involved commentary much longer than the mystic's own original text.) However, a few such indications have been added here for the benefit of those who may be encountering his distinctive style of writing for the first time. Like almost all chapters of the Futûhât, chapter 63 opens with a short and highly allusive metaphysical-didactic poem summarizing virtually all the themes treated in the rest of the chapter; the remainder of this eschatological chapter, quite typically, is an extended and (at first glance) apparently somewhat disordered commentary on the topics suggested by those opening verses. In this case, Ibn 'Arabî begins his exposition with [I.] an explanation--at once linguistic, symbolic and philosophic--of the basic notion of a barzakh, or "limit" between two metaphysical realms: here, the domains of purely physical and purely intelligible/noetic being, and the mysterious eschatological realm of Imagination that lies between them. The exposition then moves from the ontological-theological mode of discourse to [II.] an openly epistemological and experiential evocation of the kinds of experience (and scriptural allusions) which begin to reveal more clearly the central existential importance of this realm of being. Next, working through the rich symbolism of a famous Prophetic statement comparing this reality to the "Horn" that is blown to announce the Resurrection, Ibn 'Arabî begins to develop [III.] the mysterious correspondences between the universal, ontological dimensions of this plane of Imagination and the manifestations of its "Light" in the experiences of each individual. And finally, the Shaykh returns [IV.] to the more explicitly eschatological implications of his earlier discussions, developing the parallels between this universal reality of the Imagination and our more familiar experience of sleep and dreams--an approach to which he later returned in a number of famous passages in his Fusûs al-Hikam.

³See our forthcoming study (with complete, fully annotated translations and annotations of these and other eschatological chapters), Ibn 'Arabî's Divine Comedy: an Introduction to Islamic Eschatology and Cosmology. A considerable range of representative translations on this subject are already included in our contributions to Ibn 'Arabî: Les Illuminations de la Mecque/The Meccan Illuminations, ed. M. Chodkiewicz (Paris, 1989) and in the article "Seeing Past the Shadows: Ibn 'Arabî's 'Divine Comedy,'" Journal of the Muhyiddîn Ibn 'Arabî Society XII (1992), pp. 50-69.

However, even the most cursory and uninformed reading of this chapter would make quickly make it evident that Ibn 'Arabî's intention was not to "clarify" in any sort of rational, conceptual and logical form the different ways in which we can speak of and understand the Imagination--however broadly or narrowly one might define that term--and all its manifestations. In this respect, chapter 63 is an excellent, highly typical introduction to Ibn 'Arabî's unique rhetoric and style, an inimitable form of writing which is always intimately linked to his larger spiritual and didactic intentions. As readers familiar with other texts of his may more quickly recognize, the recurrent mixture of--and sudden shifts between--a whole spectrum of contrasting approaches, images, perspectives and technical vocabularies is not accidental or the result of "bad writing" (or fuzzy thinking), but instead forms a complex, highly self-conscious rhetorical technique. The Shaykh's ultimate aim here, as so often throughout his writings, is not simply heightened intellectual understanding nor a more deeply grounded religious faith and practice--although both of those outcomes may also result from serious study of his writing. Rather, as one can see most clearly at those moments where he suddenly shifts to the singular imperative ("Know!", "Realize!", etc.) it is to bring about in the properly prepared and attentive reader a suddenly transformed state of immediate realization and awareness, in which each of the implicit dualities (or paradoxes) of our usual perception of things--the recurrent categorical suppositions of subject and object, divine and human, spiritual and material, earthly and heavenly--is directly transcended in an enlightened, revelatory moment of unitive vision. His ultimate aim in this chapter, as throughout his writings, is to bring his readers to see--not just to acknowledge intellectually or theologically--everything as ongoing theophany (tajalliyât) and "ever-renewed" divine creation.

In the case of this chapter, Ibn 'Arabî's efforts to break through his readers' ordinarily unquestioned separations between what is "divine" and "human," or "objective" and "subjective," or "this-worldly" and "other-worldly," are repeatedly sustained by certain basic features of the Arabic language that cannot easily be reproduced in a western tongue. For example, his most basic term and underlying subject here, the Arabic expression al-khayâl, refers most often, in ordinary contexts, to what we would ordinarily call an "image" or "object of imagination," and ultimately to the actual underlying reality of all the "imaginal" (not "imaginary") objects of our perception in virtually all forms and domains. Given this primacy of the ontic, "objective" dimension of the term al-khayâl--whether that is expressed in theological or cosmological terms--any translation referring to "imagination"⁵ inevitably risks falling into the psychologizing or individualistic, subjectivist assumptions that are embedded in the usual usages of that concept in western languages, whether the term is being employed positively or pejoratively. In fact, precisely at those points where Ibn 'Arabî wants to refer explicitly to something like a psychological "faculty" or individual activity of "imagination"--or to the individual psychic "objects" of such an activity--he invariably uses separate and quite distinct Arabic terms to emphasize that partial, subjective aspect.

Finally, and again quite typically, a deeper appreciation of Ibn 'Arabî's meaning and intentions here often requires a degree of acquaintance with Islamic scriptures and classical forms of religious learning that can rarely be assumed among modern readers. Thus any effort to communicate fully that web of allusions and assumptions to a modern audience naturally requires a body of notes and commentary several times longer than Ibn 'Arabî's text itself. In this case, given the constraints of article length, we have chosen to translate as much of the chapter itself as possible (omitting only a few repetitive or highly technical sections), at the price of in most earlier studies of the Futûhât.

⁵Such as our frequent use in this case of capitalization ("Imagination") or a parenthetical qualification ("divine," etc.).

eliminating all such explanatory notes⁶--apart from the basic identification of Qur'anic quotations and allusions, which are so often indispensable for understanding the Shaykh's intentions.

⁶Which will be found in great detail in our forthcoming book-length translation of these and other eschatological chapters and sections from the Futûhât (n. 3 above). Omitted sections are indicated in the translated section below by points of suspension [...].

Chapter 63: Concerning Inner Understanding of (How) People Remain in the Barzakh
Between This World and the Resurrection (at the Last Day)

Between this world and the Resurrection, for whoever reflects, there are intermediate (barzakhîya) levels, each with their limits:

What they hold is according to the influence of how their possessor is right now, before dying—so consider deeply [O people of vision] (59:2)!

They have influences and authority over everything, making the wonders appear; they do not spare (anyone), nor leave (anyone) alone (74:28).

They have wide-open manifestations in being, without restriction, yet they are neither essential-realities, nor (mere) effects.

They (have only to) say to God (al-Haqq) "Be!," and God is (already) creating them-- so how can a mortal-human (bashar) escape from their influence?!

Through them are the (forms of) knowing and every chastisement;
through them are the signs (of God) and miracles and exemplary lessons.

Were it not for this (divine) Imagination, today we would be in nothingness:
no goal or purpose would have been accomplished through us!

"As though (you saw God)" is Its realm of authority, if you've understood It:
revelation has come through/with It, as have intellect and reflection.

Among the expressions alluding to It is the "like..." of the (divine) Attributes:
so you are only detached from forms by your bringing (other) forms!

[I.] Our saying "As though is Its realm of authority" refers to the authority of the (divine) Imagination (khayâl), which is the essential reality of (this) "as though" and the inner meaning of (the Prophet's) saying "Worship God as though you see Him... ."

...Know that the word "barzakh" is an expression for what separates two things without ever becoming either of them, such as the line separating a shadow from the sunlight, or as in His Saying--may He be exalted!: "He has loosened the two Seas. They meet:/ between them a barzakh, they do not go beyond" (55: 19-20)--meaning that neither of them becomes mixed with the other. But even if our senses are unable to perceive what separates those two things, the intellect judges that there is indeed a divider separating them--and that divider grasped by the intellect is precisely the barzakh. Because if something is perceived by the senses, it must be one of those two things, rather than the barzakh. So each of those two things, when they are adjacent to each other, have need of a barzakh which is not the same as each of them, but which has in itself the power of each of them.

Now since the Barzakh (of the creative divine Imagination) is something separating what is knowable and unknowable, existent and non-existent, intelligible and unintelligible, affirmed and negated, it has been given the name "Barzakh" as a technical term. It is intelligible in itself, yet it is nothing but the imagined-image (al-khayâl)! For when you perceive it--assuming you are in a rational state--you know that you have perceived something existent on which your gaze has fallen; indeed you most definitely know that there is absolutely something there. But what is this about which you affirm that it is an existent thing, while at the same time you are also denying that?! For this Imagination-Image (al-khayâl) is neither (entirely) existent nor nonexistent, neither (entirely) known nor unknowable, neither (entirely) affirmed nor denied.

This is like a human being perceiving their (reflected) form in the mirror. The person definitely knows that they have perceived their (own) form in a certain respect, while they know just as absolutely that they have not perceived their form in another respect, because of the smallness of the image they see in the mirror, assuming the body of the mirror is small--since they know that their own form is a great deal larger than the one they saw.... So what is that reflected form? And where is it actually located? And what is its (ontological) status? For it is both affirmed and denied, both existent and nonexistent, both known and unknown.

Now God--may He be praised!--has made this reality appear to His servants, by way of making a fitting image, so that they might know and come to realize that if they are bewildered and incapable of grasping the reality of this phenomenon, which is (only) part of this world, and cannot attain full knowledge of its reality--then how much more incapable and ignorant and bewildered they must be regarding the Creator of that reality! In this way God has pointed out to (His servants) that the divine Self-manifestations (tajalliyât al-Haqq) to them are even more subtle and delicate than this case in which their intellects are already so bewildered and incapable of perceiving the reality of things....

It is to something like this reality that each human being goes in their sleep and after their death (cf. 39:42). So that person sees (moral and spiritual) qualities and characteristics as selfsubsistent forms that speak to him and with which he converses, as being (human) bodies without any doubt. And the person of spiritual unveiling (al-mukâshif) already sees (here), while they are awake, what the sleeper sees in their dream state or the dead person sees after they have died. Likewise they will see the forms of their actions being weighed in the other world (according to the Qur'anic symbolism of the "Scales")--despite their being (apparently non-substantial) qualities and characteristics (in this world)--and they will see death (according to the description in a famous hadith) as "a spotted ram being sacrificed," even though death is (really only) a relation (between two states of being).... So praise to the One Who remains unknowable, so He is not known--and Who is known, so that He is not unknown! [He is the One Who gives form to you-all in the Wombs, however He wishes:] There is no god but Him, the Unapproachable, the All-Wise (3:6)!

[II.] Now there are some people who perceive this imaged-object (al-mutakhayyal) with the eye of the (physical) sensation, and there are others who perceive it with the eye of imagination. Of course I'm referring here to (our perceptions) in the waking state, since during sleep (everyone) definitely perceives with the eye of imagination. So if a person wishes to distinguish between (those two modes of perception) in their waking state, whether in this world or at the Day of Resurrection, they can determine (which sort of perception it is) by looking at the imaged-object. Thus if [a] the states of what one is looking at continue to change as it changes its shape and characteristics, even though you can't deny that it is still the same thing, and [b] the fact of observing it does not stop it from changing its shape and formation--as when a chameleon, when you observe it, stops changing its colors--then that is undoubtedly (being seen) with the eye of imagination, not with the eye of the senses. For you perceive what-is-imagined (al-khayâl) with the eye of imagination, not with the eye of (physical) sensation.

Indeed few of those who lay claim to the unveiled vision of spirits, whether of fire (i.e., jinn) or of light (angels), really understand how this is. When (those spirits) take on the image of perceptible forms, (most people) don't know whether they are perceiving them with the eye of the imagination or with the eye of (physical) sensation--since both sorts of perception involve the sensing activity of the eye. That (inner sensing activity) is what presents the perception through both the eye of imagination and the eye of (physical) sensation. So this is a subtle form of knowledge: I mean the knowledge of the distinction between the two "eyes," and between the sensing activity of the eye and the eye of (physical) sensation. One can know that (what one perceives) is indeed sensible, not imaginal, and that one has perceived it with the eye of sensation, not the eye of imagination (by the following conditions): [a] when the eye perceives the imaged-object and, without being distracted, sees that its shape and characteristics don't change; [b] when it doesn't see that imaged-object in different places at the same time, assuming it is definitely a single reality; and [c] that imaged-object doesn't become changed or transformed into different states.

This is how you should understand how a human being can perceive their Lord--may He be exalted!--in a dream, even though He transcends any form or image, as well as how that perception of Him takes place and its limitations. And through this you may understand what has come down in the sound report (of the famous hadith) concerning the Creator's "manifesting Himself (to souls at the Resurrection) in the most unlikely of forms among those in which they saw Him," and concerning His "transformation into a form which they knew (before then)," after they had been denying Him and taking refuge from Him (in more agreeable forms of His manifestation).

So you should know with which eye you are seeing Him! For I have already let you know that (the divine) Imagination is perceived either through itself--I mean through the eye of imagination--or through the (physical) vision. And which of those two is the sound one on which we should rely?! Regarding that we (wrote these verses):

When my Beloved appears to me, with which eye do I see Him?

With His eye, not with mine: for none sees Him but Him!

(This is only) in accordance with the transcendence of His Station and confirming His Words, since He says: "The gazes do not perceive Him, [but He perceives the gazes..." (6:103), and He did not specify any particular Abode (of this world or the next), but sent it as an Verse unrestricted (in its applicability) and as a definite, confirmed matter. For none other than Him perceives Him, so it is with His eye--may He be praised!--that I see Him, as in (the famous divine saying in) the sound hadith-report: "...I (God) was his gaze through which he sees."

So wake up, you who are asleep and heedless of all this, and pay attention! I have opened up for you a door to forms of awareness and inner knowing that thoughts can never reach, though intellects can come to accept them, either through special divine Providence or by "polishing hearts with dhikr and recitation (of the Qur'an)." Then the intellect accepts what the divine Self-manifestation (tajalli) gives it and knows that that (imaginal revelation) is beyond its own power with respect to its thinking, indeed that its thinking could never give it that. Therefore (that person) gives thanks to God--may He be exalted!--Who created their constitution (nash'a) so that it could receive things like that: this being the constitution of the (divine) Messengers and prophets and those among the saints who are the recipients of special divine Providence. This is so that (such a person) may know that their receptivity (to what is bestowed by God) is higher and more noble than their own thinking. So realize, o my brother, from now on Who it is that is manifesting Himself to you from behind this door (of the imagination)! For this is a prodigious matter, where even the innermost hearts become bewildered.

[III.] Then the prescriber (of Revelation), who is the truthful speaker, called this thing--which is the (divine) Presence of the Barzakh to which we are brought after death and in which we directly witness our souls--a "Horn" (al-sûr) and "Trumpet" (al-nâqûr). Here the word al-sûr is (also) the plural of the word sûra, "form." So (according to the Qur'anic accounts of the Resurrection) "it is breathed into the Horn/forms" (6:73, etc.) and "it is blown upon the Trumpet" (74:8). And the two of them (the "Horn" and "Trumpet") are exactly the same thing, differing only in the names because of the various states and attributes (of the underlying reality)....

Know that the Messenger of God, when he was asked what this "Horn" (al-sûr) was, replied: "It is a horn (qarn: an animal horn) of Light upon which (the angel) Isrâfil blows." So he reported that its shape was the shape of (an animal's) horn, described as being broad (at the base) and narrow (at the tip).... Know, then, that the breadth of this "Horn" (of the Barzakh-Imagination) is as broad as possible, since none of the generated things are broader than It. That is because through Its reality It has sway over every thing, and (even) over what is not a thing. It gives form (alike) to absolute nothingness and to what is (ontologically) impossible, necessary and contingent, turning what is existent into nothingness and what is non-existent into being. Regarding this divine Presence (i.e., ontological realm of being) the Prophet says: "Worship God as though you see Him..." and "God is in the qibla of the person who is praying"--i.e., imagine Him in your direction of prayer and be attentive to Him, so that you are fully mindful of Him and humble before him. And always observe the appropriate courtesy (adab) with Him while you are praying, since if you don't do that you are being discourteous and inconsiderate.

Now had the prescriber (of Revelation) not known that there is within you a reality called "imagination" that has this (immense) sway, he would not have said to you "(Worship God) as though you see Him" with your (physical) vision. For the indications of the intellect rule out this "as though," and the intellect holds, with its arguments, that any "likeness" (between God and created things) is impossible: vision can perceive nothing but the wall (in front of the person praying)! Yet we have also learned that the prescriber (of Revelation) called upon you to imagine that you are facing God (al-Haqq) in your direction of prayer; indeed it has been prescribed for you to accept that. And God says: "So wherever you may turn, then there is the Face of God!" (2:115)--and the "face" (wajh) of something is its reality and its individual essence. So the Imagination has given form to the One Who, according to the arguments of the intellect, cannot possibly be conceived or given any form. That is why (the Imagination) is so all-encompassing.

But as for the "narrowness" and restrictiveness of the imagination, that is because it does not extend to receiving anything--whether sensible things, or spiritual ones, or relations and connections, or God's Majesty and His Essence--except through some form. If it were to try to perceive something without using a form, its reality would not allow it to do that, since it is precisely the (faculty of) imaginal representation (wahm), and nothing else.... So the imagination is the most extensive of all the objects of knowledge--yet despite the immense breadth of its sway, which extends to every thing, it is also incapable of receiving the purely immaterial (noetic) realities (without using some image or likeness). Hence the imagination (as indicated in many familiar hadith) sees knowledge in the form of milk, or honey and wine and pearls; and it sees Islâm in the form a dome and pillars; and it sees the Qur'an in the form of butter and honey; and it sees Religion in the form of a bond; and it sees God (al-Haqq) in the form a human being and in the form of light....

As for this "horn" (of the Barzakh/Imagination) being made of "light" (according to the hadith mentioned above), that is because light is the immediate cause for (things) becoming unveiled and clearly appearing, since without light, vision would perceive nothing at all. So God made this Imagination as a "light" through which could be perceived the Bringing-into-form (taswîr) of every thing, whatever that might be, as we've already mentioned. His Light passes through the absolute nothingness so that He might shape it into the forms of being. Hence the Imagination is more deserving of the (divine) Name "the Light" (al-Nûr) than all the created things ordinarily described as "luminous," since Its Light does not resemble the (created) lights and through It the divine Self-manifestations are perceived.

And It (or 'He') is the Light of the eye of imagination, not the light of the eye of sensation. So understand this! For if you understand how (the divine) Imagination is Light, and you know in what way it is (always) correct, then you will have an advantage over those who don't know that--the sort of person who says: "that is only a false imagination!" That is because such people have failed to understand the perception of the light of imagination which has been given them by God. This is just like their saying that our senses are also "mistaken" in some of their perceptions, when in fact their sense-perceptions are sound, while the judgment (regarding the meaning of those perceptions) belongs to something else, not to the senses themselves. It is the judgment that is false, not the sensation. Likewise the imagination perceives with its light whatever it perceives, without passing judgment. The judgment only belongs to something else, which is the intellect, so the error can't be attributed to the imagination. Thus there never is any "false imagination" at all--indeed all of it is correct!

Now as for our companions, they were mistaken in their thinking about this "Horn" (of the Barzakh/Imagination), in that most of the intellectual thinkers represented its narrowest point as the center (of the earthly sphere) and its widest point as the highest, outermost celestial sphere, so that the "forms" which it contains would be the forms of the (physical) world. They considered the wide segment of this Horn its highest part and its narrow section the lowest part of the world--but things are not at all as they claimed! Instead, since the Imagination (even) gives form to God (al-Haqq), as well as everything in the world below Him, including even nothingness, its highest section is the narrow one and its lowest section is the wide one. That is just how God created It: for the first thing He created from It was "narrow," while what He created from It later widened out, like the part of a horn adjoining the animal's head.

For there is no doubt that the Presence (i.e., ontological domain) of the divine Actions and States is more extensive (than the higher divine "Presences"). That is why the true Knowers (of God) only find comprehensiveness of knowledge to the extent of what they come to know from the world. Then when they want to proceed to knowing the Unicity of God--may He be exalted!--they keep on ascending gradually from that breadth (of worldly objects of knowing) toward what is narrower (in extent). So their forms of knowing (lit.: "knowledges") keep on becoming less numerous while they ascend in their knowledge of God's Essence, through spiritual unveiling, until they reach the point where they have no object of knowledge but God (al-Haqq) alone--which is the narrowest point in that "Horn." For in reality its narrowest part is its highest, which has the most perfect greatness and majesty.

(The reality of this universal creative process of divine "Imagination" resembles) the first part of (an animal's) horn that appears when God has planted it in the animal's head: it continues to grow upward, beginning with that narrow point, as its lower part widens out. So (this narrowest initial "Point") is the first thing created. Don't you see how (likewise) the first thing God--may He be praised!--created was the "Pen" (68:1; 96:4) or the (universal) "Intellect," as he said. So He only created one (reality). Then He brought forth the creatures from that one (cf. 6:98), and the world became fully expanded. This is just like the procession of numbers from the initial "one"....

[IV.] Next, now that we have established this, you should know that God--may He be praised!--when He takes the spirits from these physical, material bodies, wherever they may be (at death), deposits those spirits in imaginal-bodily forms within this Horn of Light (of the Barzakh). So all of those things that the human being perceives after death in the Barzakh are only perceived through the eye and with the light of the form in which that person exists in that Horn--and that is a true perception. Among the forms there are [a] some who are restricted in their freedom of activity, and [b] others who are unrestricted, such as the spirits of all the prophets and the spirits of the martyrs; among them are [c] those who are able to look at (what goes on in) this world here-below, even while they are in that Abode (of the Barzakh), and [d] those who manifest themselves to the sleeper in that Presence of the Imagination which is in the person dreaming.

This is why one's dreams are always "true," because every dream in itself is true and not in error. Because if (we say) a dream was "mistaken," it isn't really the dream itself that was mistaken, but rather the person who interpreted it incorrectly, in that they didn't recognize the intended meaning of the image in question. Don't you notice what (the Prophet) said to Abû Bakr, when he had interpreted the dream of the person mentioned (in the hadith): "You were right about some of it, and mistaken about some of it." And likewise with what (Muhammad) said to the man who had a dream in which he saw his head cut off and fall to the ground, and then begin to roll around and speak to him. The Messenger of God mentioned to him that Satan was playing with him. He knew the form of what the man had seen, so he didn't say to him "your imagination is false"--because what the man saw was real, only he had been mistaken in his interpretation of it. Instead he informed him about the real meaning of what he had seen while dreaming.

Likewise the supporters of Pharaoh (against Moses) "are exposed to the Fire" in those forms "morning and night" (40:46), without entering Hell, because they are captive within that Horn (of the Barzakh) and in that (imaginal) form. But on the Day of the Rising they enter "the most intense torment" (40:46), which is the sensible torment--not the imaginal one--which was theirs in the state of their dying on earth.

Now (sometimes) the eye of imagination perceives both imaginal forms and sensible forms together. And sometimes the source of imagination, who is the human being, perceives the object of imagination with the eye of imagination, as in (the Prophet's) saying "The Garden (of Paradise) was portrayed for me on the side of this wall." But he (also) perceived that with the eye of (bodily) sensation. And we only referred to the eye of (bodily) sensation because (according to the hadith report) "he came forward when he saw the Garden, to take a fruit from it," and because (according to another hadith) "he backed up when he saw the Fire (of Hell)" once while he was praying. For we know that (the Prophet) had such power that if he had perceived those visions (only) with the eye of his imagination, and not (also) with the eye of his bodily senses, that would not have influenced his body to move forward and to back up (in those two cases.) Indeed we have also experienced (that bodily influence of imaginal forms and perceptions), and we have neither his power nor his rank.

Therefore every human being in the Barzakh is "hostage to what they have acquired" (52:21; 74:38), imprisoned in the forms of their deeds, until they are raised up from those forms, on the Day of the Rising, in "the state of being of the other world" (29:20, etc.). And God says the Truth and He shows the right Way (33:4).

Lataif-e-sitta (Arabic: اللطائف الستة) are special "Organs of Perception" in Sufi spiritual psychology -- subtle human capacities for experience. Depending on context, the Lataif are also understood to be the corresponding qualities of that subtle experience.

The underlying Arabic word "latifa" (singular) means "subtlety" and all Lataif (plural) together are understood to make up the human "subtle body" ("Jism Latif")^[1]

Realizing (or activating or awakening or "illuminating") the experience of the individual Lataif (and thereby the Jism Latif as a whole) is considered to be a central part of the comprehensive spiritual development that produces the Sufi ideal of a Perfect Man (Al-Insān al-Kāmil).

Different Interpretations

Descriptions and interpretations of the Lataif differ depending on the specific Sufi tradition and the author representing it. In addition, individual Sufi teachers (see Sheikh \(Sufism\)) sometimes interpret aspects of Lataif theory and practice according to how the Lataif have been uniquely revealed to them^[2].

In general, there are at least three historical interpretations of the Lataif:

(1) that derived from the Kubrāwī order, described in the writings of Najm al-Din Razi (1177-1256) and Ala ud-Daula Simnani (Semnani) (1261-1336), which views the Lataif as potential psychospiritual organs/capacities that can be realized as progressive stages in those undergoing spiritual development;

(2) that derived from the Mujaddidiyya branch of the Naqshbandi order, described in the writings of Ahmad Sirhindi (1564-1624), which views the Lataif as psychospiritual organs/capacities that are potential receptors of Divine energy^[3] when activated in those undergoing spiritual development;

(3) that derived from the "Afghan Tradition"^[4] within the Naqshbandi order, described in the writings of Ikbal Ali Shah (1894-1969) and Idries Shah (1924-1996), which views the Lataif as actual human psychospiritual organs/capacities that are implicit in everyday life and made explicit in those undergoing spiritual development.

Kubrāwī Lataif

According to the view of the Kubrawi order there are seven Lataif. They are understood cosmologically as "descending" levels through which reality is created and structured^[5]. In the process of spiritual development, the individual Sufi is understood to "ascend" to and through these levels progressively (see ontological Arcs of Descent and Ascent in Sufism). The attainment of each level is a stage associated with the activation/realization of a corresponding spiritual organ/capacity, interpreted symbolically through Islamic cosmology and the Prophets and messengers in Islam ^[6]. In ascending order they are:

- Latifa Qalabiya ("Mold"), associated with an experience of the color black, represents the acquisition of a new organ, an embryonic subtle body. It is interpreted symbolically as "the Adam of one's being", since Adam was the first human being.
- Latifa Nafsiya ("Soul"), color blue, is an organ that corresponds to the animal soul and is a testing ground for struggle with desires and passions. It is interpreted symbolically as "the Noah of one's being", since Noah faced the same situation in dealing with the hostility of his people.
- Latifa Qalbiya ("Heart"), color red, is the organ that will develop to become the True Ego, the real personal individuality. It is interpreted symbolically as "the Abraham of one's being", since the prophet Abraham historically represents the establishment of real religion.
- Latifa Sirriya ("Secret"), color white, is an organ of superconsciousness. It is interpreted symbolically as "the Moses of one's being", since the prophet Moses participated in spiritual communication with God through this consciousness.

- Latifa Ruhiya ("Spirit"), color yellow, is an organ through which an individual becomes capable of acting as vice-regent of God. It is interpreted symbolically as "the David of one's being", since the prophet David fulfilled that role.
- Latifa Khafiya ("Inspiration"), color black, is the subtle organ that receives spiritual inspiration. It is interpreted symbolically as "the Jesus of one's being", since the prophet Jesus was characteristic of such inspiration.
- Latifa Haqqiya ("Seal"), color green, is the subtle organ that is the final achievement of spiritual development: the True Ego. It is interpreted symbolically as "the Mohammed of one's being", since the prophet Mohammed was the final prophet.

The historical method of Spiritual practice in this interpretation of the Lataif is unknown^[7].

Naqshbandi Lataif (Mujaddidiyya)

According to the view of the Mujaddidiyya branch of the Naqshbandi order there are five Lataif^[8]. The reception of each Latifa's spiritual energy from its corresponding cosmic realm is interpreted symbolically through the Prophets and messengers in Islam, similar to the interpretation of the Kubrawi order:

- Qalb (color yellow; located below left breast) (Adam)
- Ruh (color red; located below right breast) (Abraham/Noah)
- Sirr (color white; located above left breast) (Moses)
- Khafi (color black; located above right breast) (Jesus)
- Ikhfa (color green; located at sternum) (Mohammad)

Since, in this interpretation, the Lataif all have their physical location in the chest, they are said to be "of the Heart" (Qalb, used in a different sense than the Latifa named Qalb).

The Lataif are opened through spiritual practice one-by-one in the foregoing order. Viewed as a progressive activation, each Latifa (or progressive combination of Lataif) is considered to be a level of spiritual realization.

The method of opening each Latifa typically begins with a direct transmission by Sufi teacher to student, which can include physical touch (except for women) and the disclosure of the specific one of the Names of God in Islam that is associated with the Latifa. The student then continues the practice by silent Dhikr of the Divine Name, focusing attention on the Latifa's location; sometimes a visualization of the Name, the corresponding Prophet, or the teacher is also added.

Naqshbandi Lataif (Afghan Tradition)

According to the view of the Afghan tradition within the Naqshbandi order there are five Lataif^[9]:

- Qalb (color yellow; experienced in left side of the body)
- Ruh (color red; experienced in right side of the body)
- Sirr (color white; experienced below the navel)
- Khafi (color black; experienced in forehead)
- Ikhfa (color green; experienced in center of chest)

According to Naqshbandi author Idries Shah^[10] they are understood to be spiritual organs/capacities that also underlie ordinary forms of human consciousness. As such, they are ordinarily only known indirectly through the equivalents (or their distortions) that they pattern on the conventional psychological/emotional level of human experience.

Sufi inspired teacher Hameed Ali (A. H. Almaas) (1944-) interprets some of these equivalents (and conditioned distortions) as follows^[11]:

- Qalb (Joy/Wanting)
- Ruh (Strength/Anger)
- Sirr (Will/Anxiety)
- Khafi (Peace/Agitation)
- Ikhfa (Compassion/Hurt)

With rare exceptions, Lataif are only experienced directly (and unconditioned) in human beings who have undergone a spiritual evolution. The spiritual process of their activation/awakening/illumination consists of various methods, singly or in combination.

One such method, a special form of "tajalli" ("disclosure" or "illumination"), involves joint receptivity of a Latifa by Sufi teacher and student together.^[12] Another method is the direct activation, called "tawajjuh" ("transmission"), of the Latifa by an intentional interaction between teacher and student. Yet another method, a special kind of "muraqaba" (meditation), includes having the student concentrate awareness on the part of the body that is related to a Latifa.^[13]

CHAPTER THREE

On Allah being disconnected from any connection (tashbih) or embodiment contained in the words which designate Him in His Books or on the tongue of His Messenger

"Allah is Greatly exalted over what the wrongdoers say." (17:43)

In the slave's looking at his Lord in the purity and disconnection of strength,

And his height from the tools which you connect to "how" and likeness

Is an indication which gives an absolute judgement on the position of the slave and his praise.

The soundness of knowledge and its affirmation, and rejection of allegation and distortion.

(All known things were borne by the First Intellect)

Know that the bearer of all known things, celestial and terrestrial, is the Intellect which takes from Allah without intermediary. None of the knowledge of higher and lower being is hidden from it. The self's gnosis of things comes from His giving and generosity, and from His manifestation to it, His light and His purest overflowing. The Intellect learns from Allah and teaches the self. The self learns from the Intellect and action comes from it. This applies to all that knowledge of the Intellect connects to things below it. We are limited by "what is below it" in respect of the learning we mentioned. Be careful when you ponder, remembering that Allah said, "until We know" (47:31). He is the All-Knower, so recognise the proper ascriptions!

(..except the Bewildered World)

Know that the Bewildered World does not learn anything from the First Intellect and the First Intellect has no power over those who are bewildered by love. They and it are on the same rank, like individuals among us who are outside of the jurisdiction of the Pole (Qutb), even though the Pole is one of the individuals. But the Intellect was selected to inform as the Pole is selected for appointment among the individuals.

(...and except the science of the isolation (tajrid) of tawhid)

The principle of the Intellect teaching those below it is transpires in all that the knowledge of the Intellect is connected to - except for 'the isolation of tawhid'. The science of the isolation of tawhid is different from all known things in all aspects since there is no relationship at all between Allah and His creation, even if the 'relationship' is applied to it on a certain day as was done by Imam Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali in his books, and other people. That is a sort of mannerism and very far from the realities. What relationship is there between the in-time and the timeless? Or how can a likeness be made of the One Who does not accept a likeness with someone who does accept a likeness? This is impossible as Abu'l-'Abbas ibn al-'Arif as-Sanhaji said in Mahasin al-Majalis, "There is no relationship between Allah and the slaves except concern. There is no cause except judgement and no time except pre-Time. Whatever else is blindness and deceptive ambiguity." One variant has "knowledge" in place of "blindness". See how excellent these words are and how complete this gnosis of Allah is and how pure this contemplation (mushahada)! May Allah give us the benefit of what he said!

(The intellect's incapacity for gnosis of Allah)

Knowledge of Allah is too difficult for the faculty of perception of the intellect and the self except for the fact that He exists and is holy! In its reflection and preservation, the sound intellect knows that Allah is different from what is said about Him in respect of creatures or imagined in compounds and other things. That illusion is not permissible in respect of Him nor can that verbal expression be logically applied to Him in the same manner as that which created things accept. If it is applied to Him, it is only used in a manner to facilitate the listener's understanding of the firmness of existence in a manner comprehensible to the listener, not to establish the reality which the Real possesses. Allah says, "There is nothing like Him." (47:19)

Knowledge of Allah, however, is obligatory for us in the Shari'a since Allah said to His Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, "Know that there is no god but Allah." (47:19). So He is saying, "Know Me from My reports which are in harmony with your reflection so that your belief will give you sound knowledge as your knowledge without belief which comes from definition may be sound." So that matter is like that.

Because of this matter in the view and opinion of certain people, we looked to see how gnosis of Him can be attained. We investigated in a fair and balanced manner. The perfect intellect does not obtain it after effort and striving. We only attained to gnosis of Him by the incapacity to recognise Him because our quest to recognise Him is like our quest to recognise all things in respect of the reality which known things have. When we know that there is something in existence which has no likeness and which cannot be conceived in the mind nor perceived, how then can the intellect master this? This is not permissible even though knowledge of His existence is affirmed. We know that He exists and is One in His essence. This is the knowledge demanded of us, not that we know the reality of His essence which He knows that He has. This is knowledge of the lack of knowledge which is demanded of us. He does not resemble any creature in the view of the intellect nor is any of them like Him. It was obligatory for us, first of all, when it was said to us, "Know that there is no god but Allah" to know what knowledge is. We have learned it and we have learned what it was first obligatory for us to know of what knowledge is.

The matrices of the demands of are four: is?, what?, how? and why?. 'Is?' and 'why?' are single spiritual demands accompanied by what it is. 'Is?' and 'why?' are the two sound roots of simple elements because 'what is it?' is a sort of complex one. In these four demands there is no demand which should be asked of Allah in respect of what the reality accords since it is not correct that any of the science of tawhid be recognised except by the negation of what exists except for Him. Therefore He said, "There is nothing like Him" (42:11) and "Glory be to your Lord, the Lord of Might, above what they describe." (37:180)

(Knowledge of negation is knowledge of Allah)

Knowledge of negation is knowledge of Allah. Similarly we are not permitted to ask "How?" about spirits (arwah). They are too pure for that because their realities are different from this expression. The tools by which one questions are not applied to the spirits, nor is it permitted that they be applied to Allah. The realised unifier who is deprived of the presence of his Originator and Creator must not apply these expressions to Him. The Real is not ever known by these demands.

Section

(What is perceived by its essence, what is perceived by its action and what is not perceived at all)

Then we also looked into all that is other than Allah and found it in two categories: one category is perceived by its essence - which the dense, sensory category; and one category that it is perceived by its action, which is intelligible and subtle. The intelligible is higher than the sensory by this station: it is too pure to have its essence perceived, but its action is perceived. Since these are the qualities of creatures, Allah is too pure to be perceived by His essence like the sensory or by his action like the subtle because there is no relationship at all between Him and His creation. His Essence is not perceived by us so as to be like the sensory nor is His action so as to be like the subtle. The action of the Real is to originate the thing, but not from a thing. The spiritual subtle achieves a thing from other things. So what relationship is there between the two of them? When the relationship is impossible in the action, then it is more fitting that similarity in the essence be impossible.

If you wish to achieve realisation of some of this area, look at the effect (maf'ul) of this action according to the ranks of the effects, for instance the effect of handicraft like the shirt and chair. We find that the artisan is not recognised unless he himself has indicated the existence of its maker and his knowledge of his craft. It is the same with the effect of the formation of being - the sphere and stars - which do not recognise their fashioner nor the one who compounded them. That was the Universal Self which encompasses them. It is also the same with the natural effect - like the products of minerals, plants and animals, who effect a nature which was one of the effects of formation into being. But they do not grasp who acts for them, namely the sphere and the stars.

So knowledge of the spheres is not what you see of their mass and what the senses perceive of them. Where is the mass of the sun in relation to itself in the eyes of one of us who sees it? Knowledge of the spheres comes from their spirit and meaning which Allah brought into existence for them from the encompassing Universal Self which is the cause of the spheres and what is in them.

It is the same with emanating effect which is the Universal Self, emanating from the Intellect as the Dihya [1] form came from the Jibrilian form. The Universal Self does not know what it emanated from at all because it is in its care and encompassed by it as it is one of its thoughts (khawatir). So how can the Universal Self know what is above it when what is in the Self from what is above it is only what is in it? It only knows what it has of it. So it knows its self, not its cause!

It is the same with the effect of origination which we call the Muhammadan Reality, and others call the First Intellect. It is the Highest Pen which Allah originated from nothing. It is even more incapable and prevented from perceiving its Doer than every effect already mentioned since between every effect and its doer which have been mentioned there is a sort of relationship and resemblance. So it must know of it according to the amount of relationship there is between them, either in respect of substantiality or otherwise. There is no relationship between the first thing originated and the Real - glory be to Him! It is the most incapable of the effects of causes of recognising its Doer from others. Then the incapacity of the effect, which resembles its active cause from some aspects, is incapable of perceiving it and knowing it. So understand this and realise it. It is very beneficial indeed in the area of tawhid and the inability to connect temporal knowledge to Allah the Great.

What we mentioned confirms that man perceives all knowables by one of the five faculties: the senses which are five - smell, taste, touch, hearing and sight. Sight perceives colours, coloured things and individuals according to the known limit of proximity and distance. What he perceives a mile away is not what he perceives at two miles, and that what he perceived at 20 spans is not what he perceives a mile away. What he perceives close to him, like his hand is not what he perceives at 20 spans. At two miles, he perceives an individual shape and does not know whether it is a man or a tree. At one mile, he recognises that it is a man. At 20 spans he recognises that he is white or black. Face to face, he recognises whether it is blue or navy blue. It is like that with all the senses in their perception up close or from afar.

The Creator is not sensed, i.e. He is not perceived by the senses by us while we are seeking to recognise Him. We do not know Him by the means of the senses.

The imaginative (khayaliyya) faculty only takes what the senses give it, either in an image or a mental form, from what the senses give to each other. The path of the people of thought in gnosis of Allah ends here (by way of the imaginative faculty). It is their language, not our language. Even if their path is true, we ascribe it to them and it is quoted from them. This imaginative faculty continues as long as it has perception from the senses. We consider any connection of the senses to Allah to be invalid, so the connection of the imagination to Him is also invalid.

As for the meditative faculty, man only ever reflects on things that exist with him which he learns from the senses and the precepts of the intellect and from how thoughts work on them in the repository of the imagination which accords it another knowledge between it and these things in which he conceives of a relationship. There is no relationship between Allah and His creation. Thus knowledge of Him is not valid by way of reflection. Therefore scholars forbid thinking about the Essence of Allah.

As for the faculty of the intellect, it is not valid for the intellect to perceive Him. The intellect only accepts what it knows spontaneously or what reflection accords us. It is invalid for thought to perceive Him, so it is invalid for the intellect to perceive Him via reflection. But whatever the intellect is, its limit is to understand and grasp what it obtains. So it may be that the Real will give it gnosis of Him and it will understand it, but not by means of reflection. This is not impossible. Allah gives this gnosis to whomever He will of His slaves. The intellect does not have sole possession of perception of gnosis, but it accepts it. So neither proof nor demonstration is based on it because gnosis is beyond the scope of the perceptions of the intellect.

These essential attributes cannot be designated because they are beyond exemplification and analogy. "There is nothing like Him." (42:11) Every intellect which does not have some of this gnosis unveiled to it questions another intellect which has had some of it unveiled to it. But it is not in the power of this questioned intellect to express it nor is it possible. That is why Abu Bakr as-Siddiq said, "The inability to perceive is perception." This statement has two ranks, so understand! Whoever seeks Allah through his intellect by means of his thought and investigation is astray. However, his preparation may be enough to receive what Allah gives him of that, so understand!

As for the faculty of memory, there is no way for it to perceive knowledge of Allah. It remembers what the intellect knew before and then was heedless of or forgot unwittingly. So the faculty of memory has no way to Him.

So man's perceptions are limited to what man is, what his essence gives him and he can acquire. All there remains is the preparation of the intellect to accept what Allah gave it of His gnosis. Man will never recognise the Real by deductive proof - except for recognition of existence and that He is the only One who is worshipped. So perceiving man is not capable of perceiving anything at all unless something like the perceived thing already exists in him. If it had not been for that, he would not have perceived it at all nor recognised it. Since man does not recognise anything unless he has something like that recognised thing, in reality man only recognises what resembles him and is like him. There is nothing like the Creator and nothing has anything like Him, so He will never be recognised!

Part of what supports what we mentioned is that natural things only accept food from things of their own sort, and absolutely do not accept food from other than their sort. An example of that is that products of minerals, plants and animals are compounded of the four humours, and the products do not accept food from any other source. That is because a portion of them is from them. If a creature had wanted to make the food of his body, which is compounded of these elements, from other than these elements, or what is compounded of others, he would not have been able to do so.

As as it is only possible for natural bodies to accept food from something that is compounded of the same elements as they are, so it is not possible for anyone to know anything unless he has something like it. Don't you see that the self only accepts from the intellect what it shares with it and what resembles it? It does not know what it does not share with it at all. None of Allah is in anyone and it that is not permissible in any aspect, so no one recognises Him from his self and reflection. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Allah is veiled from the intellects as He is veiled from the eyes. The Highest Assembly seek Him as you seek Him." So the Prophet reported that the intellect does not perceive Him by its reflection nor by its inner eye nor does the eye perceive Him. This is what we indicated earlier in the chapter. Praise belongs to Allah for His inspiration and for teaching us what we did not know. The bounty of Allah is immense.

So there must be disconnection and negation of exemplification and connection. Whoever among those who use connection and go astray only go astray by allegorical interpretation and applying what the ayats and traditions bring us which we have not understood without looking into the disconnection which Allah made obligatory. That led them to pure ignorance and clear disbelief. If they had sought soundness and left the traditions and ayats as they had come without modifying anything in them to something else and entrusted the knowledge of that to Allah and His Messenger and said, "We do not know", that would have been better for them.

The words of Allah should be enough for them, "There is nothing like Him." (42:11) When a hadith comes to them which contains connections so that Allah is made like something, He negated the likeness in respect of Himself. So all that remains is that that tradition has one of the aspects of disconnection which Allah recognises and it is brought to Arab understanding in whose tongue the Qur'an was revealed.

Actually there is not to be found a single phrase in a tradition or ayat at all which is a text for connection. What you find with the Arabs is that it supports many aspects, one of which leads to connection and one of which leads to disconnection. The allegorical interpreter applies that phrase to the aspect which leads to connection by wronging that phrase since he does not recognise its proper due given to it by what its place in the language demands. He infringes on Allah when He applies to Him what is not proper for Allah. Allah willing, we will present some of the hadith which have come with connection and which are not really a text for it. "To Allah belongs the far-reaching proof. If He had willed, He would have guided you all." (6:149)

An example of that is when the Prophet said, "The heart of the believer is between two of Allah's fingers." [at-Tirmidhi] The intellect looks at what the subject demands of reality and metaphor and that a 'limb' is impossible for Allah! 'Finger' is a shared expression which can be applied to the limb or applied to blessing. The shepherd said:

Weak of staff [\[2\]](#), of Bedouin origin, you see him over them when people have not had their blessing end in drought.

He said, "You see him over them" is a good indication of blessing by looking after them well. The Arabs say, "What an excellent finger so-and-so has over his property" meaning that his effect on it is to make his property grow because of his good management of it.

The swiftest turning over of things is what is turned over by the fingers because of their small size and perfect capacity for that. So their movement is swifter than the hand and other things. When Allah turns over the hearts of the slaves, it is the swiftest thing. The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, was most eloquent to the Arabs in his supplication. using what they understood. Because for us, things are only turned over by the hand, he used turning with 'the fingers' because the fingers are part of the hand and are quicker. Thus the Prophet said in his supplication, "O Overturner of hearts, make my heart firm in Your deen!" [Ibn Majah] Allah's overturning of the hearts is what He creates in them of concern for good and interest in evil. When man senses the succession of thoughts which come to him in his heart, this is referred to as 'Allah turning the heart'. Man's knowledge cannot turn this away from himself. That is why the Prophet said, "O Overturner of hearts, make my heart firm in Your deen!"

Regarding this hadith, one of his wives said to him, "Do you fear then, Messenger of Allah?" He, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, replied, "The heart of the believer is between the fingers of Allah," so the Prophet indicated the swiftness of the turning from belief to disbelief and what they both contain. Allah said, "He inspired them with their depravity and godfearing." (91:8) This inspiration is the turning and the fingers are for speed. The fact that they are two ('two fingers') is the thought of good and the thought of evil.

So 'fingers' should be understood as we have stated. 'Fingers' can mean the limb and it can mean the blessing and good effect. So which of the two aspects will you connect to the limb when these disconnected aspects demand it? Either we will be silent and entrust knowledge of that to Allah and to the one whom Allah has acquainted with it - a sent messenger or an inspired wali as long as the limb is negated, or we are overcome by inquisitiveness which takes control of us, although we ascribe that to an assimilating anthropomorphising innovator. It is not by inquisitiveness, but it is obligatory for the knower in that to clarify the aspects of disconnection in that expression so as to invalidate the argument of every disappointed anthropomorphist. May Allah turn to us and him and provide him with Islam! If we discuss that word which must give rise to tashbih, its explanation must be modified to an aspect which befits Allah - glory be to Him! This is the portion of the intellect in the linguistic convention of the phrase.

The Blowing of a spirit (ruh) into a heart (ru')

(The portion of the heart from the two fingers from an unseen aspect)

'The two fingers' are the secret of essential perfection which is such that when it is unveiled to the eyes on the Day of Rising, a man will seize his father if he is an unbeliever and fling him into the Fire, and will not feel any pain in that nor any grief for him due to the secret of these two 'fingers' which has one meaning while the word is in the dual. The Garden and the Fire were created and the name illuminated and darkened, and Blesser and Avenger appeared. So do not imagine that these two fingers are two of ten fingers!

This secret must be pointed out in this chapter in the hadith, "Both of his Hands are right hands." This is gnosis of unveiling. The people of the Garden have two blessings: one is the blessing of the Garden and the other is the blessing of the punishment of the people of the Fire in the Fire. Similarly the people of the Fire have two punishments. Both groups see Allah by the Names just as they did in this world. In 'the two handfuls' which came from the Messenger, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, in respect of Allah is the secret of what we have said and pointed out. "Allah speaks the truth and guides to the Path." (33:4)

The handful and the right hand: Allah said, "The earth all together shall be His handful" (39:68) and "the heavens shall be rolled up in His right hand." (39:68) The intellect should see what the situation requires. First of all, at the beginning of the ayat, Allah forbade that He be determined by connection and anthropomorphism which weak intellects already have in the ayats and traditions which give rise to that in any aspect. Then after this disconnection (transcendence) which only those with knowledge understand, Allah said, "The earth all together shall be His handful."

One of the conventions of the Arabic language we know that it is said, "So-and-so is in my hand (qabda)," meaning under my jurisdiction, even though I have nothing of him at all in my actual hand. But my command is enforced on him and my judgement of him is carried out, just like my judgement over what my hand physically possesses and grasps. I also say, "My property is in my hand", i.e. my ownership and I can dispose of it and there is nothing to prevent me from doing so. When I dispose of it, in the moment in which I dispose of it, I can say, "It is in my hand for me to dispose of," even if that is my slaves who dispose of it with my permission.

Since a limb is impossible for Allah, the intellect must modify the sense, meaning and benefit of the "handful". It is the possession of what it grasps in the moment, even if the grasper does not have anything to grasp with. It is absolutely in the possession of the handful. Thus the universe is in the grasp/handful of the Truly Real. The earth in the Next World is designated as one of the possessions as you say, "My servant is in my grasp", even though the servant is only part of what is in our grasp. I have mentioned him especially because something particular has occurred.

In our view, 'the right hand' is the place of absolute strong transaction. 'The left' does not have the power of the right. So in the Qur'anic ayat, the right hand alludes to full mastery. It indicates mastery of power in the action. So the Qur'anic meaning reached the understanding of the Arabs by phrases which they recognised and were quick to grasp. The poet said:

When a banner is raised for glory, 'Araba takes it with the right hand.

Glory does not have a tangible manner, so the "limb" of the right hand does not take it. It is as if he were saying: If glory were to show a tangible banner, its place or bearer would be the right hand of 'Araba al-Awsi [one of the Ansar], meaning that the attribute of glory is complete in him. The Arabs still applies the phrases used for the limbs to things which the actual limb cannot accept because they share in the meaning.

The blowing of a spirit into a heart

When the Truly Real manifests Himself to the secret (sirr) of a slave who possesses all secrets and joins him to the free men and he has essential freedom of action in respect of the right hand, the honour of the left is by something else and the honour of the right is by its essence. To descend, the honour of the right hand is by the address (khatab) and the honour of the left is by presencing (tajalli). Man's honour is by recognising his reality and becoming acquainted with it, and it is the left = 'both hands' in respect of man are left just as both of Allah's hands are right!

Referring to the meaning of unification (ittihad), both of the hands of the slave are right. Referring to tawhid, one of the hands of Allah is right and the other left. Sometimes I am in 'gatheredness' and 'the gatheredness of gatheredness' and sometimes I am in 'separation' and 'separation of separation' according to the manifestation and the gift (warid).

One day when I encountered someone with good fortune (yaman), he was Yemeni.

If I met one going beyond (mu'addhi), he was 'Adnani.

Part of that is wonder, laughter, joy and anger. Wonder occurs from something existent who did not know that which makes him wonder and then he learns of it and it makes him wonder. So laughter is applied to him. This is impossible for Allah. There is nothing outside His knowledge, so when something occurs in existence which can make us wonder, that wonder and laughter is applied to the One who cannot have either wonder or laughter because the matter which occasions wonder among us, like the young man without youthful passion, is a wondrous matter. With Allah has the position of what would cause us wonder.

Laughter and joy emerge out of acceptance and pleasure. If you do an action for someone and because of it he shows you laughter and joy, he has accepted that action and is pleased with it. So His laughter and joy is His acceptance and pleasure with us. Similarly His anger is disconnected from the boiling of the blood of the heart seeking revenge because He is too pure for corporality and contingency. That refers doing the action of one who is angry who is permitted to be angry. It is His vengeance on the tyrants and those who oppose His command and overstep His bounds. Allah said, "He is angry with him" meaning that He repays him as is done with someone who is the object of wrath. So the Requitor is angry and the appearance of the action designates the name.

Smiling is part of laughter. The hadith says, "Allah smiles on the man who walks to the mosque for the prayer and remembrance." Since the world is veiled by phenomenal beings and they are occupied with other than Allah, they perform this action in a state of absence from Allah. When they come to Him with one of the varieties of presence, Allah sends down on them in their hearts some of the pleasure of the bliss of being present (muhadara), intimate conversation (munajat) and contemplation (mushahada) which endears itself to their hearts. The Prophet said, "Love Allah for the nourishment He has given you of His blessings." Smiling alludes to this action of His because it is the manifestation of joy when you come to Him. When someone makes it easy for you to come, the sign of his happiness is to display kindness and love to you and to send some of the blessings he has to you. When these things appear from Allah to the slaves who come to him, that is called 'smiling'.

Forgetfulness. Allah said, "He has forgotten them." (9:67) It is not permissible for Him to forget, but when Allah punishes them with eternal punishment and does not give them mercy, they become as if they have been forgotten by Him and it is as if He has forgotten them. This is the action of one who forgets and one who does not remember the pain of the punishment they are in. That is because in their live in this world they forgot Allah, so He repaid them with their own action and their action comes back on them appropriately.

The meaning of "Allah has forgotten them" is He has deferred them and the meaning of "they forgot Allah" is they deferred the command of Allah and did not do it. So Allah deferred them in the Fire when He brought out of it the others which He had made enter the Fire. Near this area is describing the Real with devising, mockery and mockery. Allah said, "Allah mocks them," (9:79) "Allah devises," (3:54) and "Allah will mock them." (2:15)

The breath (nafas): The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Do not curse the wind. It is from the breath of the Merciful." He also said, "I feel the breath of the Merciful coming to me from the Yemen." All of this is from comforting (tanfis). It is as if he were saying, "Do not curse the wind. It is part of what the Merciful uses to comfort (naffasa) His slaves." The Prophet said, "You aided with the east wind" as he said. "I feel the breath," i.e. the All-Merciful relieves my grief for me. This was the grief the Prophet had when his people denied him and rejected the command of Allah. He said, "From the direction of the Yemen", so the Ansar were among those by whom Allah relieved His Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, from what grieved him from the deniers. Allah the Great is free of the breath which is the air expelled by the breather. "Allah is greatly exalted above what the wrongdoers ascribe to Him!" (See 17:43)

Form (sura). Form is applied to a matter and to what is known with people and other things. The hadith attributes form to Allah in the Sahih and other books. For instance, there is the hadith of 'Ikrima, the Prophet said, "I saw my Lord in the form of a young man." This was a state of the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and it is a well-known usage in Arabic. It is like when the Prophet said, "Allah created Adam on His form."

Know that the quality of "likeness" which comes in Qur'an is linguistic, not intelligible, because an intelligible likeness is impossible for Allah. Zayd is a lion in strength. Zayd is a Zuhayr in poetry. When you describe something existent with one or two attributes and then describe another with that attribute, even if there is clear disparity between them in respect of other realities, they share in the spirit of that attribute. It means that each of them has the form of the other in that attribute in particular. So understand and take note!

See that your being indicates Him - glory be to Him! Did you describe Him with an attribute of perfection other than from you? Understand! When you enter the gate of stripping away equating, you negate imperfections which you are not allowed to do, even if you are not based on that at all. However when the anthropomorphist and assimilator ascribe that to him, you negate that attribution. If the anthropomorphist had not had the illusion, you would not have made any of this negation. Know that even if the form has many openings, but we have refrained from mentioning them since we wish to avoid making this book too long. "Allah speaks the truth and guides to the Path." (33:4)

The Arm. It is related in a tradition from the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, "the molar-tooth of the unbeliever in the Fire is like Uhud and his skin is as thick as forty arm-spans of the arm-span of the Almighty." This is an attribution of honouring by the amount which Allah made attributed to Him. It is like you saying, "This thing is so many arm-lengths of the King," meaning the greatest arm-length which the King makes, even though, for instance, the arm of the King is the limb, like people's limbs and the arm-span which he makes is greater than the King's limb by a half or its like. So in reality it is not his arm, but rather it is the estimate of his share and then it is ascribed to its maker, so know! In language, the "Almighty" is the Immense King.

It is like that with the foot. "The Mighty places His foot (in the Fire)". The foot is the limb. It is said, "So-and-so has a good in the business," meaning he is firm. The foot is a collective noun in creation, so the food is an attribution. The Mighty is the angel and this foot belongs to the angel since the limb is impossible for Allah!

Settling (istawa) is also applied to steadiness, direction and overwhelming. Steadiness is one of the qualities of bodies and is not permitted in respect of Allah! except in the aspect of steadiness. Direction is direction is will and it is one of the attributes of perfection. Allah said, "He lifted (istawa) Himself up to heaven," (3:29), i.e. intended. "He settled on the throne" (7:54) means occupied.

There are many traditions and ayats, some sound, some weak. There is no tradition which does not have one of the aspects of disconnection. If you want to more easily understand that, then apply yourself to the phrase which gives rise to tashbih and take its benefit or its spirit or what comes from it. Put it in what is due to the Truly Real and you will win the degree of disconnection when other people obtain the rank of connection. So act thus and purify your garment! This is enough of these traditions for the topic is long.

The blowing of the Purest Ruh in the Inner Heart

(The symbolic meaning of the phrases of tashbih in the Shari'a)

"The blowing of the purest spirit in the inner heart" is in the previous expressions: when the wonderer (the King) wonders at the one who has come out on His form (Adam), His Creator in his inner conscience, rejoicing in his existence, laughing in his witnessing and angry when he turns away, smiling when he comes near, forgetting his outward and breathing. So He let the ships take their course and is firm on His kingdom and rules over His kingdom by decree. What He wills is and the return is to Allah!

These are isolated spirits for which the supporting forms (ashbah) wait. When the time comes, moments come to an end, the heaven sways, the sun is rolled up, the earth is changed, the stars are thrown down, things are transformed, the Next World appears and man and others are gathered in the original state (See 19:10). Then the forms will give praise, the spirits will delight, the Opener will be manifested, the lamp will be kindled, the wine sparkle, pure love (wudd) appear, beseeching disappear, the wing spread, and the the Dome [3] established from the beginning of night to morning. How glorious a station! How delightful it is to selves in a perfect state. May Allah let us enjoy it!

1. Dihya al-Kalbi, in whose form Jibril appeared to the Prophet.
2. i.e. a good shepherd who tends his camels well.
3. The temple called al-Bayt al-Ma'mur corresponding to the Ka'ba in the Fourth Heaven.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Cause of the Beginning of the World and the Ranks of the Most Beautiful Names in the entire universe

In the cause of the beginning and its rules, and the end of fabrication and its perception,

And the difference between the subjects of the high in its origin and its rulers,

The proofs indicate the Maker who has manifested all by His rules.

(The elite of the place and the sensation of the Garden)

The pure wali grasped the cause of the beginning of the world in our book entitled, 'Anqa' Mughrib fi ma'rifa khatmi'l-awliya' wa shamsu'l-Maghrib' and in our book entitled Insha' ad-Dawa'ir some of which we wrote in his noble house when we visited him in 598 on our way to hajj. His servant, 'Abdu'l-Jabbar (may Allah elevate his worth!) copied out for him what I had written of it. I travelled to Makka with him in this year to finish it there. This book (The Futuh) distracted us from it and anything else because of a divine command which came upon us to write it, as well as the desire of some of the brothers and fuqara' for me to do that since they desired to increase their knowledge and to receive the blessings of this Blessed Noble House, the place of blessings, guidance and clear signs. In this place we also desired to acquaint the noble pure one, Abu Muhammad 'Abdu'l-'Aziz (al-Mahdawi al-Qurashi), with the blessings Makka gives and that it is the best method of worship and the noblest earthly inanimate station. Perhaps the himma of yearning will rise to perform it and the desire for increase in it will descend. It was revealed to the one who "was given all the words" and had eye-witnessing of his Lord, closer than "two bows-lengths", in spite of this most perfect proximity and fullest portion, "Say, 'Lord increase me in knowledge.'" (20:114)

Part of the precondition of the witnessing knower, master of unseen and visible stations, is that he know that places have an effect in the subtle hearts. If the heart were to exist in any place in the most universal existence, its existence would be the most glorious and complete in Makka. As spiritual stages vary in excellence, so do physical stages. Is the pearl like the stone, unless it is with someone in a particular state? The perfected master of the station differentiates between them as the Truly Real differentiates between them. Does the Real equate a house built of bricks and straw with a house built of gold and silver? The sage who has arrived is the one who gives everything with a due its proper due. He is unique in his age and the master of his moment. So there is a great difference between a city most of whose structures are appetites and a city most of whose structures are clear signs!

Did not my pure friend friend agree with me that the existence of our hearts in certain places is greater in some places than in others. May Allah be pleased with him! He abandoned retreat (khilwa) in the houses of the protected minaret in eastern Tunis along the coast and went down to ar-Rabita which is in the middle of the tombs, near the minaret on the side where its door is located. It is traced to al-Khidr. I asked him about that and he said, "I find my heart there more than in the minaret." I also experienced there what the Shaykh had said.

The wali knew that to due to whoever inhabits the place is either in the state of the noble angels or sincere jinn, or it is due the himma of the one who visits it when it is no longer there - like the house of Abu Yazid which was called "The House of the Pious", or the zawiyya of al-Junayd at Shuniziyya, or the cave of Ibn Adham at Yaqin and other places of the righteous who have departed from this world while their traces remain in their places affecting subtle hearts. This is the reason why mosques vary in excellence in the existence of the heart, but not in the doubling of the reward. You find your heart more in one mosque than another. That is not due to the earth, but to the assembly of comrades and their himma. The person who does not find a difference in the existence of his heart between the mosque and markets has a state, not a station.

I do not doubt by unveiling and knowledge that if the angels were to inhabit the entire earth with their rivalry in gnoses and ranks, the highest of them in rank and greatest in knowledge and gnosis would inhabit the Masjid al-Haram. Your existence is according to those whose company you keep. The himma of those who sit together has an effect on the one who sits with them and their himma is according to their ranks. If the rivalry is based on himma, then 124,000 Prophets, not counting the awliya', did tawaf of this House. There is no Prophet or wali who does not have a himma connected to this House.

This city is the sacred city because it is the House which Allah chose over all other houses. It has the secret of firstness in places of worship as Allah said, "The first house established for the people was that at Bakka, a blessed place, and a guidance to all the worlds. Therein are clear signs - the station of Ibrahim, and whoever enters it is secure" (3:97) from every fear. There are other ayats. If the pure friend had travelled to this noble sacred city, he would have experienced gnoses and increase which he had not seen before that nor had occurred to his mind.

He knew that the self will be gathered on the form of its knowledge while the body will be gathered on the form of its action. The form of knowledge and action are more complete in Makka than elsewhere. If someone with a heart were to enter it for a single hour, it would have that. So how much would it have it if he were to be in its proximity and reside there and performed all the obligations and rules? There is no doubt that his witnessing there would be more complete and sublime, and its gift would be purer, sweeter and more delightful. Then my friend informed me that he felt increase and decrease according to places and natural dispositions, and he knew that that also derives from the reality of the one living there or his himma as we mentioned. We have no doubt that recognition of this science, i.e. recognition of places and the sensation of increase and decrease comes from the completeness of the mastery of the gnostic's recognition and the height of his station and honour over things and the strength of his discrimination. May Allah write a good effect for the wali and give him a good report in it since he enjoyed that and was capable of it.

(The Divine Names and realities of existence)

Know, may Allah give success to us, you and all the Muslims! that most of those who know by Allah among the people of unveiling and realities do not possess knowledge of the reason for the beginning of the universe other than the connection of the Timeless to its being brought into existence. Allah gave being to what He knew He would give being to. Here most people stop. We, and those who Allah has acquainted with what he has acquainted us with, have grasped other matters. This is that when you look at the universe in detail with its realities and ascriptions, you find it limited by realities and ascriptions, with known stages and ranks, and finite genera of similar and dissimilar things. If you understand this matter, you know that this has a subtle secret and wondrous matter whose reality is not perceived precisely by reflection or investigation. Rather, it is one of the knowledges given by unveiling and the results of striving which accompanies himma. Striving without himma does not produce anything nor have any effect in knowledge, but it has effect in the state by the fineness and purity the striver feels.

Know, may Allah teach you the secrets of judgements and give you all the words! that the Most Beautiful Names, which are above the names which can be counted and bring down happiness below the enumerated names, have an effect in this universe. They are the 'first keys' which only He knows. Every reality in existence has one of the names which is particular to it. By reality, I mean a reality which gathers together a genus of the realities. The Lord of that reality is that name and that reality is its slave and under its commission. It is only that.

If something combines several names for you, the matter is not as you imagine it to be. You look at that thing, you find that it has aspects compatible with those names it indicates, which are the realities which we mentioned. That is like what was confirmed for you in the knowledge which is in the outward intellect and under its jurisdiction in respect of a certain existent being singular and indivisible – like the single substance (jawhar) which is an indivisible part. In spite of that, this single substance contains numerous realities which demand an equal number of Divine Names. The reality of its being brought into existence demands the name the All-Powerful. From the aspect of its precision it demands the name of the Knowing. The aspect of its selection demands the name the Transformer. The aspect of its manifestation demands the name the Seer and Looker, etc. Even if this substance is but one, it has these and other aspects which we have not mentioned. And each aspect has many aspects which demand their commensurate names. Those aspects are the reality and they are secondary in our opinion and it is difficult to grasp them and even more difficult to obtain them by unveiling.

(The matrices of the Divine Names)

Know that we may leave the Names with their multiplicity when we look at the aspects of those who seek them in the world. When we do not look at that, we see the matrices of the demands of knowledge which they need and we recognise that the Names which are the matrices on which they stand are also the matrices of the Names. So it is easy to look, complete the goal and it is easy to go beyond these matrices to the offshoots, as it is easy to return the offshoots to the matrices. If you look at all the Names known in the celestial and terrestrial world, you will find seven names designated as the Attributes by those who know the science of Kalam which contains them. We have discussed this in our book called Insha' ad-Dawa'ir.

Our aim in this book is not in these seven matrices designated as the Attributes, but our aim is the matrices necessary for bringing the universe into existence. Similarly we do not need intellectual proofs of the recognition of the Real beyond the fact that He exists, is Knowing, Transforming, Powerful, Alive. No more is necessary. No more than this is required by responsibility. The Messenger, peace be upon him, made us recognise that He speaks. Responsibility made us recognise that He hears and sees, and so on with other Names. What we need here from recognition of the names is for the existence of the universe. These names are the Lords of the Names and all other names are in their custody as some of these lords have custody of others.

The matrices of the Divine Names are: the Living, the Knowing, the Transforming, the Speaker, the Generous, the Equitable. These are the offspring of two Divine Names: the Manager and the Divider. The Living confirms your understanding after and before your existence. The Knowing confirms your consolidation in your existence, and before your existence confirmed your determination. The Transformer confirms your selection. The Powerful confirms your non-existence. The Speaker confirms your timelessness. The Generous confirms your being brought into existence. The Equitable confirms your rank. The rank is the last of the stages of existence.

These realities must exist, and their names which are their Lords are also necessary. The Living is the Lord of the Lords and the subjects. It is the Imam. Next in rank is the Knower (al-'Alim), then the Transformer, then the Speaker, then the Powerful, then the Generous, and last of them, the Equitable. It is the Lord of ranks and it is the last of the stages of existence. The remaining names are under the authority of those Imam-Lords.

(The Imams of the Divine Names)

That is was the reason that those Names turned the rest of the Names with their realities to the name Allah in bringing the universe into existence. In view of the fact that the Imams of the names, without considering the universe, are only these four - the Living, the Speaking, the Hearing and the Seeing - when Allah hears His words and sees His essence, His existence is perfect in His essence without regard for the universe. We only mean the names by which the existence of the universe was established. We have many names, so we turned to their lords and came to them in their presences and only found those which we mentioned. We presented them according to what we saw of them. So this was the reason that the lords of the names turned the rest of the names to the name Allah when our sources were brought into existence.

The first who undertook to demand this universe was the Divine Name, the Manager (al-Mudabbir) and the Divine Name, the Divider (al-Mufasssil) at the request of the name, the King. Then these two names turned to the thing from which the example (mithal) exists in the universe itself without it being from prior non-existence, but rather a prior rank, not a prior existence - like the rising of the sun preceding the beginning of the day. Even if we connect the beginning of the day to the rising of the sun, it is still clear that the cause of the existence of the day is the rising of the sun which accompanies it in existence. This is how the matter is.

Then these two Divine Names managed the universe and divided it without previous ignorance of it or lack of knowledge. So the form of the model grew in the universe itself. Then His name, the Knowing, was connected to that model as it was connected to the form from which it was taken, even if it is not seen because it does not exist as will be mentioned in the chapter. "From what did the universe exist?"

The first of the names of the universe are these two Divine Names: the Manager and the Divider. The name, the Manager, is what realised the determined moment of bringing into existence. The name, the Transformer, is connected to it according to the limit on which the Manager brought it forth and managed. These two names did not do anything of the formation of this model without the participation of the rest of the names, but from behind the veil of these two names. Therefore the Imamate is proper for them, while the others were not aware of that until the form of the model (mithal) emerged. Then they saw in it the realities appropriate to themselves which attracted them to affect passion for them. So every name became enamoured of its reality which exists in the Model, but it could not achieve any effect in it since that is not granted by the presence in which this model manifests itself. Thus that love and passion leads them to seeking, striving and the desire to bring the form of that model into existence so that their power might appear and their existence would be valid in reality. There is nothing with a greater himma than a mighty one who does not find someone mighty to dominate and abase under his force so that the authority of its might will be valid - or a rich one who does not find someone who needs his wealth! It is the same with all these names. So the rest of the names sought refuge in their Lords, the Seven Imams which we mentioned, asking them to bring the source of this model which they saw in the essence of the one who knew into existence. This is what is designated as the universe.

(The Divine Names are unified in respect of the Essence, separate in respect of connections)

Somone might ask: "O realised one! How can the rest of the Divine Names see this model when the fact is that only the name, the Seeing, sees it and every Divine Name has a reality which another name does not have?" We would reply: May Allah give you success! You should know that every Divine Name contains all the Divine Names and every name is described by all the names on its horizon. Every Name is living, powerful, hearing, seeing, speaking in its horizon and in its knowledge. If not, how could every Divine Name be a lord to the one who serves it? How preposterous! How far from the mark!

However, there is a subtle indication which one is not aware of. That is that you know absolutely that every grain of wheat or its like contains realities which its sister does not, just as you also know that this seed is not the same as that other seed, even though they both contain similar realities and so are alike. So seek this reality which makes you differentiate between these two seeds and say, "This is not the same as that." This holds true for all similar things in respect of what the resemblance is. It is the same with the Divine Names: every name contains the realities which the names contain. Then you know absolutely that this name is not that other name by that subtle quality (latifa) which you used to differentiate between the grains of wheat and everything which is similar. So seek this meaning until you recognise it by dhikr, not by reflection.

However, I want to acquaint you with a reality which no one before has mentioned. Perhaps it has not been disclosed or specified and I do not know whether it will be given to anyone after me or not from the presence which gave it to me. If it is read or understood in my book, I am the one who teaches it while the earlier ones did not discover it. That is that every Divine Name, as we stated, contains the realities of the the names while this latifa exists which gives you this distinction between two similar things. With the name the Blessor and the name the Punisher which are the Outward and the Inward, each of these names contains what its custodians contain, from their first to their last. However the Lords of the Names and other names have three ranks. Some are connected to the degrees of the Lords of the Names, and some of them have a degree on their own, and some of them are connected to the degree of the Blessor and some of them to the degree of the Punisher. These are the names of the universe which are enumerated, and Allah is the Helper!

(The Greatest Name of Allah)

Then all the names referred back to those Imams and the Imams referred back to the name of Allah and the name of Allah referred back to the Essence since it is independent of the names, and asked for assistance in what the Names had asked it for. So "The Good, the Generous" granted that and said, "Speak to the Imams connected to bringing the universe forth according to what their realities." The name Allah went out to them and told them the news and they became happy, joyful and delighted and they are still like that. They looked at the presence which is mentioned in Chapter Six and brought the universe into existence as we will mention in the following chapters, Allah willing. "Allah speaks the truth and guides to the path." (33:4)

CHAPTER SIX

Concerning the beginning of the spiritual creation.

Who was the first to exist in it? From what did it exist? In what did it exist?

In what manner did it exist? What was its goal?

Concerning the spheres of the Macrocosm and the Microcosm

Look at this well-planned existence.

Our existence is like the designated cloak.

Look at His khalifs in their kingdom, those who have the clear eloquent tongue (Arabic) and non-Arab tongues.

None of them loves his God without mixing it with love of the dirham.

It is said: This is the slave of gnosis and this is the slave of the gardens and those are the slaves of Jahannam

Except for a few among a few who are intoxicated with Him without the sensation of illusion.

They are the slaves of Allah whom none know but Him, not the slaves of bliss.

He lets them profit from every obscure knowledge when He wants them to return to their castles.

The knowledge of the antecedant is in the elements alone, and its basis from it is not decreased.

The reality of the adverb is that which veils it from its likes, and this likeness is not concealed

And the knowledge of the cause by which the source of the worlds exists in the oldest species

And the end of the matter which has no end perceived for it in it is the Mightiest Mighty One.

The knowledges of the spheres of existence, large and small, are only for the one who does not find fault.

These are the knowledges of the one who has realised their unveiling, and it guides the hearts to the straightest path.

Praise belongs to Allah who has all its knowledges and knows what is not known.

Brief Elucidation

The beginning of creation was fine dust, and the first existent in it is the Muhammadan reality of the Rahman. It is not contained in any place since it is not contained. From what did the world come into existence? It came into existence from the known reality which is described by neither existence nor non-existence. In what did it exist? It existed in fine dust. In what manner did it exist? It existed on the form known in the self of the Real. Why did it exist? It existed in order to manifest divine realities. What was its goal? Its goal was to be purified of mixture, so that every world would recognise its portion from its origin without mixture. So the goal of the world is to manifest its realities [i.e. the realities of the Real or the realities of creation], and recognition of the spheres of the Macrocosm from the world. In the usage of the [Sufi] community, it is whatever is other than man. The Microcosm, i.e. man, is the spirit, cause and reason for the world. The spheres of the world are its stations, movements and the separation of its classes. This is a summary of all that the chapter contains.

(Man is the Microcosm)

As man is the Microcosm by way of the body, so he is also inconsiderable due to his being in-time. Resembling the divine is valid for him since he is the khalif of Allah in the world and the world is subject to him, a vassal of the divine as man is a vassal of the divine.

Know that the most perfect formation of man is in this world. In the Next world, each man is in one of two parties based on equity in the state, not in knowledge. Each party knows its opposite state. So man is either believer or unbeliever. It is either happiness or misery, bliss or punishment, blessed or punished. Thus the recognition of this world is more complete although the manifestation (tajalli) of the Next world is more sublime. So understand! Open this lock! In this station, we have a symbol for whoever is clever and it is an ugly and disgusting expression whose meaning is beautiful and unprecedented:

The spirit of the Macrocosm is this Microcosm

The spirit of the great existence is this small existence.

If it had not been for that, He would not have said,
"I am the great, the powerful.

"My in-timeness should not veil you nor my annihilation nor rising.
"If you reflect on Me, I am the Encompassing, the Great,

"My existence belongs to the ancient, and the new has manifestation."
Allah is Unique, Out-of-time. Deficiency does not touch Him.

Phenomenal being is a new creation which is captive in His hands.

From this it came that I am inconsiderable existence,
And every existence revolves around my existence.

There is no night like my night and no light like my light.
So if someone speaks of me as a slave, I am the poor slave.

Or if he says that I am existence, then I am Aware Existence.

Proclaim a kingdom for me and you will find me or the rabble, as long as you do not encroach.

O you ignorant of My power! Are you knowing, seeing?

My existence reports about me, although speech can be both truth and lie.

Say to my your people: I am the Compassionate, the Forgiving.

Say: My punishment is the destroying punishment.

Say: I am weak, incapable, a captive.
So how can a person be blessed or destroyed by my hand?

The expansion and explanation of the chapter.
From Allah comes support and help.
(Four known things of existence)

Know that known things are four: The Real, who is described with absolute existence because He is neither caused by anything nor the cause of anything. He is the Creator of causes and exists by His Essence from own His Essence. Knowledge of Him refers to knowledge of His existence, and His existence is not other than His essence. However, His Essence is not known, but the attributes ascribed to Him are known. This means the attributes of meanings, which are the attributes of perfection. Knowledge of the reality of the Essence is impossible since it is not known by either proof or logical demonstration and is untouched by definition. Allah is not like anything and nothing is like Him. So how can the one who is like things be like the One who resembles nothing and nothing resembles Him? Gnosis of Him is that "there is nothing like Him" (42:10) and "Allah cautions you about Himself".(3:27) The Shari'a includes the prohibition against reflection about the Essence of Allah.

(The reality of realities)

The second known is the universal reality which belongs to the Real and to the universe, which is not described as existent or non-existent, in-time or out-of-time. It is out-of-time when the out-of-time is described by it, and in-time when the in-time is described by it. In-time and out-of-time known things are not known until this reality is known, but this reality does not exist until the things described by it exist. If something exists without prior non-existence, like the existence of the Real and His attributes, it is said that it is an out-of-time existent since Allah is described by it. If something exists from non-existence like the existence of what is other than Allah, which is in-time and exists by other than itself, it is said that it is in-time. It is in every existent according to its universal reality. It does not accept division, so "each" and "some" do not apply to it. One does not attain to its gnosis free of form by either proof or demonstration. The world exists from this reality by means of the Real. This reality does not exist in its essence, so Allah brings us into existence from an out-of-time existent. Thus out-of-timeness is established for us.

Similarly you should know that this universal reality is not described as being before the world nor is the world described as being after it. Rather, it is the root of existent things in general. It is the source of the substance (jawhar), the sphere of life, the truth by which creation takes places [See Qur'an 15:85] and other things. It is the intelligible Encompassing Sphere. If you said that it is the world, you would be speaking the truth. If you said that it is not the world, you would be speaking the truth. If you said that it is the Truth or not the Truth, you would be speaking the truth. It accepts all of this. It multiplies with the multiplicity of persons of the world and is disconnected with the disconnection of the Real.

If you want an example to make it easy for you to understand, look at the woodness in a piece of wood, the chair, the inkwell, the minbar and the box. Look as well at squareness and similar things in forms in every sort of square like the room, box, and piece of paper. Squareness and woodness are by their reality in each of these individual items [without multiplicity or being in part]. Look also at the colours: the whiteness of the garment, jewel, paper, flour, ointment, etc, without the intelligible whiteness in the garment being described as being part of the garment in itself. Rather it is the reality of whiteness which appeared in the garment as it appeared in the paper. It is like that with knowledge, power, will, hearing, sight and all things. This will make this universal known clear to you. We spoke at length on it in our book entitled, Insha' al-Jadawil w ad-Dawa'ir.

There is a third known, which is the entire world: angels and spheres and the worlds that they contain, the air and the earth and the world that is between them. It is the Greater Kingdom. Finally there is the fourth known which is man, the Khalif appointed by Allah in this world which is subject to him. Allah said, "He has subjected to you whatever is in the heavens and whatever is in the earth, all together, from Him." (45:12)

Whoever knows these known things, has no other known which he seeks. Among these four knowns is that whose existence is only known - the Real, may He be exalted! His actions and attributes are known by making examples. Some of them are only known by the model (mithal) - like knowledge of the Universal Reality. Some of them are known by both aspects, and by whatness (mahiyya) and how-ness: the world and man.

Section

(The beginning of the world and its model: dust and the Muhammadan reality)

"Allah was and nothing was with Him." (al-Bukhari) Then he added to this hadith, "He is now as He was." No quality which He did not already have refers to Him from the fact that He brought the world into existence. He described Himself before His creation and was named with the Names by which His creation calls upon Him. When He wanted the world to exist and began it according to the limit He knew by His knowledge of Himself, it was effected from that pure will by a sort of prescencing (tajalli) from the manifestations of disconnection (tanzih) to the Universal Reality. A reality was effected from it called dust or nebula (haba') which like the gypsum the builder casts down in which he can open whatever shapes and forms he wishes. This was the first existent in the universe which was mentioned by 'Ali ibn Abi Talib, Sahl ibn ÔAbdullah at-Tustari and others among the people of realization, the people of unveiling and existence.

Then Allah manifested Himself by His light to that dust. The philosophers call it the primal whole (al-Hayula al-Kull). It contains the entire universe by potentiality and by competence. So every thing accepted from Him in that dust according to its potential and predisposition, as the corners of the room accept the light of the lamp, and the intensity of its illumination and acceptance is according to its nearness to that light. Allah said, "The likeness of His light is as a niche wherein is a lamp." (24:35) He makes His light like a lamp. So there was nothing nearer to accepting it in that dust except the reality of Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, which is called the Intellect. So it was the master of the entire universe and the first thing to appear in existence. Its existence came from that Divine Light and from the dust and from the Universal Reality. His source existed in the dust. The source of the universe came from his prescencing (tajalli). The closest of people to him was ÔAli ibn Abi Talib, and the secrets of the Prophets.

As for the model (mithal) on which the entire universe existed without separation, it is the knowledge dependent on the Real. Allah knows us by His knowledge of Himself and brought us into existence according to what He taught us. We have this specific form in His knowledge. If the matter had not been like that, this form would have come to us by accident, not intention, because He would not have known it. It is not possible that a form issue into existence by accident. If it had not been that this specific form is known by Allah and willed by Him, He would not have brought us into existence on it, and this form could not have been taken from any other since it is confirmed that Allah "was and nothing was with Him". So there only remain the forms He brings out in Himself. He knows it Himself. He knew us before time, not after non-existence. That is how His knowledge of us is. Our model, which is the same as His knowledge of us, is out-of-time with the out-of-timeness of Allah because it is an attribute of His, and in-timeness does not concern Him. He is too majestic for that!

(The goal of the universe)

As for our statement, "Why was the universe brought into existence? What is its goal?" the answer is that Allah says, "I only created men and jinn to worship Me." (51:56) He made a clear statement about the reason for which He brought us into existence. It is the same with the entire universe while Allah mentioned us and the jinn in particular. Here the jinn is every hidden thing, be it angel or something else. Allah said about the heavens and the earth, "Come willingly or unwillingly! They said, 'We come willingly.'" (41:11) He also said, "But they refused to carry it." (33:72). That is because it was a offer. If it had been a command, they would have obeyed and carried it since it is inconceivable that they rebel. They were created for that [obedience], but the fiery jinn and men were not so endowed.

(All the universe is alive and articulate)

Similarly there are philosophers among the people of investigation and proofs who are confined to the senses, necessities and proofs, who say that the obligated person must have intellect in respect of understanding what is said to him. They spoke the truth. The matter is like that with us since the entire universe is intelligent, living, and articulate. This is confirmed in respect of unveiling by the breaking of norms (miracles) which people have, i.e. our obtaining knowledge of this. However they say, "This is an unintelligible inanimate object." They stopped at what their eyes told them. According to us, the matter is different from that.

When it is reported from a Prophet that a stone spoke, or a sheep-shoulder or the trunk of a tree or a beast, they say that Allah created life and knowledge in it at that moment. [\[1\]](#) That is not what we consider the matter to be. It is the secret of life which flows through the entire universe and all "who hear the mu'adhdhan, moist or dry, will testify for him" [Ibn Majah, Nasa'i, Abu Dawud] and it only testifies from knowledge. This is confirmed by unveiling with us, not by the deduction of whoever looks into what the apparent information indicates and no more. Whoever wants to grasp it should travel the path of the Men and cling to retreat and dhikr. Then Allah will acquaint him with all of this directly. So he will know that people are blind to the perception of these realities.

(The existence of the universe is the manifestation of the Power of the Names)

Allah brought the universe into existence in order to manifest the power of the Names. Power without the object of power, generosity without gift, provider without provided for, helper without helped, merciful without object of mercy are realities devoid of effect. Allah made the universe in this world a mixture as He mixed the two handfuls in the clay. Then He separated individuals from it and made one handful enter into the other handful. Each handful is mixed with its brother, but the states are unknown. Scholars vary in excellence in extracting the foul from the good and the good from the foul. The goal is purification from this mixture and the distinguishing the two handfuls until this one is alone with its world and that one is alone with its world. It is as Allah said, "until He shall distinguish the corrupt from the good. He will put some of the corrupt on others, and so He will pile it up altogether and put it in Jahannam." (8:37)

Whoever has some of that mixture remaining in him when he dies is not gathered on the Day of Rising among the trusty. [See Qur'an 15:46; 34:37; 41:40; 44:55, but esp. 27:89.] However, some people are freed of this mixture in the Reckoning, and some are only freed in Jahannam. When he is purified, he comes out. They are the people of intercession. As for the one who is distinguished into one of the two handfuls here, he moves by a reality to the Next World from his grave to bliss, or to punishment and Jahim. He is already purified.

This is the clarification of the goal of the world. These two handfuls are two realities which refer back to an attribute which the Real has in His Essence (like the two feet). From here we say that the people of the Fire see Him as Punishing and the people of the Garden see Him as Blessing. This is a noble secret. Perhaps you will grasp it in the Next Abode by witnessing, Allah willing. Those of realisation obtain it in this world.

(The celestial and terrestrial knowledges and their likes in man)

As for what we said in this chapter concerning the spheres of the Macrocosm and the Microcosm which is man, by it I mean the worlds of its totalities and genera. Its amirs are those who have effect on others. I have made the spheres of the Macrocosm and the Microcosm reciprocal. This one is a copy of that one. We gave them orbits in the forms of the spheres and their order in the book, Insha' ad-Dawa'ir wa'l-Jawadil which we began to write in Tunis in the house of Imam Abu Muhammad ÔAbdu'l-'Aziz (al-Mahdawi al-Qurashi) [2], our friend and guardian, may Allah have mercy on him! In this chapter we have put a summary of what is connected to it.

We say that the worlds are four: the celestial world, which is the world of going-on; then the world of change, which is the world of annihilation; then the world of habitation which is the world of going-on and annihilation; and then there is the world of ascriptions. These worlds are in two places: in the Macrocosm, which is what is outside of man, and in the Microcosm, which is man.

The highest world is the Muhammadan Reality. Its sphere is life. It has an equivalent in man in the latifa and the Pure Ruh. It includes the Encompassing Throne whose equivalent in man is the body. There is also the Footstool, whose equivalent in man is the self. There is also the Inhabited House whose equivalent in man is the heart. There are also the angels whose equivalent in man are the spirits and capacities in him. There is also Saturn and its sphere, whose equivalent in man is the faculty of knowledge and the breath. There is Jupiter and its sphere whose equivalent in man is the faculty of memory and rear part of the brain. There is also Mars and its sphere whose equivalent in man is the faculty of intellect and the crown of the head. There is the Sun and its sphere whose equivalent is the faculty of reflection and the middle of the brain. There is Venus and its sphere whose equivalent in man is the faculty of illusory imagination (imagination) and the animal spirit. There is Mercury and its sphere and its equivalent in man is the faculty of the imagination (khayal) and the front of the brain. Then there is the moon and its sphere whose equivalent is the sensory faculty and the limbs which have sensation. These are the classes of the upper world and their equivalents in man.

The world of change includes the orb of the ether whose spirit is hot and dry. It is the orb of fire and its equivalent in man is yellow bile whose spirit is the power of digestion. It includes the air whose spirit is hot and wet and is equivalent to the blood. Its spirit is the faculty of attraction. It includes water whose spirit is cold and wet and whose equivalent is phlegm. Its spirit is the faculty of expulsion. It includes earth whose spirit is cold and dry and whose equivalent is black bile. Its spirit is the faculty of retention.

There are seven classes of the earth: black earth, dusty earth, red earth, yellow earth, white earth, blue earth and green earth. The equivalents of these seven in man's body are: skin, fat, flesh, veins, nerves, muscles and bones.

The world of inhabitation includes the Ruhaniyyun whose equivalents are the faculties in man. It includes the world of animal whose equivalent is what is sensed in man. It includes the world of plants whose equivalent is whatever grows in man. It also includes the world of inanimates whose equivalent is what is not sensed in man.

The world of ascriptions includes the non-essential (aÔrad) whose equivalent is black and white, colours and beings (akwan). Then there is "how" whose equivalent is states like healthy and ill. Then there is "How many" whose equivalent is "the thigh is longer than the forearm". Then there is "where" whose equivalent is the neck as a place for the head and the lerg as a place for the thigh. Then there is "time" whose equivalent is "I move my head at the moment when my hand moves." Then there is the relative (idafa) whose equivalent is, "This is my father, so I am his son." There is place whose equivalent is "my language and my dialect." There is the active verb whose equivalent is "I ate". There is the passive verb whose equivalent is "I became full." Some of them have different forms in the matrices [the other three] like elephants, donkeys, lions and cockroaches. The equivalent of this is the human capacity which accepts forms of meanings which are both blameworthy and praiseworthy. "This one is clever so he is an elephant. That one is stupid so he is a donkey. This one is brave so he is a lion. This one is a coward so he is cockroach."

"Allah speaks the truth and guides to the path." (33:4)

CHAPTER SEVEN

The Beginning of Human Bodies (The last thing to come into existence in the Macrocosm and the last class of products)

The reality of the inward of man grew into a strong kingdom with manifest power.

Then his essence sat on the throne of Adam as the Throne was sat on by the Merciful.

The reality of his body appeared in its source-form, and the kingdom of the second existence is completed by it.

The gnoses of his knowledge appeared in his articulation among the noble and the hateful.

So their dreams became paltry because of his knowledges, and the accursed shaytan became proud.

They sought nearness to Allah in His Malakut, but a little shaytan brought loss to them.

(Making the natural world inhabited)

Know –may Allah support you! – that the time of the habitation of the natural world which is limited by time and contained in place is 71,000 of the years known in this world. This length of time is 11 days of days of other names, and one and two-fifths days of the days of the Possessor of Ascents. There are different sorts of days. Allah says, "In a day whose measure was 50,000 years" (4:70) and "a day with your Lord is like 1000 years of your counting." (22:47) The smallest of the days is that which is measured by the movement of the encompassing sphere which appears in our day of 24 hours. The smallest of the days with the Arabs, which is this, belongs to the largest sphere. That is due to its influence on the spheres inside of it since the movement of what is below it in night and day its surface movement which forces the rest of the spheres which it encompasses.

(The natural and surface movement of the spheres)

Every sphere has a natural movement which it has along with the surface movement. Every sphere below it has two movements in the same movement: a natural movement and a surface movement.

Every natural movement in every sphere has a particular day whose measure is counted by the days occurring from the Encompassing Sphere which is designated in His words, "of your counting". All of them intersect the Encompassing Sphere. Whenever it intersects it completely, its day belongs to it and the orbit revolves. So the smallest of its days is 28 days "of your counting". It is the measure of the intersection of the moon's movement in the Encompassing Sphere.

Allah set up these seven planets in the heavens so that human sight might perceive the intersection of their spheres in the Encompassing Sphere "in order to know the number of years and the reckoning." (10:5) "He determined it by stations so that you might know the number of years and the reckoning." "We shall distinguish everything." (17:11) "That is the determination of the Mighty, the Knowing." (6:96) Every planet has a determined day by which they are distinguished from each other according to the speed of their natural movements or the smallness or largeness of their spheres.

(The Creation of the Pen and the Tablet)

Know that Allah then created the Pen and the Tablet and called them the Intellect and the Spirit (Ruh). He gave the Ruh two attributes: an attribute of knowledge and an attribute of action. He made the Intellect teach it and inform it with use of immediate witnessing, as it derives cutting from the form of the knife without it saying anything about that. Allah created a substance (jawhar) without a self which is the aforementioned Spirit which He called dust. This is the naming which has come down to us from 'Ali ibn Abi Talib.

(Creation of dust (haba'))

Dust is mentioned in the Arabic language. Allah said, "it was scattered dust". (56:6) It was like that when 'Ali ibn Abi Talib saw it, meaning that this substance is scattered in all natural forms, and there is no form free of it since the form only exists in this substance called dust. It is with every form by its reality. It is not divisible nor separated nor described with decrease. It is like the whiteness existing in every white thing by its essence and reality. It is not said that there is a decrease of whiteness according to what this white thing receives of whiteness. This resembles the state of this substance.

(The Four ranks between the Spirit and Dust)

Allah apportioned four ranks between this Spirit described with the two attributes and the dust. He made each rank a stage for four angels. He appointed these angels as guardians over what He originated of the world below them, from the 'Illiyun' to the "lowest of the low". He gave each of those angels a knowledge which he wants to carry out in the world.

The first thing that Allah brought into existence in source-forms which is connected to the knowledge and management of these angels is the Universal Body. The first shape which Allah opened in this body is the global spherical form since it is the best of forms. Then Allah descended by bringing-into-existence and creation to the completion of the manufacture, and made all that He created the domain of these angels. He entrusted them with its affairs in this world and the Next World and safeguarded them from opposing what He commanded them to do. He told us that they "do not disobey Allah in what He commands them and they do what they are commanded." (66:6)

(The creation of products (muwalladat))

Then He finished the creation of the products of inanimates, plants and animals at the end of 71,000 years of the years of this world which you count and ordered the world in a wise ordering. From the very first existent to the last product, which is animal, He did not use both His hands in the creation of anything except man. Man is this bodily organism of dust. Everything except for that He created from a Divine command or by one hand. Allah said, "Our word to a thing when We will it is that We say to it, 'Be!' and it is." (16:40) This is from a Divine command. It is reported in tradition that Allah created the Garden of Eden with His hand, wrote the Torah with His hand, planted the tree of Tuba [in Paradise] with His hand and created Adam, who is man, with both His hands. In order to show honour to Adam, Allah said to Iblis, "What prevented you from prostrating to what I created with My hands?" (38:75)

(The Lowest Sphere and the Twelve Constellations (al-Buruj: the Zodiac))

When Allah created the lowest sphere, which is the first one mentioned above, He divided it into twelve parts called "mansions (constellations)". Allah said, "and the heaven with constellations". (85:1) Each division has a constellation and those divisions have four natures. He repeated each of the four natures in three places. He made these divisions like the stages and watering-spots where the travellers alight and in which the voyagers travel while they are travelling and journeying so these stages are arrived at in the journey of the planets through them. What Allah originated in this sphere of the planets whose course passes through these constellations was in order that Allah, through their intersection and journey, Allah might originate what He wishes of the natural and elemental world. He made them waymarks of the effect of the movement of the sphere of constellations, so know that!

(Natures and the four elements)

The nature of one division of these four is hot and dry; the second is cold and dry; the third is hot and wet; and the fourth is cold and wet. He made the fifth and ninth divisions like the first, the sixth and tenth like the second, the seventh and eleventh like the third, and the eighth and twelfth like the fourth in nature. So Allah contained natural bodies by difference, and elemental bodies without difference, in these four which are: hot, cold, dry and wet. Even though they are four matrices, Allah made two of them the basis for the existence of the other two. Heat produces dryness and cold produces wetness. So wetness and dryness exist from the two causes of heat and cold. This was mentioned by Allah when He said, "There is no fresh (wet) or withered (dry), but it is in a Clear Book" (6:59) because the caused, inasmuch as it is caused, must have the existence of a cause, or if it is an effect, then it must have a cause, however you want to put it. The existence of a cause does not necessitate the existence of something caused.

(The Starless Heaven (al-Falak al-Atlas))

When Allah created this first sphere, it revolved with an orbit whose end is only known by Allah because there were no limited bodies above it to intersect it. It was the first of diaphanous bodies. Movements were numbered and made distinct. Allah did not create anything inside of it. Then movements became distinct and ended at the one who is inside of it. If it has not been so, the movements in it would not have been distinct at all because there is no planet in the Starless Sphere, and it resembles itself. So the measure of one movement in it is neither known nor determined. If there had been part of it in it different from the rest of the parts, then without a doubt its movements would have been numbered by it. But Allah knew its measure and its end and its repetition. The day occurred from that movement. There was neither night nor day in that 'day'.

Then the motions of this sphere continued and Allah created 35 angels in addition to the 16 angels we mentioned. So the sum was 411 angels. These angels included Jibril, Mikail, Israfil and 'Azra'il. Then He created 974 angels and added them to the angels already mentioned. He revealed to them and commanded them regarding that they had in His creation. They said, "We do not come down, save at the command of your Lord. To Him belongs all that is before us and all that is behind us, and all between that. And your Lord is never forgetful." (19:64) Allah said of them, "They do not disobey Allah in what He commands them." (66:6) These are among the angels who are the guardians in particular. Allah created the angels who are the inhabitants of the heavens and the earth to worship Him. There is no place in the heaven or the earth that does not have an angel in it. Allah continues to create angels from the breaths of the world as long as they continue to breathe.

(Creation of the Nearest Abode)

When the movements of this sphere, whose duration is 54,000 years of your counting, was complete, Allah created this world and appointed for it a known term at which it will end and its form will come to an end. It will be changed from being an abode for us and accepting a particular form, which is what we see today, to "the earth changing to other than the earth, and the heavens as well." When 63,000 years of your counting were complete of the movements of this sphere, Allah created the Next World: the Garden and the Fire which Allah has prepared for His slaves, both the happy and the wretched. There were 9000 years of your counting between the creation of this world and the creation of the Next World. That is why it is called the "the Next", since its creation was delayed until after the creation of this world which is called the first" because it was created before it. Allah said, "The Next will be better for you than the first." (97:4) He addressed His Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and did not give the Next World a term at which it will cease to be. It has constant going-on.

(The ceiling of the Garden is the Starless Heaven)

Allah made this sphere the ceiling of the Garden. We call it the Throne whose movement is not specific nor distinct. It has a continuous, unending movement. None of creation which we mentioned was created without the second goal of it attaching itself to the existence of man who is the Viceregent in the world. I said "the second goal" since the first goal of creation is to recognise Allah and worship Him since it was this for which the entire universe was created. There is nothing but that it glorifies His praise. The meaning of the second goal and the first is the connection of the will, not the in-timeness of the will, because the will of Allah is an out-of-time pre-temporal attribute by which His essence is described as is the case with all of His attributes.

(The movement of the heavens and the movement of the earth)

Then Allah created these spheres and heavens, and inspired every heaven with its command and ordered their lights and lamps in them and filled them with angels and caused them to move. So they moved out of obedience to Allah, coming to Him, seeking perfection in the slaveness proper to them, because Allah summoned the heaven and the earth and said to them, "Come willingly or unwillingly" by a command defined for them. They said, "We come willingly." So they are constantly coming and continue to move, even though the movement of the earth is hidden from us. It moves around the centre because it turns. As for the heaven, it came willingly when Allah commanded it to come. The earth came willingly when it knew itself to be compelled and that Allah must bring it when He said "or unwillingly". That is what was meant when He said "or unwillingly". It came willingly unwillingly! "He established them as seven heavens in two days, and He inspired each heaven with its command." (41:12)

(The creation of the earth and the determination of its foods)

Allah created the earth and determined its foods in it in respect of its products. He meant it a treasury for their foods. We already mentioned the organisation of the formation of the world in the book, al-'Aql al-Mustawfir. Part of the determination of its foods is the existence of water, air and fire, as well as what it contains of vapours, clouds, lightning, thunder, and celestial effects. "That is the determination of the Mighty, the Knowing." (6:96) He created the jinn from fire and the birds, reptiles of land and sea, and insects from the decay of the earth so that the air would be pure for us, free of the vapours of decay which, if mixed with the air in which Allah entrusted life and well-being for man and animals, would have made him sick, weak and ailing. So Allah purified the atmosphere for him as a kindness on His part when He formed these creatures from decayed things. So there were few illnesses and diseases.

(The creation of man)

And then the Kingdom was settled and prepared and none of these creatures knew from what sort this Viceregent would be for whose existence Allah had prepared this kingdom. When the specified time in His knowledge came to bring this Viceregent into existence 17,000 years after this world had been populated and 8000 years after the Next world, which has no end, was populated, Allah commanded some of the angels to bring Him a handful of every kind of dust of the earth. There is a long tradition about the angels bringing this to him which is well-known among people. Allah took it and kneaded it with His hands. This is His words, "what I created with My hands." (38:75)

Allah entrusted each of the angels which we have mentioned with a trust for Adam. He said, "I am creating a man from clay".(38:71). These trusts which you have belong to him. When I have created him, each of you give him what you have which I have entrusted you with for him. 'When I have fashioned him and breathed My spirit into him, then prostrate yourselves to him.' (15:29)" Then Allah kneaded the clay of Adam with His hands until he altered its smell which had been fetid mud. That is the part which is air in the structure. He made its outward part the place for the wretched and the happy of his progeny. He entrusted in in what was in His hands. Allah tells us that the happy are in His right hand and the wretched are in His left hand. "Both hands of My Lord are blessed right hands." He said, "Those are for the Garden and do the deeds of the people of the Garden. Those are for the Fire and do the deeds of the people of the Fire."

He entrusted the whole in the clay of Adam and joined the opposites in him by the principle of proximity. He formed him on the straight movement, and that is in the domain of Virgo. He made the six directions for him: above, which is beyond his head, below opposite it, which is below his feet, right, which follows his strong side, and left opposite it, which follows his weak side, in front, which is before his face, and behind opposite it, which is behind his neck. He formed, balanced and shaped him. Then He breathed into Him of His spirit which is related to Him. When He breathed into it, the four humours were originated as it spread into all his parts. They are: yellow bile, black bile, blood and phlegm.

Yellow bile is from the element of fire from which Allah formed him when He said, "from a clay like the potters." (55:14) Black bile is from earth which is His words, "He created him from earth." (15:26). Blood is from air, and it is His word, "fetid mud". Phlegm is from water with which earth is kneaded and becomes mud. Then Allah originated in the power of attraction by which the animal attracts food, then the power of grasping by which the animal holds what will nourish it, then the power of digestion by which food is digested, and then the expelling power by which he expels excretions from himself - sweat, vapour, wind, excrement, etc.

As for the spread of the vapours and the division of the blood in the veins from the liver and every part of the animal, that is by the power of attraction, not by the power of expelling. The portion of the power of expelling is only what it expels, as we said, of excreta. Then Allah originated in it the powers of feeding, growing, senses, imagination, illusion, retention and memory. All this is in man inasmuch as he is an animal, not inasmuch as he is man except for these four powers: the powers of imagination, illusion, retention and memory. They are stronger in man than animal.

Then He bestowed on man the faculty of conception, thought and intellect, and so he is distinct from the animal. He put all these powers in the body as tools for the Articulate Self to reach all the benefits of the senses and meanings. "Then He formed it with another creation" (23:14) which is humanity. He made him perceptive by these powers, and he is living, knowing, capable, willing, speaking, hearing, and seeing according to a known limit in his acquisition. "Blessed is Allah, the Best of Creators." (23:14)

Then Allah did not name Himself with any of the names without putting some of the character of that name into man as a portion from Him which is manifest in the world according to what is proper to him. For that reason, some people interpret the words of the Prophet, "Allah created man in His form" to have this meaning. He sent him down as a Viceregent for Him in His earth since the earth is part of the world of change and alteration, as opposed to the Higher World. Judgements occurred among the inhabitants of the earthly world according to the change which occurs in the celestial world. Thus the principle of all the divine names appeared. Thus Adam is the Viceregent in the earth rather than heaven and the Garden. There whatever He commanded was: the knowledge of the Names, the prostration of the angels, and the refusal of Iblis as will be all mentioned in its proper place, Allah willing.

(Human bodies and types)

This chapter is devoted to the beginning of human bodies. They are of four types: the body of Adam, the body of Eve, the body of Jesus and the bodies of the children of Adam. Each of these bodies has a formation different from the formation of the other bodies in causality, in spite of the common physical and spiritual form. We said this, and spoke on it in order that the weak intellect might not imagine that divine power or realities do not great that this human organism be from only one cause whose essence grants this formation. Allah refutes this doubt as this human formation appeared in Adam in a way in which it did not appear in the body of Eve; the body of Eve appeared by a means by which the body of Adam did not appear; and the body of the children of Adam appeared by a means by which the body of Jesus did not appear. Each of these are called men by definition and reality. That is so that it be known that Allah has knowledge of everything and that He has the power to do anything.

Then Allah joined together these four types of creation in an ayat of the Qur'an in the Surat al-Hujurat. (49:13) He said, "O People, We have created you" meaning Adam "from male" meaning Hawwa' "and from female" meaning Jesus, and joined "from male and female" meaning by means of marriage and birth. This ayat is part of "all the words" and "distinction of speech" which was given to Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace.

(The body of Adam and the body of Eve (Hawwa'))

Then the body of Adam appeared as we mentioned, and he had no appetite for marriage. Allah already knew to bring birth, procreation and marriage into existence in this abode. Marriage in this abode is for the continuation of the species. Then He brought out Eve from the smallest rib of Adam. For that reason, woman has a lesser degree than man as Allah said, "men have a degree over them". (2:228) So women never overtake them. Eve had the bentness which is in the ribs so that by that she might incline to her child and husband. The man's inclination (=tenderness) for the woman is his inclination for himself since she is a part of him. The woman inclines to the man since she was created from the rib, and the rib has curvature and inclination.

(...the love of Adam and the love of Eve)

Allah filled the place in Adam from which Eve emerged with appetite for her since there was not be a void in existence. When He filled him with passion, Adam yearned for her as he yearns for himself because she is a part of him. She yearned for him because he is her home in which she was formed. Eve's love is love of the homeland, and Adam's love is love of himself. For that reason, man's love for woman appeared since she is the same as him, and woman was given the faculty designated as modesty in love for men. She is capable of secrecy because the homeland is not joined to her as Adam is joined to her.

Allah fashioned in that rib all that He fashioned and created in the body of Adam. The formation of Adam's body in his form was like what the potter fashions from clay and baking. The formation of the body of Eve was like what the carpenter carves of forms in wood. When he carved her in the rib and set up her form, shaped and balanced it, he breathed into her of His spirit. She stood up as a living, speaking female in order to make her a place for procreation. He feels at home with her and she feels at home with him. She is a "garment for him and he is a garment for her." Allah says, "They are a garment for you and you are a garment for them." (2:187) Appetite diffused through all his parts and he sought her.

(The formation of the third type of body)

Then Adam covered her and cast water into her womb and by that drop of water, the blood of menstruation flowed which Allah had written for women, and in that body was formed a third body different than how the body of Adam and body of Eve had been formed. This is the third body. Allah took charge of the formation in the womb state by state by the change from water to sperm to a bloodclot to a lump of flesh to bone. Then Allah clothed the bones in flesh. When the animal growth was complete, He formed another creature and so breathed the human spirit into it. "Blessed is Allah, the best of creators." (23:14)

Were it not that it would take too long, we would have explained man's formation in the womb state by state, and the guardian angels who are in charge of forming the embryo in the womb until it emerges. But we want to talk about human bodies. Although they are same in definition, reality, sensory and significative form, the reasons for their composition are different lest one imagine that that belongs to the essence of the cause. Exalted is Allah! That refers to the chosen Actor who does what He wishes when He wishes without interdiction or inability in one matter rather than another. "There is no Allah except Him, the Mighty, the Wise." (3:18)

(The formation of the body of Jesus)

Then the naturalists say that the water of woman does not have anything formed from it - even the embryo which is in the womb is from the man's water. Therefore we made the formation of the body of Jesus another formation, even though its regulation in the womb was the same as the regulation of the bodies of sons. The formation of the body of Jesus was from the water of the woman since the Spirit appeared to her as a man without fault, or it was from the breath without water. In any case, the body of Jesus is a fourth body with a different type of formation than the other bodies. Therefore Allah said,

"Truly, the likeness of Jesus" (2:56) i.e. the formation of Jesus, "with Allah is as Adam's likeness. He created him from dust." The pronoun refers to Adam. The likeness refers to his creation without a father, i.e. the quality of his formation is like that of Adam, even though He created Adam from dust. Then Allah said to him, "Be!"

Then Jesus, as was said, did not remain in Mary's womb the length of time that children customarily remain because he formed quicker because Allah wanted to make him a sign for people and use him to refute the naturalists when they judge nature according to what custom accord, not by the secrets and wondrous formations which Allah entrusted in it. Some of the intelligent people establish this matter as nature and said, "We only know of it what You have given us, and it contains things which we do not know."

(Man on the earth is like the intellect in the heaven)

This is why we mentioned the beginning of human bodies and the fact that there are four bodies formed differently as we confirmed and that man is the last of the products. Thus he is like the intellect and is connected to it because existence is a circle. The beginning of the circle is the existence of the First Intellect which has been reported in tradition: "The first thing that Allah created was the Intellect." It is the first of the genera. Creation ends in the human species and so the circle is complete and man is joined to the intellect, as the end of the circle is joined to its beginning. So it is a circle. Between the two ends of the circle is all the genera which Allah created in the world, between the First Intellect, which is the Pen, and man, who is the last existent.

Then lines emerge from the dot which is in the centre of the circle to the circumference which exists from it, and come out equally to each part of the circumference. It is the same with Allah's relationship to all existent things. It is the same relationship. Change does not occur at all. All things look at Him and receive from Him what He gives them as the parts of the circumference look at the dot.

Allah set up this human form by the straight movement as the form of the stick is to the tent. He made him the support of the dome of these heavens. Allah keeps them from descending because of him. So we consider man to be the tent-stick/support. When this human form is annihilated, and none of them remains breathing on the face of the earth, and the heaven is split, on that day it will fall because the support which is man has vanished.

Then habitation will move to the Next Abode since man has moved there. This world will become a ruin because he has left it. So we know absolutely that man is the source meant by Allah for the world and he is truly the Viceregent and he is the site of the manifestation of the Divine names. He brings together all the realities of the world - angel, sphere, spirit, body, nature, inanimate, and animal. This is in respect of what he alone is given of the knowledge of the Divine Names, in spite of the smallness of his size and mass. Allah said of him, "Certainly the creation of the heavens and the earth is greater than the creation of men" [40:57] because man was produced from the heaven and the earth, so they are like his parents. Allah elevated their value because of him, "but most men know it not". (7:187) He did not mean greatness in size, for that is known by the senses.

However, Allah tested man with a test which He did not use on any of His creation, either because He will make him happy or because He will make him wretched according to what He lets him use. The trial by which He tested him is that He created in him a capacity called thought (fikr) and made this capacity serve another faculty called intellect. He made the intellect, even though it is the master of thought, take what thought gives it. He did not give thought any scope except in the faculty of imagination. He made the faculty of imagination a place for gathering what the sensory faculties give it. He also gave it a faculty called conceptualization. So in the faculty of imagination, nothing is acquired except what the senses give it or what the conceptual faculty gives it. The substance of conceptualization comes from sensory things. It puts together forms which did not have a source, even though all its parts existed in the senses.

That is because the intellect was created guileless without any of speculative knowledges. Thought was told, "Distinguish between the true and the false which is in this imaginative faculty. Thought investigates according to what it has. He may obtain doubt and it may obtain proof without it knowing that even though it claims that it knows the forms of doubts from the proofs. It obtains knowledge while it has not regarded the shortcoming of the substance on which it relies in the acquisition of knowledges. The intellect accepts from it and judges by it. So its ignorance can be much greater than its knowledge!

Then Allah commanded this intellect to recognise Him so that it might refer to Him in it, not to something else. The intellect understood the opposite of what the Truly Real wanted from it when He said, "Have they not considered?" (7:184, etc.) "To a people who reflect." (10:24 etc.) It relied on thought and made it an Imam to be followed and neglected what Allah had meant when He mentioned reflection. He told it to reflect so that it would see that there is no way to know Allah except by being given gnosis of Allah. Therefore the matter would be unveiled to it for what it really is. Not every intellect has this understanding - it is only the intellects selected by Allah from His Prophets and saints.

Would that I knew if they had said, "Yes indeed" with their thoughts when Allah made them testify against themselves [to the lordship of Allah before their creation] in the handful of the progeny of the descendants of Adam! His making them testify to that when He took them from their loins is from solicitude. However, when they reverted to taking from their reflective capacities in gnosis of Allah, they did not agree at all on even a single judgement in gnosis of Allah. Each group formed a school, and the statments about the protected divine presence multiplied. These thinkers were as bold as possible towards Allah. All of this is part of the test which we mentioned when Allah created thought in man.

The people of Allah are in need of Him in the belief in Him which He was obliged of them in His gnosis. They know that what is desired of them is that they refer to Him in that, and in every state. Some of them said, "Glory be to One who made no way to recognise Him except the inability to recognise Him!" Some said, "The inability to reach perception is perception." The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "I cannot ennumerate Your praise!" Allah said, "They do not encompass Him in knowledge." (20:110) They refer to Allah in recognition of Him and abandon thought about His rank and fulfil His due. They do not put Him in what should not be thought of Him. It has been reported that it is forbidden to reflect on the Essence of Allah. Allah says, "Allah warns you that you should beware of Him." (3:28,30) Allah gave them the gnosis of Himself that He gave them and made them witness of His creatures and manifestations what He made them witness. So they knew that what is logically impossible by means of thought, is not impossible by divine relation. Some of that will be found in the next chapter on "The Earth created from what was left of the clay of Adam" and elsewhere.

That which the man of intellect is that he is indebted to Allah in himself got knowing that Allah has the power to do anything, possible or impossible - and not everything is impossible. He has effective power and vast of gifts. There is no repetition of His bringing into existence - rather similar things occur in a substance which He brought into existence and wishes to continue. If he had so willed, it would have been annihilated with the breaths. "There is no Allah but Him, the Mighty, the Wise." (3:18)

CHAPTER NINE

The Existence of Spirits Created from Smokeless Fire (jinn)

He mixed fire and plants, so the form of the jinn was set up as an interspace between two things

It is between a bodily spirit with a place in depth and a spirit without "where".

That which accepts embodiment seeks for food for nourishment without falsehood,

And that which accepts the angels, accepts the heart in taking shape in the source.

For this reason, it obeys one moment and rebels the next.
He will repay those of them who disobey with two fires.

(Creation of the Jinn, angels and man)

Allah says, "He created jinn from a fusion of smokeless fire." (55:14) It is reported in sound hadith [saying of the Prophet], "Allah created the angels from light and Allah created the jinn from fire and He created man from what you were told." As for what the Prophet said about the creation of man "from what you were told", he was concise and did not specify it as he did in the case of the creation of the angels and the jinn. The Prophet "was given all the words". This is part of them. The basic creation of angels and jinn did not vary. The creation of man is varied as there are four categories of man's creation. The creation of Adam does not resemble the creation of Eve. The creation of Eve does not resemble the creation of the rest of the children of Adam. The creation of Jesus does not resemble the creation of the others. Here the Messenger of Allah was concise. He has transmitted to us the details of the creation of man. Adam was created from clay, Eve from a rib, 'Isa is from the blowing of a spirit, and the children of Adam from "a contemptible water". (77:20)

(The conceptual cohesion of heaven and earth)

When Allah set up the four basic elements and smoke rose to the bottom of the Sphere of Fixed Stars, the seven heavens unwound themselves in that smoke, each separate from each other. He "revealed, in every heaven, its ordinance" after "He established in it its nourishment" and all that was "in four days". Then he said "to the heavens and the earth: Come willingly or unwillingly." (41:9-11) i.e. they answer when they are called to produce what He wants them to produce. They said, "we come willingly."

Then Allah established a conceptual cohesion between heaven and earth and a direction by which He desires to bring into existence products in this earth in the form of minerals, plants and animals. He made the earth like the wife and the heaven like the husband. The heaven casts to earth the command of Allah in it as a man casts water into a woman in intercourse. In that casting, the earth brings forth the types of formations which Allah has hidden in its.

(The four elements and the formation of man and jinn)

When air is ignited and heated, it burns like the lamp. The burning of that fire is the flame which is the burning of the air and this is smokeless (marj, jumbled) because it is mixed with the air and is the burning air. Marj is mixture and from this the smokeless is marj since the plants are mixed in it.

The jinn are composed of the two elements of fire and air, as man is composed of the two elements of water and earth kneaded together which produced the name mud. Similarly the mixture of air and fire has the name 'smokeless fire'. Allah created the form of jinn in that smokeless fire. Because of the air which is in the jinn, they can assume whatever form they wish. Because of the fire which is in them, they are insubstantial and very subtle, and they seek dominance, pride and might since fire has the highest position of the elements and it has great power to change things as nature demands. That is reason why he [the jinn Iblis] was too proud to prostrate to Adam when Allah commanded him to do so, because of his own estimation of himself. He said, "I am better than Him" (7:12), i.e. meaning according to the basis by which Allah preferred fire among the four elements.

The jinn did not know that the power of water from which Adam was created was stronger than fire for it extinguishes it and earth is firmer than fire by cold and dryness. Adam has strength and constancy by the dominance of the two elements from which Allah derived him. Even though he also possesses the rest of the elements - air and fire, they do not have the authority in him. The jinn also have the rest of the elements...

Adam was given humility on account of the clayness of his nature. When he is proud, that is incidental (and not intrinsic to his nature). He accepts that because of the element of fire in him as his imagination and states accept different forms because of the element of air in him. The jinn are given pride by the nature of fire in them. If they are humble, that is something incidental which they accept because of the element of earth in them. They also accept fixation in enticement if they are devils and fixation in acts of obedience if they are not devils.

(The jinn when Surat ar-Rahman (Chapter 55 of the Qur'an) was recited

When the Prophet recited Surat ar-Rahman to his Companions, he said, "I was reciting it for the jinn. They listened to it better than you. When I said, 'So which of your Lord's blessings will you deny?'" they stated, 'We do not deny any of the blessings of our Lord'. They affirmed them and did not quake when they were told, "So which of your Lord's blessings will you deny?" in his recitation. That is by is in the nature of the jinn of earth and of water which remove the fieriness of fire. Some of them are obedient to Allah and some are rebellious, like us; but they can take on forms as can the angels.

(Their basic form is spiritual)

Allah has made them invisible to us so we do not see them except when Allah wishes to lift the veil for certain individuals who then see them. Since the jinn are insubstantial and subtle, they can take form in whatever sensory form they wish. Their basic form is the spiritual one which was the first form the first jinn accepted when Allah brought him into existence. Then he took on various forms according to what Allah willed. If Allah had opened our eyes so that we could see what the forms conceived by the conceptual faculty through the imagination (khayal), then at different times you would have seen man in various forms which are unlike one another.

(Procreation in jinn and men)

Then Allah breathed the spirit into the flame which was full of turbulence because of its insubstantiality. The blowing increased the turbulence and air dominated it and it did not remain in the same condition. The world of the jinn appeared in that form. As intercourse occurred in mankind by the casting of water in the womb and progeny and birth occurs in this mortal Adamic species, so procreation occurs in the jinn by casting air into the womb of their female, and progeny and birth occurs in the jinn. They exist by Sagittarius and it is fiery. That was mentioned by the one who arrived - may Allah preserve him!

(The years between the creation of jinn and men)

There were 60,000 years between the creation of Jann (the first jinn) and the creation of Adam. This is necessary according to the claim of some people that birth will cease among the jinn after 4000 years and that birth will end with man after 7000 years. However, things do not occur on that basis. Things will occur according to what Allah wills. The jinn still procreate and we still procreate. So when did man begin, how many years of progeny does he have left and how much time remains until the end of this world and the annihilation of mankind on the face of the earth and their transfer to the Next World? This is not the stance taken by those who are firmly rooted in knowledge. It is stated by a small group of people and will not be repeated.

(The Jinn are an interspace between angels and men)

The angels are spirits breathed into lights. The jinn are spirits breathed into winds. Men are spirits breathed into shapes. It is said that a female was not separated from the first existing jinn as Eve was separated from Adam. One of them said Allah created a vulva in the first existent jinn, so part of him mated with the other part and offspring like those of Adam were born to him: a male and female who married each other. So the jinn's nature was hermaphrodite. For that reason the jinn are part of the world of the interspace: they resemble men and resemble angels as the hermaphrodite resembles both the male and female.

(The food and marriage of the jinn)

The elements of air and fire dominate the jinn. For that reason, their food is what the air carried by of fat in bones. Allah made their provision in them. So we see that the bone and its flesh is not decreased at all and we know that Allah gave them their sustenance in the bones. This is why the Prophet said about bones, "They are sustenance for your brothers among the jinn." In a hadith, "Allah appoints their sustenance in them." Someone to whom this was unveiled reported to us that he saw the jinn come to some bones and sniff them like beasts of prey sniff. Then they went back having taken their sustenance. Their food was taken in that sniffing. Glory be to the Subtle, the All-Aware!

As their union with each other in marriage, it is in the form of twisting - like what you see of smoke issuing from a kiln or a pottery oven. The smoke intermingles and each of the two individuals enjoys that mutual entry. Their ejaculation resembles like the seed of the palm and is in the form of pure scent, just as is the case with their food.

(The tribes and clans of the jinn)

They have tribes and clans. It is said that they are contained in twelve tribes and then they branch into subtribes. There are great wars between them, and some whirlwinds are, in fact, the centre of their battles. The whirlwind is the mutual opposition of two opposing winds, each preventing its companion from passing through. So that barrier leads to the circle witnessed visually in the physical dust which is the effect of the mutual opposition of the two winds. Their battles are like that, but not every whirlwind is on of their battles. The story of 'Amr the jinn is famous. He was killed in a whirlwind which was seen. It dispersed from him while he was dying. It did not take long for him to die. He was a pious jinn. If the basis of this book had been to present traditions and tales, we would have mentioned some of them, but this is a book about the science of meanings. You can look for their stories elsewhere in book of history and poems.

(The manner in which the spiritual world appears in forms)

When this spiritual world takes on shape and appears in a sensory form, the eyes confine it since it cannot abandon that form as long as the eye continues to look at it although that it is the human being which is looking. When human eye defines it and continues to look at it, the spiritual (ruhani) being does not have a place into which it can disappear, so this spiritual being manifests a form which it puts on itself like a veil. Then the spiritual being makes the person imagine that that form has left him in a particular direction, so his eye follows it. When his eye follows it, the spiritual being leaves its confinement and vanishes. When it disappears, that form vanishes from the sight of the one who is looking at it and following it with his eye. In relation to the spiritual being, that form is like light is in the case of a lamp whose light is diffused in the corners. When the body of the lamp is absent, the light is lost. It is thus with this form. If someone knows this and wants to confine that spiritual being, he should not follow the form with his eye. This is one of the divine secrets which are only known by the instruction of Allah. The form is not other than spiritual being. Indeed it is the same, even if it is in a thousand places, or in every place, with different shapes.

If it happens that one of those forms is slain and apparently dies, that spiritual being moves from the life of this world to the interspace just as we move when we die. No information about it remains in this world, just as is the case with us. Those sensory forms in which the spiritual beings appear are called 'bodies'. It is the words of Allah, "We cast a mere body on his throne" (38:34) and "We did not give them bodies which did not eat food." (21:8) The difference between jinn and angels, even though they share in spirituality, is that the food of the jinn consists of foods found in natural bodies. The angels are not like that. That is why Allah mentioned in the story of the guests of Abraham, "When he saw that their hands were not reaching for it, he was suspicious of them" (11:70) i.e. the angels did not reach for the roasted calf and they did not eat it which made him afraid.

(The formation of the world of the jinn)

When the time for the formation of the world of the jinn came, He directed three of the trusty angels in the first sphere who took their deputies which they needed for this formation from the second heaven. Then they descended to the heavens and took two deputies from the second and the sixth there. They descended to the elements and prepared the place. Three other guardians followed them, and they took whatever deputies they needed from the second heaven, and then descended to the third heaven, and to the fifth from there. They took two angels. They passed by the sixth heaven and took another deputy from the angels. Then they descended to the elements in order to complete the formation. The remaining six descended and took the remaining deputies in the second heaven and the heavens. All were gathered for the ordering of this formation by the permission of the All-Knowing, the All-Wise.

When the formation of the world of the jinn was complete, Allah directed the spirit from the World of Command and breathed a spirit into that form by which life flowed into it. It stood uttering the praise and glorification of the One Who brought it into existence: this is the natural disposition on which He fashioned it. Within it there was might and immensity whose cause is not recognised nor discovered since at that time there was no another creature in existence in the world of nature other than it. It remained worshipping its Lord, proclaiming His power, humble to the lordship of the One who brought it into existence by what was in its being until Adam was created. When the jinn saw his form, one of them, whose name was Harith, was overcome with hatred for that organism and he glowered at the sight of the form of Adam. The rest of his species saw that and they censured him for that since they saw that he had grief and sorrow because of it. When Adam's business was complete, al-Harith displayed what he felt in himself and refused to obey the command of his Creator to prostrate to Adam and became arrogant towards Adam because of his own constitution and he boasted of his origin [from fire which he said was better than earth]. He failed to see the secret of the power of that water from which Allah created every living thing, and from which comes the life of the jinn although they are not aware of it.

If you are among the people of unveiling, reflect on the words of Allah, "and His throne was upon the waters." (11:7) So the throne and the creatures around it were brought to life by water. "There is nothing which does not glorify His praise." (17:44) He used the negative. Only the living glorifies. In an excellent hadith from the Messenger of Allah said, "The angels said, 'O Lord (in a long hadith)! have You created anything stronger than fire?' He replied, 'Yes, water.'" So He made water stronger than fire. If the element of air in the structure of the jinn had not been ignited by fire, the jinn would have been stronger than the children of Adam, for air is stronger than water. In this hadith, the angels asked, "O Lord, have You created anything stronger than air?" He replied, "Yes, the children of Adam." Allah made the human organism stronger than air. Water is stronger than fire, and it is the main element in man as fire is the main element in the jinn. This why Allah said about Shaytan (Satan), "Surely the guile of Shaytan is ever feeble." (4:76) He did not ascribe any strength to him at all. He did not deny it to the Governor (of Egypt) when he said, "surely your guile is great" (12:27) ...

The reason for that is that the human organism accords deliberateness in matters, perseverance, meditation and reflection due to the predominance of the elements of earth and water in the human temperament. Thus the human being has ample intellect because earth holds him back and restrains him while water makes him supple and easy. The jinn are not like that. The jinn's intellect does not possess that which will enable him to hold to something as the human being does. This is why we say, "So-and-so is 'light' of intellect and dim-witted" when he is frivolous and foolish! This is the attribute of the jinn, and by it the jinn strays from the path of guidance due to the frivolous nature of his intellect and his lack of firmness in his thought. So he said, "I am better than him," (7:12) and combined ignorance and bad manners because of his frivolous nature.

So any jinn who rebels is shaytan, i.e. one who is far from the mercy of Allah. Al-Harith was the first jinn to be called shaytan. Allah drove him to despair, i.e. drove him out of His mercy and repelled mercy from him. From him all the shaytans branch out. Any jinn who believe, like Hama ibn Alham ibn Laqis ibn Iblis, join the believing jinn. Any who remains an unbeliever is a shaytan. It is a matter of some dispute among the scholars of the Shari'a). Some of them say that the shaytan never submits, deriving this from what the Prophet said about his shaytan who was the companion entrusted to him, "Allah gave me power over him and he submitted (aslama)."

The one who interprets what he said as "aslamu" takes it to mean: "I am safe from him" and he has no way against me. Thus the interpretation varies. If it is interpreted as "aslama" is it submission. It means that he submitted although he was an enemy and so he only commands me to good, compelled to do so by Allah and as a protection for the Messenger of Allah. The opponent says that "aslama" means that he believed in Allah as the unbeliever becomes Muslim and thus becomes a believer. This is more appropriate and acceptable.

(Iblis was the first of the wretched jinn)

Most people claim that al-Harith was the first of the jinn, and that he was in the same position to the rest of the jinn as Adam is to mankind. We do not think that that is the case. Al-Harith was one of the jinn, but the first among them who is in the same position as Adam is to mankind was someone else. That is why Allah says, "Iblis was one of the jinn" (18:50) i.e. he was from this category of creation. Similarly Qabil (Cain) was one of mankind, but Allah wrote him down among the wretched. He was the first of the wretched among mankind, and Iblis was the first of the wretched among the jinn. The majority of the punishment of the shaytans of the jinn in Hellfire is by severe cold, not by heat, although they may be punished with fire. Most of the punishment of the descendants of Adam is through fire.

One day I came upon one of the saints whose intellect was deranged. He was weeping and saying to the people, "Do not stop with His words, 'I shall assuredly fill Hellfire with you' (38:85) and apply them to Iblis alone. Look how He alluded to you when He said, '...Hellfire with you'. Iblis was created from fire, so he returns to his source - may Allah curse him! If Iblis is punished with it, the punishment of pottery by fire is greater, so take heed!"

When Hellfire (Jahannam) was mentioned, this saint only thought of fire in particular, and was heedless of the fact that Jahannam is a name for both its intense heat and its intense cold. It is called Jahannam by its frowning (jahama. Jahuma means "to have an ugly face") because its appearance is hateful. Jaham is the word for clouds which have already poured out their water. Abundant rain is the mercy of Allah. When Allah has removed the rain from the clouds, then the name jaham is applied to them. since the mercy, which was abundant rain, has vanished. Similarly, Allah has removed mercy from Jahannam which is hateful in appearance and report. It is also called Jahannam because of its great depth. One says, "the depths of Jahannam" when something is very deep. We ask Allah Almighty, to give us and the believers security from it!

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Concerning the Bearers of the Throne

By Allah, the Throne bears the Merciful, and they bear it - this statement is intelligible.

What power is there for a creature and what strength, if it had not been for that which the intellect and Revelation brought?

Body and spirit and nutrients and rank.
There is nothing else which division arranges.

That is the Throne, if you but realise its eminence!
The One who settles on it in the name of the Merciful is hoped-for.

They are eight, and Allah knows them. Today there are four, and there is no fault in them:

Muhammad, then Ridwan and Malik, Adam and the Friend (Ibrahim) and then Jibril,

Joined by Mika'il and Israfil. There are only eight here - nourished by "there is no god but Allah".

(The Throne ('Arsh) in Arabic)

May Allah support the wali! Know that in Arabic 'the Throne' is a designation by which the kingdom is meant. It is said, "The king's throne is toppled," when there is a disturbance in his kingdom. Throne also designates and means the seat. When the Throne designates the kingdom, its bearers are its supporters. When the Throne is the seat, its bearers are the legs which support it, or whoever carries it on their sacks. Number enters into the bearers of the Throne. The Messenger said that they are four in this world, and eight on the Day of Rising. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, recited, "Upon that day eight shall carry above them the Throne of your Lord," (69:17) and then he said, "Today they are four," meaning in this world. Allah said, "Upon that day they shall be eight," meaning in the Next World.

(The Throne is contained in body, spirit, nourishment and rank)

and unveiling, "The carried Throne is the kingdom. It is contained in body, spirit, nourishment and rank." Adam and Israfil belong to forms; Jibril and Muhammad to spirits; Mika'il and Ibrahim to provisions; and Malik and Ridwan to the Promise and the Threat. There is only in the kingdom what was mentioned. Nourishment, which is provision, is both sensory and spiritual. That which we will mention in this chapter is the one method, which has the meaning of kingdom, through which benefit is connected. "Its bearers" designates those who undertake its management. One manager is an elemental form or a luminous form; one manager is a spirit; one manager belongs to an elemental form; one manager is a spirit and one managed and compelled by a luminous form. Nourishment belongs to an elemental form and the nourishment of knowledges and gnoses of spirits. There is a sensory rank of happiness achieved by entering the Garden and a sensory rank of wretchedness achieved by entering Hellfire (Jahannam) and a spiritual rank of knowledge.

This chapter is based on four issues. The first question is form; the second is the spirit; the third is nourishment; and the fourth is the rank, which is the end. Each of these questions has two divisions, so there are eight. They are the bearers of the Throne, i.e. when the eight appeared, the kingdom was established and appeared, and its King sat on it.

(Luminous bodies and Archangels)

The first question concerns form and it has two divisions: an elemental bodily form which contains the imaginative bodily form, and the other division which is a luminous physical body. We will begin with the luminous body. The first bodies which Allah created were the bodies of the angelic spirits wandering with love in the majesty of Allah. They include the First Intellect and the Universal Self, and the luminous bodies created from the light of majesty end there. None of these angels exist by any other means than the Self which is below the Intellect. Every angel created after these angels is subject to the jurisdiction of nature. They are from the genus of the spheres from which they were created and which they inhabit. It is the same with the angels of the elements. The last rank of angels are the angels created from the deeds and breaths of the worshippers. We will mention them class by class in this chapter, Allah willing.

Know that Allah was before He created creation when there was no beforeness in time. That is an expression of connection which indicates a relationship by which the goal is obtained in the listener. Allah was in the Mist ('ama') below and above which there is no air. It was the first Divine manifestation to appear in which the light of the Essence flowed, as is clear in His words, "Allah is the light of the heavens and the earth." (24:35) When that Mist was coloured by light, He opened in it the forms of the angels bewildered with love who are above the world of natural bodies. No throne or creature preceded them. When He brought them into existence, He gave them a manifestation. That manifestation became unseen for them, and that unseen was a spirit for them, i.e. for those forms. He gave them a manifestation in His name, the Beautiful, so they wandered distraught with love in the majesty of His beauty, and they do not recover from it.

(The First Intellect is the Axis of the World of Registration and Recording)

When Allah wanted to create the world of recording and writing, He specified one of those Karubiyin angels. He was the first angel of that light called the Intellect and the Pen. He was given a presencing (tajalli) in the place where given (wahabi) knowledge is manifested according to the bringing-into-existence He desired for His creation, not for an end and a limit. By its essence, the Intellect accepted what will be and the Divine Names which desire the issuance of this created world. From this Intellect was derived another existent thing called the Tablet. He commanded the Pen to descend to it and entrust in it only all that will be until the Day of Rising. He gave this Pen 360 years of penness, i.e. being a Pen. From its being Intellect, Allah gave this Pen 360 presencings (tajalliyat) or raqa'iq (filaments). Every year or filament extracts 360 varieties of comprehensive knowledges, and the Pen details them in the Tablet. This encompasses the knowledges in the universe until the Day of Rising. The Tablet knows them when the Pen entrusts them to it. That is part of the knowledge of nature, and it is the first knowledge which this Tablet acquires of the knowledges of what Allah has willed for His creation. That is nature rather than the self. All of that is in the world of pure light.

(The Throne and its angelic inhabitants)

Then Allah brought into existence the pure darkness which is opposite this light, which is in the position of absolute non-existence opposite absolute existence. When He brought it into existence, that light flowed onto it with an essential outflowing with the help of nature. So that light repaired its disarray and the body appeared which is designated as the Throne. Then the name the Rahman settled on it by the name, the Outwardly Manifest. That was the first of the world of creation to appear. From that mixed light, which is like the light of dawn, He created the angels which encircle the Seat. That is His words, "You will see the angels encircling the Throne proclaiming the praise of their Lord." (39:75) They have no other occupation than to encircle the Throne, proclaiming His praise. We explained the creation of the universe in our book, 'Uqla al-Mustawfiz. We have used the principles for this chapter.

(The Footstool (Kursi) and the angels who inhabit it)

Then He brought the Footstool into existence inside this Throne and put angels of its own nature in it. Each sphere was the basis for its inhabitants which were created in it just like the elements from which its inhabitants were created. So Adam was created from earth and he and his sons filled the earth. In this noble Footstool the Word was divided into report and judgement: these are the two feet which descend from the Throne as reported in the report of the Prophet. Then inside the Footstool Allah created spheres, one inside the other. In each sphere He created a world from it which they inhabit which He named angels, i.e. messengers. He adorned the spheres with stars, and inspired every heaven with its command until He created the forms of products (muwalladat).

(The spirits and luminous forms, imaginative forms and elemental forms)

When Allah completed these luminous and elemental forms which were without spirits which were unseen by these forms, He gave a manifestation to every class of these forms according to what they are based in. The spirits of forms took on being from the forms and from the presencing (tajalli). This is the second question. Allah created the spirits and commanded them to manage the forms and He made them indivisible, a single essence but made them distinct from one another. They are distinct according to the forms they accept from that presencing. The forms do not belong to these spirits in reality according to "wherenesses". These forms belong to the spirits as the kingdom in respect of the elemental forms, and like places of manifestation in respect of all forms.

Then Allah originated the imaginative physical forms by another presencing between the lata'if (subtleties) and forms, and luminous and fiery forms appeared to the eye in those physical bodies. The sensory forms manifested carry forms of meaning in these physical forms in sleep, after death and before the resurrection - it is the interspace of form. It is a horn of light whose top is wide and bottom is narrow. Its highest part is the Mist and the lowest is the earth. These bodies of form in which the jinn and angels and inward part of man appear are outward in sleep and the forms of the Market of the Garden. It is this form which populates the earth of the imagination which we already spoke about in this proper chapter.

(The nourishment of the spirits and the nourishment of forms)

Then Allah appointed nourishment for these forms and these spirits. They are the subject of the third question. They subsist by that nourishment. It consists of sensory nourishment and nourishment of meaning. The nourishment of meaning is the nourishment of knowledges, presencings (tajalliyat) and states (ahwal). Sensory nourishment is well known. It is what the forms of food and drink bear of spiritual meanings, i.e. faculties. Each form, be it luminous, animal or physical, is nourished by what is suitable for it. It would take too long to give the details of that.

(Ranks of the world in happiness and wretchedness)

Then Allah gave every world a rank in happiness and wretchedness and a station; and the details are innumerable. Its happiness is according to it: some of it is happiness of desire, happiness of perfection, happiness of being filled, and happiness of place, i.e. the Shari'a. Wretchedness is like that in division in what is not in accordance with desire, perfection, temperament (which is not being filled), and is not the Shari'a. All of that is sensory and intelligible. The sensory part of it is what is connected to the Abode of wretchedness, of pains in this world and the Next, and connected to the Abode of happiness of pleasures in this world and the Next. Some is pure and some mixed. The pure is connected to the Next Abode. The mixed is connected to this Abode. So the happy might appear in the form of the wretched and the wretched in the form of the happy while they will be distinct in the Next Abode. It may be that the wretched manifests his wretchedness in this world and it is connected to the wretchedness of the Next world. This is also the case with the happy. However, they are not known in this world, but they are distinct in the Next World: "Now keep yourselves apart, you wrongdoers, on this day!" (39:59) So there the ranks are connected to their people with a connection which is not broken nor changed.

(The bearers of the Throne is in this world and the Next)

So the meaning of the eight, which is the sum of the Kingdom designated by the Throne, has been made clear to you. This is the fourth question. The meaning of the eight is clear to you. These eight belong to the eight Divine ascriptions by which Allah is described. They are: life, knowledge, power, will, speech, hearing, sight, and the perfection of the tasted, smelt and felt with the attribute connected to him. This perception of them has a connection, like hearing perceiving heard things and sight perceiving seen things. Thus the Kingdom is contained in eight. Four of them are manifest in this world: form, food, and the two ranks. On the Day of Rising, all of the eight will be visible to the eyes. It is what Allah said, "Upon that day eight shall carry above them the Throne of Your Lord." (69:17) The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Today they are four." This is in the explanation of the Throne as the Kingdom.

As for the Throne, which is the seat, it belongs to Allah and the angels bear it on their backs. Today they are four, and tomorrow they will be eight in respect to bearing in the land of gathering. It is related of the forms of those four bearers what approximates what Ibn Masarra said. It is said that one has the form of man, one of a lion, one of an eagle and the fourth of a bull. It was what the Samiri saw and imagined that it was the god of Musa. So he built the calf for his people and said, "This is your god and the god of Musa" (20:88) in the tale. Allah speaks the truth and guides to the Path.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

On the reason for the increase and decrease of knowledges and the words of Allah, "Say: 'Lord, increase me in knowledge!' and the words of the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, "Allah does not restrict knowledge, plucking from the breasts of the scholars, but He removes it by removing the scholars."

The tajalli of the existence of the Truly Real in the sphere of the self is evidence of decrease in knowledges.

If one is unconscious of that tajalli by his self, can he then perceive Him through investigation and inquiry?

If multiplicity of knowledge appears in the self, realised veiling is confirmed by the text.

Nothing except the disk of the sun of existence appeared and its light fell on the world of spirits.

The Source is only perceived when there is manifestation, even if man is destroyed by the intensity of greed.

There is no doubt in the statement which I unfolded;
and it is not misrepresenting lie or conjecture.

(Knowledges: its ranks and stages)

Know that every living thing and everyone described by perception, is in a new knowledge in every breath in respect to that perception. However, it may be that the perceiving individual is not one of those who is mindful of that knowledge. In fact, it is knowledge, so knowledges can be described as being in decrease in respect of the one with knowledge. It results from the fact that there would be perception had not a barrier intervened between him and many things which he perceives, as is the case with someone who happens to be blind or deaf or the like.

Therefore knowledges rise and descend according to what is known. That is why when aspirations (himma) are connected to sublime noble knowledges by which man is described, his nafs (self) is purified and his rank exalted. The highest rank in knowledge is knowledge of Allah. The highest of the paths to the knowledge of Allah is the knowledge of tajalliyat. Below it is the knowledge of intellectual examination (nadhar). There is no divine knowledge below examination. There are creeds for the general people, not knowledges.

These knowledges are those in which Allah commanded His Prophet to seek increase. Allah said, "and do not rush ahead with the Qur'an before its revelation to you is complete and say, 'O Lord, increase me in knowledge!'" (20:114) i.e. increase me with Your words that You want me to know. Here increase in knowledge is knowledge of the nobility of slowness in the revelation, out of adab with the teacher who brings it to him from his Lord. For this reason, He put this verse after His word, "and faces will be humbled unto the Living, the All-Sustaining," (20:111) i.e. humbled. He meant the knowledges of tajalli. Tajalli is the noblest path for obtaining knowledges - they are the knowledges of immediate tasting.

(Knowledge: its increase and decrease)

We will mention increase and increase of knowledge in another chapter, Allah willing. That is that Allah gave everything - and the self (nafs) of man is one of these things - an outward and inward. The self of man outwardly perceives matters by the eye, and inwardly perceives matters by knowledge. Allah is the Outward, the Inward. It is by Him that perception occurs. It is not in the power of whatever is other than Allah to perceive anything by itself. He perceives by what Allah puts in him and the tajalli of Allah. Whoever has a tajalli from any world, be it the Visible or Unseen world, is from the Name, the Outward. As for the name, the Inward, part of the reality of this relationship is that there is no tajalli ever in it, not in this world or the Next since tajalli designates Allah's manifestation to the one who receives that manifestation. That belongs to the name, the Outward. The intelligibility of relationships does not change, even if they do not have any source by which they exist. However, they do have logical existence, so they are intelligible.

When Allah grants a tajalli, either as a free gift or as answer to a request, he gives the tajalli to the outward of the self, and perception by the senses occurs in the form and that takes place the interspace of making likenesses. So the one who receives the manifestation has an increased knowledge of judgements if he is one of the scholars of the Shari'a, increased knowledge of the criteria of meanings if he is a dialectician, and increased knowledge of the measure of speech if he is a grammarian. It is the for with the master of each of the knowledges of beings and non-beings. He has increase in himself in the knowledge with which he is occupied.

The people of this path know that this increase is comes from the Divine tajalli to those classes, so they cannot deny what has been unveiled to them. Non-agnostics sense increase and ascribe that to their thoughts. Others than these two experience increase but do not know that they are being increased in anything. In likeness "their likeness is that of a donkey loaded with weighty tomes. How evil is the likeness of those who deny Allah's Signs!" (62:5). The signs are this increase and the source of the increase. Astonishment is expressed about those who ascribe that to their own thoughts! They do not know that their thought, reflection and investigation in any question is part of the increase of knowledges in themselves which comes from that tajalli which we mentioned. The thinker is preoccupied with the connection of his thought and the end of his quest. He is veiled to knowledge of the true state. His knowledge is increasing, but he is not aware of it.

When tajalli occurs, it is by the name the Outward to the inward part of the self. Perception occurs the insight into the world of realities and meanings divested of physical matter. These are designated as "texts" since Divine texts do not have any ambiguity or probability by a certain aspect. That only takes place in the meanings. So the one with meanings has rest from the labour of thought, and in the tajalli he is increased in divine knowledges, the knowledges of the secrets and knowledges of the inward, and what is connected to the Next World. This is particular to the people of our Path - it is the path of our knowledge.

Knowledge decreases for two reasons, either by evil nature in the basis of the organism or an incidental imperfection in the faculty connected to that. This evil nature in the basis of the organism cannot be mended, as al-Khidr said about the boy, "his nature was an unbeliever." (18:80) This is in the basis of the organism. As for the incidental imperfection, it can vanish - if it is in the faculty - by medicine. If it is in the self, as when love of leadership and following appetites distract him from acquiring knowledges which contain his honour and happiness, this can also be removed when the Truth calls from his heart and he returns to sound reflection, and he knows that this world is one of the stages of the traveller and a bridge to be crossed, and that if man does not furnish himself with knowledges, noble character and the attributes of the Higher Assembly here in the form of purification and freedom from natural appetites which distract him from sound reflection, he will have no way to achieve eternal happiness. Therefore he sets out on that. This imperfection is also a reason for the decrease of knowledges.

I do not mean that when s decrease it is a fault in man - except in the case of Divine knowledges. The reality accords that there is no decrease at all and that man is always and constantly in increase of knowledge and in respect to what his senses give him, the fluctuations of states and passing thoughts in himself. He his knowledge is increasing, but there is no benefit in it. Opinion, doubt, speculation, ignorance, heedlessness and forgetfulness: all of this and things like them are not accompanied by knowledge of what you are in in respect of opinion, doubt, speculation, ignorance, heedlessness or forgetfulness.

(The knowledges of tajalli: their increase and decrease)

As for decrease and increase in the knowledges of tajalli, man is in either one of two states: how the Prophets bring them forth by transmission, or the awliya' by the principle of being the heirs of the Prophets. This is like what was said to Abu Yazid al-Bistami when the robe of of delegation was placed on him, "Go out to My creation by My attribute. Whoever sees you has seen Me!" He could do nothing but obey his Lord's command. He took a step towards himself from his Lord and swooned. There was a cry, "Return My lover to Me! He cannot endure being apart form Me!" He was absorbed in the Real, like Abu 'Iqal al-Maghribi, so the spirits entrusted with him and who supported him when he was commanded to go out returned him to the station of absorption (istihlak) in Him. He was returned to Allah and the robes of humility, poverty, and abasement were placed on him. Life was pleasing and he saw his Lord and was increased in intimacy and had rest from the "lent trust (amana)" (33:72) which had to be taken from him.

(The Ascent of Man on the Ladder of Gnosis)

From the moment man starts up the ladder of ascent, he has a divine tajalli according to the ladder of his ascent. Each person among the people of Allah has a ladder particular to him by which no one else ascends. If someone could ascend by the ladder of someone else, then prophethood would be acquirable. By its essence, every ladder gives a rank particular to the one who ascends in it. If it would otherwise, the scholars would climb the ladder of the Prophets and obtain prophethood by doing so. The business is not like that. 'Divine capacity' would vanish if the matter would be repeated. In our view, it is confirmed that there is no repetition in that presence.

However, all the steps of the meanings - for Prophets, awliya', believers, and messengers - are the same. One ladder does not have more steps than another ladder. The first step is Islam. It is submission. The last step is in annihilation in the ascent and going-on in the going-out. What remains is between the two of them. It is belief (iman), ihsan (excellence), knowledge, pure oneness (taqdis), disconnection (tanzih), wealth, poverty, abasement, might, change (talwin), establishment in change, annihilation if you go out and going-on if you enter. Every step in which you leave it decreases the knowledges of tajalli in your inward commensurate with what is increased in your outward until you reach the last step.

If you go out and reach the last step, then He is manifested by His essence in your outward in accordance with your worth and you manifest Him in His creation. In your inward there is nothing left at all and the tajalliyat of the inward leave you totally. When you are called to enter, this call is the first step to be manifested to you by tajalli in your inward according to what is decreased of that tajalli in your outward, until you reach the last step. Then He is manifested to your inward by His essence and no tajalli at all remains in your outward. The reason for that is that the slave and the Lord continue to be together, each one with perfect existence for himself: the slave is still the slave and the Lord is still the Lord, in spite of this increase and decrease.

This is the reason for the increase and decrease of the knowledges of tajalliyat in the outward and the inward. The reason for that is constitution. This is why all that Allah created and brought into existence in its source is composite - it has an outward and an inward. That which we refer to as the simple elements (basa'it) are intelligible matters which have no existence in their sources. Every existent thing, other than Allah, is composite. We learned this by sound unveiling with no doubt in it. It obliges a corresponding need of Him, since it is an essential description of Him.

If you understand, we have clarified the way for you and set up the ascent for you. So travel! And rise! You will see and witness what we have made clear to you. We have specified the steps of the ascent for you which we retained for you in the good advice when the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace commanded us to give [in sound hadith]. If we had described the fruits and results to you without specifying the path to it for you, we would have made you yearn for an immense business which you would not know how to reach. By the One who has my self in His hand, it is the Ascent (Mi'raj). "Allah speaks the truth and guides to the Path."

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE

Concerning existent time and determined time

When you ascertain that the substance of time is determined and known by illusions,

Like nature in effecting its power.
The source in nature and time is are non-existent.

Things are specified by it, but it does not have a source by which it is judged.

The intellect cannot perceive its form.
For that reason, we say that time is illusory.

If it had not been for disconnection, the existence of Allah would not be designated by it. So He has exaltation in the heart.

When you are fair about the root of time from before-time its judgement is of pre-time, and it is governed

Like emptiness whose extension does not have an end in other than body by the illusion of embodiment in it.

(The firstness of the Real and His existence and the firstness of the universe and its existence)

Know, first of all, that Allah is the First and there is nothing else has firstness before Him, and nothing which depends on Him has firstness nor is there anything which was coterminous with Him. He is the One - glory be to Him! in His firstness. There is nothing whose existence is necessary by itself except Him. He is Rich by His essence absolutely above need of any being. Allah says, "Allah is Rich beyond need of any being." (3:97) by the proof of logic and the Shari'a.

So the existence of the universe is must of either have its existence be from Allah to Himself, or an extra matter which is not Him since, if it had been Him, it would not be extra. If it had also been Him, it would have been a complex matter in itself and firstness would have belonged to that extra matter. We have stipulated that there is no firstness to anything with Him nor before Him.

Since that extra matter is not Himself, it must be existence or not existence. It is impossible that it be not existence. Not existence cannot have the effect of bringing into existence in what is described by not-existence, which is the universe. So neither of the two is more likely to have the effect of bringing-into-existence than the other since both of them are not existence. Not-existence has no effect because it is non-existence.

It is impossible that it be existence. So in that it must either be existence by itself or not. It is impossible that its existence be by itself, for the proof has been established of the impossibility of there being in existence two whose existence is necessary by themselves. So there only remains its existence by other than itself, and there is no meaning for the possibility of the universe unless its existence is by other than it. So then it is the universe or from the universe.

If the existence of the universe had been from Allah by a certain relationship, if it had not been for that relationship, the universe would not have existence. That relationship is called will or volition or knowledge or whatever you like of what the existence of the possible demands. So the Real without a doubt would only do something by that relationship. Need has no meaning except this, and it is impossible for Allah. Allah has absolute wealth and he is, as He said, "Allah is Rich beyond need of any being." (3:97)

If it is said that what is meant by this relationship is the same as His Essence, we said that the thing is not in need of itself. He is Rich in himself. So the one thing is in need inasmuch as it is not rich. All of that in respect of Himself is impossible. We negated the extra matter. That obliges therefore that the existence of the universe be, inasmuch as it exists from other than it, tied to the Necessary of existence by Himself. It is impossible that the source of the possible effect the Necessary of existence by Himself with bringing-into-existence. The matter is only intelligible like that.

His will, volition, knowledge and power are His essence. Allah is be exalted very greatly in His essence. Indeed, He has absolute oneness, and He is the One, the Unique, Allah, the Samad "who did not beget" which would be a precedent "nor was He begotten" which would be a result, "and there is nothing equal to Him," (112:3-4) so the existence of the world by Him would be from two premises - from the Real and the equal. Exalted is Allah!

He described Himself like this in His Book when the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, was asked about the attribute of his Lord. Then the Surat al-Ikhlās was sent down and freed him of being associated with other. Allah is exalted in that pure attributes and descriptions. There is nothing which He negates or affirms in this sura but that that affirmer or negator is what some people say about Allah.

(The relationship of Pre-time (Azal) to Allah is like the relationship of time to mortals)

We have explained to you how we must be in need of Him - and He is Allah, glory be to Him! We will further clarify it . Know that the relation of pre-time to Allah is like the relationship of time to us. The relationship of pre-time is a negative attribute without source. Existence is not from this reality. So time belongs to the possible with a relationship whose existence is illusory, not existent, because in the case of anything you can apportion, you can ask "when" about it. When is a question is about time, time must be an illusory matter, not existence. For this reason, Allah applied it to Himself when He said, "and Allah has knowledge of everything" (33:40) "and to Allah belongs the command before and after." (30:4) In the Sunna the words of the asker are confirmed when he asked, "Where was our Lord before He created His creation?" If time had been a matter of existence in itself, Allah's being pure above limitation would not be valid since the principle of time would limit Him. So we recognise that these shapes do not have a matter of existence under them.

(Time: intelligible and proven)

Then we say that people differ about the expression "time" and what is understood by it and proven by it. The sages apply it to different matters. Most of them say that it is an illusory period which is intersected by the movement of the spheres. The mutakallimun apply it to something else: the comparison of an in-time to an in-time about which it is asked, "When?" The Arabs use it to mean night and day. It is our aim in this chapter. Night and day divide the day. From the rising of the sun to its setting is called "daytime", and from the setting of the sun to its rising is called "night". This divided source is called the day. This day manifests the existence of the greater movement. There is only in specific existence the existence of the Mover. It is not the source of time. The outcome of that referring to time is an illusory matter with no reality.

Since this is confirmed, the intelligible which is determined is designated by existent time. By it weeks, months, years and eons are manifested. They are called days and are determined by the small ordinary day which is divided into night and day. "Determined time" is what is extra to this small day by which all the great days are determined. It is said, "on a day whose measure is a thousand years of your reckoning," (32:5) and "on a day whose measure is fifty thousand years." (70:4)

(How days are reckoned in the time the Dajjal)

The Prophet said, "In the days of the Dajjal, a day will be like a year, a day will be like a month, and a day will be like a week, and all his days are like your days." This may due to intense terror. He removed ambiguity outwardly at the end of the hadith when 'A'isha said, "How will one do the prayer on that day?" He said, "One will determine." If it had not been that the matter in the movements of the spheres remained what it was without being upset, it would not be valid that it be determined by the hours by whose form the people of this knowledge act and by which they know the times in cloudy days when the sun does not appear.

At the beginning of the emergence of the Dajjal, there will be many clouds and they will follow one another to such an extent that the existence of the day and night will appear the same to the naked eye. That is one of the rare forms which will occur at the end of time. Those piled-up clouds will come between us and the sky, but the celestial movements will be as they are. So the movements will appear in the actual occupations which are known by the people of occupation with knowledge of the appearance and course of the stars. By them they determine the night and days and the hours of the prayer without doubt.

If that day which is like a year been a single day, it would not be obliged for us to determine the prayers. We would wait for noon of the sun. If it did not descend, we would not pray the prescribed Dhuhr. If the sun stopped and did not descend for twenty thousand years, Allah would not oblige us anything else. When the Lawgiver commanded us to worship by determination, we knew that the movement of the spheres is in the area and their structure is not broken.

(Single time and the single jawhar)

We have informed you about what time is and what is the meaning of the relationship of existence of it and the relationship of determination. There are many days, both small and great. The smallest of them is single time on whose basis emerges "every day He is in one affair." (55:29) Single time (zaman fard) is called a day because the "affair" spoken about is the smallest and finest of times. There is no limit to the greatest of days at which it stops. Between them are the middle days, the first of which is the ordinary well-known day divided into hours. The hours are divided into degrees and the degrees divided into minutes and the minutes divided into seconds, and so on ad infinitum according to some people. They divide the minutes into seconds. When the judgement of number enters them, its judgement is that of number, and number does not end and hence the division does not end.

Some people speak of an ending in that and look at it in respect of the numbered. They are the ones who state that time has an existent source. All that enters into existence comes to an end without a doubt. Their opponent says that the "numbered" inasmuch as it is numbered, does not enter into existence and so it is not described as coming to an end for number is not described as coming to an end. The one who denies the "single essence (jawhar)" advances this as an argument. The body is divided ad infinitum in the intellect. It is a matter of dispute among the people of speculation which occurs from a lack of just treatment and investigation into what is proven by expressions. It is related in sound tradition that time (dahr) is one of the names of Allah. The intelligibility of time is well-known and we will mention that, Allah willing, in this book. "Allah speaks the truth and guides to the path."

CHAPTER SIXTY-SIX

Concerning the secret of the Shari'a, outward and inward, and which Divine Name brought it into existence

The Majestic demands majesty from the Majestic.
So the Majestic refused to witness other than majesty.

When he saw the existence of the might of Allah, the slave of Allah became coquettish.

He was secure with himself, proud, haughty, self-exalted, arrogant.

He informed him of a protected Shari'a so its power greatly abased him.

The slave calls out by loss and abasement,
"O You whose dignity is blessed and exalted!"

The Divine Names are the language of the state accorded by the realities

Allah says, "Say: Had there been in the earth angels walking at peace, We would have sent down upon them out of heaven an angel as a Messenger." (17:95) and He says, "We do not punish until We send a Messenger." (17:15)

Know that the Divine Names have a tongue of state which is accorded them by their realities. Occupy yourself with what you hear and do not imagine multiplicity or existential gathering. In this chapter many intelligible realities will be arranged in respect to relationship, not in respect to existential source. The essence of Allah is One inasmuch as it is essence. From the point of view of our existence, need and possibility, we know that we must have something probable on which to rely. That basis from which our existence is demanded must have various ascriptions. The Lawgiver [Prophet] has called them the ÒMost Beautiful NamesÓ. He called Himself "Speaking" by them inasmuch as He speaks in an existential rank of His Divine existence which cannot be shared in. ÒHe is one god. There is no god but Him.Ó

The confluence of the Names in the presence of the Named and the manifestation of their judgements world, I say that the names gathered together in the presence of the Named. They looked at their realities and meanings and asked for the manifestation of their judgements so that their sources would be set apart by their effects. The Creator is He who is the Determiner, the Knower, the Manager, the Distinguisher, the Originator, the Fashioner, the Provider, the Reviver, the One who makes dies, the Inheritor, the Thankful. All the Divine Names looked at their essences, but did not see the created, managed, distinguished or provided for. They said, "How can there be action unless these sources are manifest in which our judgements appear so our authority is manifest?"

So after the manifestation of the source of the world, the Divine Names which some of the realities of the world demanded sought the protection of the Name, the Originator. (al-Bari). They said to Him, "Would You will bring into existence these sources to manifest our judgements and establish our authority since the presence we are in does not accept our effect?" The Originator said, "That must be referred to the Name, the Powerful. I am under His control."

The possibles in the state of their non-existence and how their sources appeared

The basis of this is that in the state of their non-existence, the possibles made a request to the Divine Names from a state of abasement and need. They said to them, "Non-existence has blinded us to the perception of one another and to recognition of what we owe you. If you were to manifest our sources and clothe us in the robe of existence, you would have blessed us with that and we would have undertaken the glorification and exaltation is obliged in respect of you. Authority is valid for you in our actual manifestation. Today you are masters over us by power and competence. This which we seek of you. is more abundant than it is in respect of us." The Names said, "This which the possibles mentioned is valid." They moved to seek that.

Then they resorted the name, the Powerful (al-Qadir). He said, "I am under the control of the Transformer. I cannot bring any source among you into existence except by His direction. Nothing is possible for me in itself except that a command from the Commander comes to it from its Lord. When He commands it to take form and says to it, 'Be!' then I can do it and connect it to bringing into existence, so I give it form from that moment. Go to the name, the Transformer. Perhaps He will prefer and make dominant the aspect of existence over the aspect of non-existence. The Commander, the Speaker and Myself will be joined together and bring you into existence."

They came to the name, the Transformer, and said to Him, "We asked the name, the Powerful, to bring our sources into existence. He referred the matter to You. What do you say?" The Transformer said, "The Powerful spoke the truth, but I have no news about what the name, the Knowing, has judged regarding you and whether His knowledge of bringing you into existence has preceded in particular or not. I am under the control of the name, the Knowing. Go to Him and tell Him your business."

They then went to the name, the Knowing, and told Him what the name, the Transformer, had told them. The Knowing said, "The Transformer spoke the truth. My knowledge of your coming into existence has already preceded, but adab is more fitting. There is a presence which controls us, and it is the name Allah. We must appear before Him, for it is the presence of gatheredness."

All the names gathered in the presence of Allah. He said, "What is your concern?" They told him. He said, "I am the Name which gathers together your realities. I am the proof of the Named, and it is the pure Essence which has the attributes of perfection and disconnection. Stay until I go in to My proven." He went in to His proven and told Him what the possibles had told Him and what the names conferred about. He said, "Go out and tell each of the Names to attach itself to what its reality demands in the possibles. I am the One by Myself in respect to Myself. The possibles demand My rank, and My rank demands them. All the Divine Names belong to the rank, not to Me, except for the One. It is a name particular to Me, and none shares with Me in its reality in any aspect, either among the names, the ranks, or the possibles.

The known balance, prescribed limit and protected Imam

The name Allah came out, and with Him came the name, the Speaker, to interpret for Him to the possibles and the Names. He mentioned to them what the Named had mentioned. So the Knower, the Transformer, the Speaker and the Powerful were connected, and the first possible appeared by the selection of the Transformer and the judgement of the Knowing.

When the sources and effects appeared in beings, some began to subdue others and prevail over them according to what they are based on among the names and this led to dissension and strife. They said, "We fear that our order will be corrupted and we will be joined to the non-existence which we were in it." The possibles warned the Names about what they were informed of by the Names, the Knowing and the Manager. They said, "O Names! If your judgement is on a known balance, and prescribed limit by an Imam to which you refer, our existence will be preserved for us and we will preserve your effects on us for you. That would be better for us and you. Go to Allah. Perhaps He will advance someone who will prescribe limits for you to stop at. If not, we will be destroyed and become void." They said, "This is useful and a proper opinion." So they did that. They said, "The Name, the Manager, is the One who decides your affair." They went to the Manager with the matter. He said, "I will do it."

He entered and emerged by the command of the Real to the Name, the Lord. He said to Him, "Do what benefit demands to make the sources of these possibles go on." He appointed two ministers to help Him, as He was commanded. One was the name the Manager and the other was the name the Distinguisher. Allah says, "He manages the affair and distinguishes the signs. Perhaps you will be certain in the encounter with your Lord." (13:2) who is the Imam. So look at how wise are the words of Allah when He brought a phrase in accordance with the state which obliges that the business be based on it!

Wise policy and conventional laws

The name, the Lord, prescribed limits for them and placed rules for them for the best interests of the kingdom and to test which of them is the best in actions. Allah put that into two categories. One category is called wise policy which He put in the nature of the selves of the great people. They prescribed limits and set down laws by a power which they find in themselves in each city, direction and climate, according to what the disposition of that area and their tempers demand by their knowledge of what wisdom accords. By that means the property of people and their blood, family, kin and relations is preserved. They call them laws (nawamis) which means "causes of good" since in technical usage, the Namus is that which brings good. The spy (jasus) is the one who deals with evil.

The nawamis are laws of wisdom which men of intellect set down which originate from Allah's inspiration while they are not aware of that. They are meant for the benefit of the world, its order and connection in places which do not have a Divine Shari'a sent down nor knowledge of the One setting down these laws and that these matters draw near to Allah, inherit the Garden or the Fire nor anything of the causes of the Next World. They do not know that there is a Next World and a physical resurrection after death in natural bodies and that in it will be food, drink, clothes, intercourse and joy, and that in it will be punishment and pains. The existence of that is possible, and its non-existence is also possible. They have no proof that one of the two possibles will outweigh the other. "They originated monkhood." (57:27) Therefore the basis of their laws and benefits is to make benefit endure in this abode.

Within themselves, they possess Divine knowledges: the tawhid of Allah and the exaltation and glorification which He must have, the attributes of disconnection (tanzih) and non-existence of any peer or like. The one who perceived that and the one who knew that notified those who did not perceive it. They encouraged people to sound investigation and taught them that the intellects, in respect to their thoughts, have a limit at they stop and cannot exceed, and that Allah grants divine overflowing to the hearts of some of His slaves by which He teaches them knowledges directly from Him so that that is not impossible for them. Allah has entrusted in the celestial world matters which they infer by the existence of their effects on the elemental world. It is His word, "He revealed in every heaven its command." (41:12)

They seek the realities of themselves by what they see - when the bodily form dies, none of the limbs is lacking. Thus they know that the perceiver and the mover of this physical body is another matter additional to it. They seek that extra matter, so they recognise themselves. Then they see what it knows after it was ignorant. They know that even if it is the most noble of bodies, it is accompanied by poverty and loss. They seek the cause by investigation, moving from one thing to another. Whenever they reach something, they see that it is in need of something else until examination leads them to something not in need of anything nor like anything more resembling anything nor having anything resemble it. They stop at it and say, "This is the First." It must be One by its essence in respect to its essence, and its firstness does not accept a second, nor does His oneness because He has no like nor commensurate. They unify Him with the tawhid of existence. When they see that, by themselves, possibles have no dominance by their essence, they know that this One gives them existence. They are in need of Him and His might to negate from them all that their essences are described by. This is the limit of the intellect [in its thought]

The policy of the Shari'a and Divine rules

We have clarified them like that. When a person of their sort arises whom they do not consider to have any rank in knowledge so as they believe that he has sound thought and appropriate investigation and then tells them, "I am the Messenger of Allah to you," they say, "Justice is more fitting. Look at the heart of the claim. Does he claim what is possible or what is impossible?" They said, "It is established with us that Allah has Divine overflowing which He can bestow on whomever He will as He made that overflow onto the spirits of these spheres and these intellects. All share in the possibility. Not one of the possibles is more entitled than others in what is possible. It only remains for us to look into the truthfulness of the person making a claim or see whether he lies or not. We do not advance either of these two judgements without proof. It is bad adab with our knowledge."

They say, "Do you have a proof of the truthfulness of what you claim?" He brings them proofs, and they look at his exposition and his proofs. They look to see what this person has of information about the results of thoughts and what he does not recognise of that. They know that part of what was revealed in every heaven by the One who revealed in every heaven its command is the existence of this person and what he brings. They hasten to him with belief and affirm him. They know that Allah has acquainted him with what He entrusted in the celestial world of gnosers which their thoughts do not reach. Then He gave him some of the gnosis of Allah which they do not possess.

They see that His sending-down knowledge of Allah to the common person, weak of opinion, is with that which is suitable for his intellect in that, and to the person with great intellect and sound examination it is also with that which is propitious for his intellect in that. They know that the man has received Divine overflowing which is beyond the level of the intellect, and that Allah has given him some knowledge of Him and power over it which he did not give them. They speak of His bounty and His advancing him above them. They believe in him and affirm and follow him. He appoints for them acts which bring a person near to Allah and he teaches them what Allah creates of possibles which are unseen for them, and what He will form in them in the future. He tells them about the Resurrection, the Rising, the Gathering, the Garden and the Fire.

Then Messengers followed one another in different times and different situations. Each of them affirmed his companion. They do not differ at all in the basic principles on which they rely and which they designate, even if judgements differ. Divine laws were sent down and judgements were sent down. Judgement is according to the time and the state as He said, "We have appointed a law (Shari'a) and a practice for every one of you." (5:48) Their basic principles agree without there being any difference in any of it.

They differentiate between these prescribed prophetic procedures from Allah and what the metaphysicians stipulate of aphoristic procedures which their thought process demands. They know that this matter is more complete and that it is from Allah without a doubt. Therefore they accept what he teaches them from the unseen worlds and they believe in the Messengers. None of them resists but that he has not given faithful to himself in his knowledge and he has "followed his passion" (7:176) and sought leadership over his fellow species. He is ignorant of his true self and its value, and he is ignorant of his Lord.

The root and cause of setting down the Shari'a in the world is to put the world in order and recognition of what was unknown from Allah which the intellect does not accept, i.e. what the intellect does not possess alone in respect of its examination. So Books were sent down containing this knowledge, and the tongues of the Prophets and Messengers articulated it. Thus the men of intellect knew that they are lacking in matters in knowledge of Allah which the Messengers complete.

The real men of intellect and those who only possess anxiety, disputation and words

By men of intellect, I do not mean the mutakallimun of today in wisdom. By men of intellect, I mean whoever follows the path of the Prophets by being occupied with his self, forms of self-discipline, striving, retreat and preparation for the wâridât which will come to them in their hearts when their attributes are part of the higher world in which revelation is given in the high heavens. These, i.e. the men of intellect, have chatter, speech and argument with those who use their thoughts in the matters of articulation which issued from earlier ones. They do not see the matter from which those men derived it. As those like this with us today, they have no value with any man of intellect. They mock the deen and belittle the slaves of Allah, and they only respect the one who is with them on their level. Love of this world has settled in their hearts as well as ambition for rank and leadership. Allah abases them as they abase knowledge and He degrades them and humiliates them. He makes them have recourse to the doors of ignorant kings and governors. The kings and governors abase them.

The words of men like this are of no importance. Allah has sealed their hearts (7:2), "made them deaf and blinded their eyes" (47:23) in spite of their vast claim that they are the best of the world. The faqih and mufti in the deen of Alla has a better state than these people in spite of his lack of scrupulousness in every aspect. The one with belief, in spite of the fact that he takes it through imitation, has a better state than these men of intellect in their claim. Far be it from the man of intellect that he be the like this!

We have perceived a few who had their state. They were the most knowledgeable of people about the scope of the Messengers and who was the greatest of them in following the Sunna of the Messenger, and the strongest of them in preserving his Sunna, gnostic of what is necessary for the majesty of the Real in exaltation, knowing what Allah has given His slaves among the Prophets and their followers among the awliya' in the way of knowledge of Allah from the direction of divine overflowing of election outside of ordinary teaching in the way of lessons and striving which the intellect cannot reach in respect of its thought.

I heard one of their great men, who had seen part of what Allah had opened upon me of knowledge of Him without reflection or reading. It was from a certain retreat which I did with Allah while I was not among the people of the quest. He said, "Praise be to Allah who has let me be in a time in which I saw one to whom Allah has brought mercy from Him and knowledge from His presence!" Allah bestows His mercy on whomever He will, and Allah has great bounty.

CHAPTER 71

On the Secrets of Fasting

O you who laugh in the form of the weeper!
By us you are the complaint and the complainer.

Is the fast abstention without elevation or elevation without restraint?

They are both together for the one who affirms tawhId by association.

Intellects are trapped and prevented from their freedom of action without nets or snares.

Intellects are impaired from their freedom of action, severely cut off by the Shari'a.

They surrender to what their proof refutes and they believe without perception.

The star of guidance carries them along, swimming between the angels of the spheres.

My self, had it not been for you, I would not have been as if I were Him, were it not for you! Were it not for you!

Fast from phenomenal being and do not break your fast!
The God of creation will bring you close, taking charge of you by that.

Inasmuch as it is a fast, intend that. By nature it is your nourishment.

If you reflect on it, there is a meaning in the fast whenever a creature alights at your abode.

"There is nothing like the fast."
The Lawgiver said that to me, so reflect on that!

This is because it is non-action. Where is that which you have done and where is your claim?

The matter has returned to its root.
My Lord has seized control of you by that.

If you reflect on the principle of the fast and the basis of its meaning by your meaning,

Someone with news came from Him about your prescribed fast which will divest you.

The fast belongs to Allah, so do not be ignorant.
You are merely the place of its manifestation.

The fast belongs to Allah, and yet you are the one dying of hunger, so know that!

The Merciful made you feminine because of what appears from you when He fashioned you (the self).

Glory be to the One who fashioned you! Welcome to Him!
He only gave that to you!

You, like the earth, are a bed for it and your source-spring (eye) is described as weeping.

You see the source of the handiwork of Allah between the two of you, so where is your manifestation?

When you called on Allah out of abasement to Him, the Great,
He said, "At your service" to you.

The highest pen in His Tablet wrote your pure description from Him.

You are the source of all, not His source.
He brought you near from one aspect and put you far from another.

Beware of being content with what pleases you for the sake of what He makes pleasing to you.

Remain with your root in all He desires.
Do not forget so as to be forgotten.

This is the knowledge which came to me from one who does not lie.

He brought it down at the command of the One who has the most knowledge of what is between the ascetics and devout.

Praise be to Allah who bestowed on me knowledge of lights and darkness.
He gave me a form whose perfection is only by your shelter.

Fasting is abstention and elevation

May Allah support you! Know that fasting (sawm) is both abstention and elevation. One says "the day has reached its full height (sama)" when it has reached its highest point. (The poet) Imru'l-Qays said:

When the day reached its height (sama) and its heat was intense, i.e. the day reached its fullest extent. It is because the fast has a higher degree than all other acts of worship that it is called "fast" (sawm). Allah elevated it by denying that it is like any other act of worship as we will discuss. He denied its ownership to His servants although they worship Him by it and ascribed the fast to Himself. Part of its affirmation is that He rewards the one who is described by it by His hand even though He connected it to Himself when He stated that it is not like anything else.

Fasting in reality is non-action, not action

(In reality, fasting is non-action, not action. The negation of likeness is a negative attribute. Therefore the relationship between it and Allah is strengthened. Allah Almighty says about Himself, "There is nothing like Him." (42:11) He denied that there is anything like Him and so there is nothing like Him by logical proofs and by the Shari'a. An-Nasa'i related that Abu Umama said, "I came to the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and said, 'Give me something that I can take from you.' He said, 'You must fast. There is nothing like it.'" He denied that it was like any of the acts of worship which are prescribed for the servants of Allah.

Anyone who recognises that it is a negative attribute – since it consists of abandoning things which break it – knows absolutely that there is nothing like it since it has no source which is described by understood existence. This is why Allah said, "The fast is Mine." In reality, it is neither worship or action. It is permissible to apply the name 'action' to it, as the application of the expression 'existent' can be applied to Allah. We understand that it is allowed although the ascription of existence to He whose existence is the same as His Essence is not like the ascription of existence to us. "There is nothing like Him." (42:11)

Every action of the son of Adam is His except fasting. It belongs to Allah.

Quotation of a Divine Prophetic hadith:

Muslim transmitted in the Sahih that Abu Hurayra reported from the Messenger of Allah that Allah said, "Every action of the son of Adam belongs to him except the fast. It is Mine, and I repay him for it. Fasting is a protection. When one of you has a day of fasting, he should then speak neither obscenely nor too loudly; and if someone seeks to curse him or fight with him, let him say, 'I am fasting.' By Him in whose hand is the soul of Muhammad, the smell of the mouth of the one who fasts is more delectable to Allah than the scent of musk. The one who fasts has two joys in which to delight: when he breaks his fast, he rejoices; and when he meets his Lord, he rejoices in his fast." (Muslim: 13:163)

The delight of the faster lies in his attachment to the degree of the negation of likeness

Know that since the Prophet denied that there is anything like the fast, as is established in the hadith of an-Nasa'i, and "Allah has nothing like Him," the faster meets his Lord described as "having nothing like him". He sees Him by it, and He is the Seer-Seen. This is why the Prophet said, "he rejoices in his fast" and not "He rejoices in meeting his Lord." Joy does not rejoice in itself; he is made to rejoice by it. Whoever has Allah as his sight when he sees and contemplates Him, only sees himself by seeing Him.

The faster rejoices at having the rank of negation of likeness. He rejoices in breaking the fast in this world since that gives the animal self its due since intrinsically seeks food. When the gnostic sees that his animal self needs food and sees that it exists by the nourishment which he gives it, then he fulfils its due which Allah has made obligatory for him and put in the position of being described as a right. He gives by the hand of Allah as He sees Allah in the encounter by the eye of Allah. This is why he rejoices at breaking the fast as he rejoices in his fast when he meets his Lord.

Fasting is a samadiyya attribute and the Real repays it Clarification of what this tradition contains:

The slave is described as having a fast and being entitled to the name 'faster' by this attribute. After affirming his fast, then Allah strips it from him and ascribes it to Himself. He said, "Fasting is Mine," meaning the attribute of timeless self-reliance (samadiyya). It is disconnection from food. "It is only Mine, even if I have described you with it. I described you with a certain limited qualification of disconnection, not by the disconnection (tanzih) which My majesty deserves. I said, 'I repay him for it.'" Allah repays the fast of the faster when it is transferred to his Lord and he meets Him with an attribute unlike any other: which is the fast, since "the One who has nothing like Him" is only seen by the one who has nothing like him. This is like the text from Abu Talib al-Makki, one of the masters of the people of tasting. "Its reparation shall be him in the saddlebags of whom it is discovered" (12:75) It is what is obliged by this ayat in this state.

The difference between negation of likeness from Allah and from fasting

Then He said, "Fasting is a protection," and it is a safeguard as He said, "Fear Allah," (2:194) i.e. take Him as a safeguard and also be a safeguard for Him. He put the fast in His position in acting as a safeguard. "There is nothing like Him," and fasting has no like among the acts of worship. One does not say that there is nothing like the fast. The thing is a matter of permanence or existence. Fasting is non-action. It is a non-existent intelligible and negative attribute. It has no like. It is not that there is nothing like it. This is the difference between the attribute of Allah in the negation of likeness and the way that the fast is described by it.

The faster being forbidden obscenity, shouting and strife

Then the Lawgiver placed prohibitions on the faster. The prohibition is non-action and a negative attribute. He said, "he should then speak neither obscenely nor shout." He did not command him to an action, but forbade that he be described by certain actions. Fasting is non-action, so the relationship between fasting and what he forbade the faster is valid. Then he commanded that he say to the one who curses him or fights with him, "I am fasting," i.e. I am leaving this action which you are doing, fighter or curser, to me. By the command of his Lord, he disconnects himself from this action. He reports that he is not acting, i.e. he does not have the attribute of cursing or fighting for the one who curses and fights him.

The smell of the mouth of the faster with Allah

Then he swore, "By the One who holds the soul of MUhammad in His hand, the changed breath of the faster..." This is the changed smell of the mouth of the faster which only exists by respiration. He respire these good words by which he is commanded. These words are: "I am fasting." These words and every breath of the faster is "more delectable on the Day of Rising," the day when people are resurrected for the Lord of the worlds, "with Allah." He used the name which joins all of their names and he used the name which has no like since only Allah is named by this name. It is in harmony with fasting which has no like.

He said, "more delectable than the scent of musk." The scent of musk is an existential matter which is perceived by smell. The person who has a balanced constitution enjoys it. The scent of changed breath is considered more fragrant with Allah than that, because the ascription of the perception of scents to Allah does not resemble the perception of scents to the smeller. We find it unpleasant, while with Him this breath is more sublime than the scent of musk. It is a described ruh which has no like as He described it. This scent is not like that scent. The scent of the faster comes from respiration. The scent of musk does not come from the respiration of musk.

Ibn 'Arabi with Musa ibn Muhammad al-Qabbab at the minaret in the Haram of Makka

Something like of this happened to me. I was with Musa ibn Muhammad al-Qabbab at the minaret in the Haram of Makka at the Hazawwara door. The adhan was being given. He had some food which had a very offensive smell to everyone who smelled it. I had heard in Prophetic tradition that the angels take offence at that to which the children of Adam take offence and that it is forbidden to go near the mosques with the smell of garlic, onions and leeks. I spent the night resolved to tell that man to remove that food from the mosque for the sake of the angels. Then I saw Allah Almighty in a dream in which He told me, "Do not tell him about that food. Its smell with Me is not like its smell with you." In the morning, he came to us as he usually did and I told him what had transpired. He wept and prostrated to Allah out of thankfulness. Then he told me, "My master, in spite of this, adab with the Shari'a is better," and he removed it from the mosque, may Allah have mercy on him.

Celestial natures are averse to foul odours

Sound natural constitutions in man and angel flee from foul unpleasant odours due to the offensiveness which they sense arising out of lack of harmony. The aspect of the Truth in foul odours is only perceived by Allah and whoever has the disposition to accept it among animals and men who have the nature of that animal. This is not the case with the angel. This is why he said, "with Allah". Inasmuch as the faster is a human being with sound constitution, he dislikes the bad breath of fasting in himself and others.

Do any creatures with sound constitution realise by their Lord a moment or in witnessing so that they absolutely perceive foul odours as pleasant? We have not heard of this. We said "absolutely" because some constitutions dislike the smell of musk and the rose, especially the hot constitution. That which is found to be offensive is not pleasant for the one with this constitution. This is why we said "absolutely" since most constitutions find musk, rose and the like fragrant. It is a rare constitution, i.e. unusual, which finds these pleasant smells offensive.

I do not know whether Allah has granted anyone the perception of the equality of scents since nothing has a foul smell with Him. We have not tasted this ourselves and it has not been transmitted to us that anyone else perceived that. Moreover, it is related that perfect men and the angels find these foul smells offensive. Only Allah perceives that as pleasant. This is transmitted. I also do not know what the case is with animals outside of man regarding that because Allah has not established me in the form of an animal other than man as He established me in the forms of His angels at times. Allah knows best.

The Gate of Quenching by which fasters enter the Garden

By way of the meaning, the Shari'a has described fasting with the perfection above which there is no perfection. This is because Allah gave it a special door with a special name which demands perfection. It is called the Door of the Quenched. The fasters enter it. Quenching is a degree of perfection in drinking. After being quenched, the drinker does not accept any more to drink to all. Whenever he accepts, then he was not quenched, whether it is a land or not a land among the lands of the animals.

Muslim related from the hadith of Sahl ibn Sa'd that the Messenger of Allah said, "There is a door in the Garden called the Quenching. The fasters will enter it on the Day of Rising. None except them will enter it. It will be said, 'Where are the fasters?' and they will enter it. When the last of them has gone in it, it will be locked and no one else will enter it." That is not said about any of the commanded or forbidden acts of worship except for the fast. By "the Quenching," He made it clear that they obtain the attribute of perfection in action since they are described by that which has no like as we already said. In reality, the one who has no like is the perfect. The fasters among the gnostics enter it here, and there they will enter it with the knowledge of all creatures.

Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Testament on the Mantle of Initiation (al-Khirqah)

Gerald Elmore

Introduction

The short work translated here in its entirety is important for at least three reasons: Firstly, in its conclusion it gives the precise line of descent, or derivation (nasab) – actually, four of them – of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s formal spiritual affiliation with the hierarchic Messenger of God as represented by the Shaykh himself. Second, the main body of the text constitutes an attractive literary composition which begins by adumbrating the author’s view on the tradition of investiture of the Ṣūfī ‘mantle of initiation’ (ilbās al-khirqah), then proceeds to offer an extended string of moral imperatives – pearls of wisdom (ḥikam) cultivated over a long life of intensive mystical experience. At the time of setting the Nasab al-khirqah to paper that full, rich life was drawing to its natural close – which brings us to the third distinction of the book: the fact that it represents Ibn al-‘Arabī’s maturest thought on the right conduct of life.

The Nasab seems to have been composed in Damascus in or sometime before 633/1236 – that is, presumably around the time of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s autobiibliography written for al-Malik al-Muẓaffar (viz., the Ijāzah) and a few years after the one he drew up for Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Qūnawī (the Fihrist), neither of which list the work. As it is not mentioned by the author anywhere else either, the only evidence of it that we have is the assortment of two-dozen or so manuscripts listed by Yahia, ‘Awwād and Brockelmann.¹ There the situation is somewhat ambiguous. The good news is that the book is definitely by Ibn al-‘Arabī and it survives reasonably intact in many of the said manuscripts. What is not so encouraging, however, is the quality of the source-material when compared to most of the Shaykh’s other major works. The fact that none of the extant sources appear to be older than the 10th/16th century is both substantively unfortunate and worrisome in its implications: How has it come to pass that all of the earlier copies of such a manifestly significant document have disappeared? Might this not portend that for one cause or another, accidental or otherwise, the later transcripts do not perfectly reflect the original text? When we examine the material closely these suspicions are hardly allayed. Most of the known codices which I inspected in Turkey were very late and inferior.²

1. See Osman Yahia, Histoire et classification de l’oeuvre d’Ibn ‘Arabī (Damascus, 1964), pp. 407–8, no. 530, where most of the references of Brockelmann and ‘Awwād are also given. In addition, Claude Addas has discovered several more manuscripts at the Zāhirīyah archive in Damascus (see her translation, cited below) and there are two copies at Princeton University. Surely many others will yet turn up, but it is not so likely that any will be greatly superior to those described below.

The four most serviceable manuscripts of the Nasab that I have seen are MSS. Esad Efendi 1507/ff. 87–98b, Şehid Ali Paşa 1344/156b–159b, Zāhirīyah 5924/21b–25,³ and Nafiz Paşa 384/228b–235. Of these, Şehid Ali, copied in 948/1541, is materially the earliest, but Esad Efendi purports to be based on a certified master-copy in the author's own hand, which was dated 633/1236. For the most part that claim may be taken at face value, so Esad – along with Şehid Ali and Zāhirīyah – will form the basis of the text translated here.⁴ Nafiz is also useful, however, for being fully vocalized.

The Nasab al-khirqah was published in Cairo in 1987 ('Ālam al-Fikr) by 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ḥasan Maḥmūd as an appendix to his edition of Ibn al-'Arabī's K. al-Masā'il (under the title of Al-Tanazzulāt al-laylīyah fī l-aḥkām al-ilāhīyah), on pp. 79–96 [hereafter, C]. The source of this text was a learned (but uncritical) monograph entitled Al-Burhān al-jalī fī taḥqīq intisāb al-ṣūfīyah li-'Alī (published in the Cairene journal, Liwā' al-Islām, from Feb., 1979 to May, 1981)⁵ by a Moroccan sharīf and Shādhilite traditionist then resident in Egypt, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Şiddīq al-Ghimārī al-Ḥasanī al-Idrīsī, who quoted Ibn al-'Arabī's Nasab to show that the Ṣūfīs recognized that their khirqah did not actually extend back continuously to the Prophet's noble house. The material appropriated by Maḥmūd was only part of the Nasab offered in Shaykh al-Ghimārī's study, however, so the journal series must still be consulted for about a third of the work (including the chains of transmission). But as far as it goes, the printed Arabic text is fairly sound, so that the manuscript basis – whatever it may

2. Included in that category would be MSS. Hafid Efendi 482, Halet Ef. 93, and Hacı Mahmud [= Yahya] Ef. 2415, 2718 & 5322 (all kept at the Süleymaniye). Carullah 2111 may have been produced as early as 915/1509, but it is incomplete and corrupt. Nafiz 384 is very neat but probably quite late. Besides the other sources mentioned infra, I have also consulted two late manuscripts at the Firestone Library in Princeton (Yahuda 4235 & 4098) and several others in Istanbul.

3. I am indebted to Jane Clark, librarian of the Muhyiddin Ibn 'Arabī Society (Oxford), for providing me with a photocopy of this transcript. The other three manuscripts listed here were consulted at the Süleymaniye.

4. For a fuller account of the manuscript basis of the Nasab, see my review of Claude Addas's translation of the work (in this issue, pp.133–7) [included as appendix at the end of this article].

5. Vol. 33, no. 7, to vol. 35, nos. 9–10. The bulk of the first two-thirds of the Nasab may be found in the issue of June–July, 1980, pp. 39–42. The silsilahs are on p. 40 of the June, 1979, and p. 33 of the July issues. The journal ceased appearing for a year after President Sadat was assassinated, and, indeed, never resumed with its former quality.

have been – apart from the omissions, was evidently quite as good as those sources mentioned above.

Latest in time but certainly not least in authority, the recent French translation of the Nasab by Claude Addas – “Le Livre de la filiation spirituelle” (‘Ayn al-Ḥayāt, 5 [1999], pp. 5–44) – has greatly assisted me in the final revision of my own translation presented here, and I cannot fail to express my admiration for Addas’s scholarship and insight even where we, quite naturally, take a different view on this or that issue. Here and there we have established/interpreted the Arabic text of the Nasab differently, as well, and it is this that justified the publication of my own attempt, even after Addas’s superb accomplishment.

I first edited and translated the Nasab al-khirqah in the spring of 1993 during a study-mission to the magnificent Süleymaniye Kütüphanesi in Istanbul. At the time I did not know that Addas had already reached an advanced stage of work on the same project, and having completed my immediate task involving the ‘Anqā’ mughrīb source-material, I decided to take the opportunity to collate the text of the Nasab on the basis of the best manuscripts available in Turkey. Later this collation was expanded to include two sources at Princeton and photocopies of other manuscripts. Meanwhile, my provisional rendition had undergone several recensions before I belatedly learned of my colleague’s final preparations to publish the same work just last year. It is hoped that this sudden embarras de richesses concerning a book which had barely been discussed until this year⁶ will not disappoint those students of the Shaykh who are so rightly aware of the need for scholars to economize their energies in tapping the great Ibn al-‘Arabian Reservoir.

At a later date I plan to publish my edition of the Arabic text of the Nasab, along with a more detailed study of the form and content of the document. For the time being, however, Ibn al-‘Arabī’s own voice remains clear enough herein (despite the inevitable distortions of translation) that we may trust him to speak for himself. My own close work with this little book has affected me more personally than with any other writing by the Shaykh. If that counts for companionship (ṣuḥbah), then we all might be ‘Akbarians’ who read the present work with attention, in shā’ al-Lāh!

6. That is, beyond the several adversions to the Nasab (and relevant translated passages) in Addas’s Quest for the Red Sulphur (Cambridge, 1993), pp. 42–6 and 316–7, et al.

The Descent of the Mantle of Initiation (Nasab al-Khirqah) of the poor Servant of God,

Muḥammad b. ‘Alī Ibn al-‘Arabī
(May God grant him success!)

In the name of God, the Merciful Mercifier!

PRAISE BELONGS TO GOD, Who confers upon His Servants, the People of Providence, His Beautiful Names, that He might transport them (li-yuḥilla-hum) in that most-radiant, noble Place of abiding (al-maḥall).⁷ Thus, God caused to ascend (‘arraja) the one who ascended by [His Names],⁸ who was among those whom He chose for His worship and bound to Himself up to [the Station of] “Two bows’ length or closer” (qāb qawsayn aw adnā).⁹ On account of that Divine Closeness (al-qurb al-ilāhī) God’s Servants live the most carefree and agreeable way of life. Moreover, He declares to them: “Know that it is not possible for one who is from Us to take aught from anyone but Us!”

Among [God’s chosen Servants, the Prophets] is the one who is at rest [at the summit] of his Ascent (mi‘rāju-hu), though he was not adopted as a son;¹⁰ and among them is the one who perseveres in his Night-journey (isrā’u-hu) and who agonizes [in his continuing struggle], though he cares not what troubles he may meet along the way if he attains the intended Object [in the end].¹¹ And among them is he whom God takes as a Companion and a Confidant, a beloved Friend and an Intimate¹² – the whole

7. Elect man is invested with the Divine names (attributes) as a robe of honor (khil’ah, cognate with the first verb used here). The maḥall, or ‘location’, is man’s heart, which – according to the celebrated tradition quoted below (at n. 36) – is the only thing that may ‘contain’ God. The ‘translocation’ of the mystic, then, is something of a transubstantiation, or apotheosis.

8. An allusion to the Prophet Muḥammad, who ascended to the highest heavens in his Mi‘rāj.

9. Qur. 53: 9, referring to the Angel Gabriel’s appearance to Muḥammad.

10. Wa-in lam yutabanná. The reference, I think, is to Jesus, who – though he is “at rest” with God after being raised up to Him (see Qur. 3: 55) – is not himself Divine as the false Christians suppose.

11. That is, Muḥammad, who journeyed by night from Mecca to Jerusalem (see Qur. 17: 1). While he may be said to remain in a condition of ‘becoming ever closer’ to God, he is not thereby inferior to one (such as Jesus) who has already ‘arrived.’

12. Ṣafī wa-naḥī wa-ḥabīb wa-khidn. The terms (which are virtually synonymous, all signifying a ‘friend’) could be construed to refer to the prophets, Adam, Moses, Abraham and David (among others).

[of mankind] by predestination being Lords of the ‘People of the Trusteeship’ (sādāt ahl al-amānah), who are trustworthy.¹³

There [in Destiny] he who stands with the Divine Spirit and he who stands with the one sprung “from spilled semen”¹⁴ shall be distinguished, there being naught but two groups [of creatures in the Hands of the Creator] (qabḍatān) – one of the Left, which is lesser, and another of the Right, made fortunate.¹⁵ But Mercy encompasses every single thing,¹⁶ by virtue of which God enables the distant to become the close, if He so will, that he might be distinguished by Closeness [to God – that is, saintliness]¹⁷ at the time of the Setting-forth [for Judgment] on account of His Foreknowledge that he was one who had attained unto [that Closeness], having reached his Destiny [in pre-eternity]. For the Real had spoken to him in his Innermost being (sirru-hu) in the silent ‘Voice of Reality’ (lisān al-ḥāl): “That is only by Our Will!” And He averred in the breasts of His Servants that the Divine Presence comprehends both the very highest and the lowest attribution.

I praise God with the Praise of one who speaks by the [Divine] ‘He’, not by the [human] ‘I’¹⁸ – and when [that Divine Praise] is delivered to its keeper and [revealed] within its vessel,¹⁹ it brings great benefit! And I bless His chosen Messenger who does not cease chanting the Qur’ān (May God bless and keep him!) as long as letter joins to letter and meaning to meaning, and the meanings take the utterance of the articulator (kalimat al-lāfīz) as a dwelling . . .²⁰

NOW THEN, after Praise and Blessings and [mention of] the abundant gifts and delights which God granted us when we sought refuge in Him, I say: “Praise belongs to God, Who guides us to this – and we would not be well-guided were not God to guide us. Verily, the Messengers

13. See Qur. 33: 72, where man accepts the “trusteeship” over which all other creatures demurred.

14. An allusion to Qur. 75: 37, referring to the man (al-insān) of physical nature.

15. That is, the damned and the blessed.

16. Cf. Qur. 7: 156.

17. Al-qurb = walāyah (sainthood, “closeness,” ‘nearness, or proximity’ to God).

18. See Addas’s perceptive comment in “La Filiation spirituelle”, n. 70.

19. Al-ḥāfiẓ wa-l-inā’. The Divine praise of al-Bisṭāmī (“Glory be to Me!”) is tantamount to the “I am the Real!” of al-Ḥallāj, and both indicate the sense of the genuine Divinity of Christ as the Word of God delivered to the Virgin Mary (in Qur. 4: 171).

20. This line has puzzled the copyists, who all offer different readings of it. The meaning is evidently as Addas has suggested: The Prophet’s recitation of the Scripture lives on, as it were, in the continuous chanting of it on the lips of his followers, the Ṣūfīs. Each clause of the opening poem, which is simply a stylized basmalah, rhymes in -nā. Note also that the section contains no mention of the proper theme of the present work (although an oblique reference was noted in the first sentence).

of our Lord have brought the Truth!"²¹ And one of the verses brought from 'the Exalted, the Wise' [Matrix of the Scripture]²² by the Noble Messenger in the Scripture sent-down, which is the Glorious Qur'ān, [is the following]:

O Children of Adam, We have sent down upon you a Vestment (libās) to cover your shameful parts, and beautiful Raiment (rīsh); and the Robe of God-fearing (libās al-taqwā) – that is best. [Sūrat al-A'raf: 26]

The 'indispensable' [aspect] of the Outer Vestment (al-libās al-ẓāhir) is that which covers the shameful parts – that being the "Robe of God-fearing" [i. e., decency] – for the sake of protection.²³ The "beautiful Raiment" is what exceeds that, in which there is adornment (al-zīnah) – "the Adornment of God which He brings forth for His Servants"²⁴ from the treasures of His Transcendencies, and which He has made a Saving grace (khālīṣah)²⁵ for the Believers during the life of this World and on the Day of Resurrection,²⁶ when they shall not be called to account for it. But if they wear it and adorn themselves therein without this Intent and without this Presence,²⁷ wearing it in vanity and conceit, then that is "the adornment of the life of this World (al-ḥayāh al-dunyā)."²⁸ For the cloth (al-thawb) is one, but the judgment upon it is various, in accordance with the variety of intentions.²⁹

Again, the [real] Robe of God-fearing – which is the "Best" Vestment [in the above-quoted verse] – was sent down into the hearts of the Servants of God, it being in the exact form of the Outer Vestment.³⁰ Like the latter, it is an 'indispensable' vestment (libās ḍarūrī) which covers the shameful things of the Inner aspect (saw'āt al-bāṭin) –

21. Qur. 7: 43.

22. God is described by the epithets, al-'Alī al-Ḥakīm, in Qur. 42: 51 (and, separately, in many places). Just six verses later, in 43: 4, however, the same terms are applied to the celestial prototype, or metaphysical matrix, of the Qur'ān (the umm al-kitāb), and our present passage is not without a like ambiguity.

23. In current usage, libās al-taqwā has become an expression for modesty, or common 'decency'.

24. Qur. 7: 32.

25. An allusion to the second half of the verse just quoted; but the key-word, khālīṣah, is explained more clearly in Qur. 38: 46: "Verily, We have saved them with a Saving qualification (khālīṣah) – the recollection of the Final Abode."

26. Maḥmūd (the editor of C) reads "the day of Establishment" (iqāmah instead of qiyāmah) in the eternal Abode (dār al-muqāmah), with reference to Qur. 35: 35.

27. That is, without the intent to recollect the Hereafter and, hence, be present therein even now (see n. 25).

28. See Qur. 18: 28 & 46; and cf. 57: 20.

29. The "beautiful Raiment" and the "Adornment of God" are the spiritual-intellectual endowments and virtues which, in the Ṣūfīs, bring the recollection of eternity, and are the 'saving grace' which purifies them for eternal bliss in the Hereafter; but in the worldly these same endowments are mere vainglory, leading to damnation.

30. Note that the Shaykh already identified the outer most garment as the prerequisite libās al-taqwā that being fear of God regarding everything forbidden (taqwá l-mahārim), in principle. In it, also, is that which is like the “beautiful Raiment” in the Outer aspect – that being the Vestment of the Noble Moral qualities (makārim al-akhlāq), such as the supererogatory acts of devotion, like forgiveness and peace-making in cases when the Lawgiver has permitted you to assert your right.³¹ But the relinquishing of one’s right is one of the things whereby Man may adorn himself within, for that is the Adornment of God in the Inner aspect – that being every Inner Vestment to which the Law shows you the way.³²

The Inner Vestment has been realized in the form of the Outer as to the Law; and, even as the Outer is various in its purposes and intents, so the Inner Vestment differs in intents and purposes. When this was determined in the minds of the People of God,³³ they desired to bring together the two modes of Vestiture (libsatān) and to adorn themselves with the two types of Adornment in order to combine the two Most-excellent Qualifications (al-ḥusaynayayn)³⁴ and, thus, come back from the two extremes.³⁵ For the cause of their donning this Distinguished Mantle (al-khirqah al-ma’lūmah) is that it might be an indication (tanbīh) of that to which they aspire for the Vestment of their Inner parts; and they deem that [to be a sign of] good Companionship and Moral instruction (ṣuḥbah wa-adab).

The origin of this Vestment, in my view – according to what was revealed to my Innermost being – is God’s own ‘putting on’ the Heart of His Servant. For verily, He has declared: “My Earth and My Heaven do not contain Me, but the Heart of My faithful Servant contains Me.”³⁶ For the clothing ‘contains’ its Wearer. When that [i.e., the Divine presence] was decreed in my Innermost being, and my standing among the Knowers of God became magnified, I composed these verses on the subject:

(= basic decency), but this, the glorified inner one, is the “best” of them – the bona fide robe of God-fearing/piety, which, however, takes the same generic form as the outer.

31. Such as, for instance, turning the other cheek if someone should strike you without cause (see Matt. 5: 39). Most of the commandments of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount would be classed as acts of supererogation (nawāfil). It is precisely their voluntary (creative) nature that lends them salvific efficacy.

32. That is, as an ideal (not a mandatory) objective.

33. “When this was determined”: that is, in the mid-4th/10th century, when the tradition of the symbolic mantle of initiation was first instituted by Ṣūfīs like al-Shiblī and Ibn Khafīf, as we will see below (at nn. 40–1).

34. See E. W. Lane, Arabic–English Lexicon (rep., Cambridge, 1984), s.v. ḥusaynā.

35. Fa-yathābū minā l-ṭarafayni. The verb is cognate with the word, thawb (clothing; garment). The “two extremes,” or ‘extremities’, have various significations in proverbs (see ibid., s.v. ṭaraf), but the usage here is probably rhetorical.

36. On this very popular (but non-canonical) ḥadīth qudsī, see Su’ād al-Ḥakīm, Al-Mu’jam al-ṣūfī (Beirut, 1981), pp. 1265–6.

[THE MANTLE OF THE HEART]³⁷

Of knowers, am I not most avaricious with my Way and my Secret³⁸ – most ungenerous?
 No! This is not avarice, but, rather,
 it is the most generous form of Favor:
 I will accommodate [my Lord] whenever my knowing Heart realizes His [Presence]!
 I am the Sun, disclosed by my own Essence,
 if I will; and the waning Moons reveal me
 When I will that – All of this in accordance with my Station. And the Stars will reveal me
 When the Night becomes most dark from my Absence and the World benighted loses sight of me.
 But when my Mantle ‘covers’ [God’s] Essence,³⁹
 all will be bewildered by its brilliance!

Now, the combination of the two types of Vestiture appeared from the time of [the tenth-century Eastern Ṣūfī masters] al-Shiblī⁴⁰ and Ibn Khafīf,⁴¹ et cetera, and our own course has followed their way (madhhab) in that.⁴² We have donned [the Mantle] at the hands of a number of noble Ṣūfī masters⁴³ after having been their companion and followed their Moral example, so that my wearing of the Vestment might be authenticated, both externally and internally. But our way regarding the investiture of 37. The poem is included in the Dīwān Ibn al-‘Arabī (Bulaq, 1855), p. 58 (no. 147). The metre is al-mutaqārib.

38. Dīn-ī wa-sirr-ī. For the many possible connotations of these two words, see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

39. Idhā labbisat khirqat-ī dhāta-hu. God ‘wears’ the mantle of the Ṣūfī’s heart, which is His proper ‘garment’ – the only created thing that might be said to contain Him.

40. Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Dulaf b. Jaḥdar al-Shiblī of Baghdad (d. 945). See also at n. 116, below.

41. Abū ‘Abd al-Lāh Muḥammad Ibn Khafīf b. Isfakshādh of Shiraz (d. 982). See also at n. 135.

42. Al-Shiblī was the initiator of the first formal investiture, or line of descent, listed below which ultimately was received by Ibn al-‘Arabī, and Ibn Khafīf instituted the second. In each case these masters had themselves been the final link in a chain leading back to God (through Gabriel and the Prophet), but the associations before the mid-tenth century had not been formalized by an actual hierurgic rite of investiture (as is clear from the technical language used in the silsilahs themselves).

43. The word translated “a number” here actually implies a rather numerous company (jammah), raising at least the possibility that Ibn al-‘Arabī may have received other than the four investitures certified in the Nasab.

Aspirant-disciples (libās murīd al-tarbīyah) is different from what is current today⁴⁴ – and that is that the Master should carefully examine the Aspirant who aspires to be invested with the Mantle, since any spiritual State (ḥāl) in which the Disciple finds himself may be for him a deficiency.⁴⁵ So the Master ‘invests’ himself in that State in order to ascertain the reality of it as it inundates him, the power of the State flowing into the garment (al-thawb) that the Master happens to be wearing. Then he takes off the garment while in that State, and clothes him – the Aspirant – in it, so that the flow of spiritual ‘Wine’ (sarayān al-khamr) might permeate him, pervading his members, and inundate him, perfecting the State for him. But nowadays this [sort of initiatic procedure] is quite rare,⁴⁶ and when the spiritual energies (himam) of people fall short of the kinds of things of which we have just been speaking, they degenerate to the level of the common masses. Even then, however, they stipulate therein certain conditions (shurūṭ) – this Distinguished Mantle being conditional on the form of what the Real has proclaimed with regard to covering shameful things (sitr al-saw’āt):

For the shameful of falsehood should be covered with the vestment of Truthfulness (libās al-ṣidq); and the shameful of treachery with the garment of Trustworthiness (thawb al-amānah);

And perfidy is covered with the mantle of Fidelity (khirqat al-wafā’); and hypocrisy with the mantle of Sincerity (al-ikhlāṣ);

And foolish morals are covered by the mantle of Noble morals (makārim al-akhlāq); and reprehensible acts by the mantle of Praiseworthy acts (al-maḥāmid); and every base nature with the mantle of every Sublime nature (khuluq sanī);

And the mere renouncing of [belief in] the secondary causes (al-asbāb) must be covered with the Absolute Affirmation of the ONE (tawḥīd al-tajrīd);

And trust in finite entities (al-tawakkul ‘alā l-akwān) is covered with complete Trust in God alone;

44. This line is only found in some of the sources; and although it is probably an interpolation, it could well have been added by the author himself.

45. For instance, a highly intelligent disciple might lack compassion or common sense, and even one who is very virtuous may still suffer from spiritual pride (à la the young man in Matt. 19: 16–23).

46. Recall that this was written at the end of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s career. A similar glimpse into the Shaykh’s empirical teaching method may be found in an early work, the ‘Anqā’ mughrīb (Cairo, 1954), pp. 11–12 (translated in G. Elmore, Islamic Sainthood in the Fullness of Time [Leiden, 1999], pp. 264–5); and an even more germane passage is in the Futūḥāt al-makkīyah (Cairo, 1911), vol. I, pp. 186–7, translated below (n. 147).

And thanklessness (kufr al-ni'mah, the 'unbelief of the benefit') with Thankfulness towards the Benefactor (shukr al-Mun'im).⁴⁷

Then adorn yourself in the Adornment of God (zīnat al-Lāh) with vestiture of the Praiseworthy Morals (malābis al-akhlāq al-maḥmūdah), such as:

Silence (al-ṣamt) regarding what does not concern you,
Averting the eyes from what is improper to gaze upon,
Inspecting the bodily members with timorousness,
Relinquishing mistrust of people,

Perusing (taṣaffuh) the daily pages of your actions and what the pens of the Noble Scribes record against you,⁴⁸

Contentment (al-qanā'ah) with little sustenance – not looking for an increase in anything but good deeds,⁴⁹

Examination of the soul's dispositions (akhlāq al-naḥs), Repeatedly seeking God's Forgiveness (ta'āhud al-istighfār) and turning to recite the Qur'ān,

Adherence to the edifying manners of Prophetary Culture (al-ādāb al-nabawīyah) and studying the morals of the Righteous (akhlāq al-ṣāliḥīn),

Striving emulously (al-munāfasah) in matters of Religion and Kinship relations, Diligence in friendliness towards neighbors,

And the expending of one's very self/honor (badhl al-'ird). The Messenger of God (May God bless and keep him!) spoke of that, saying: "Is anyone of you able to be as Abū Ḍamḍam? When he woke up in the morning he used to declare, 'O God! Verily, I give my self/honor ('ird-ī) as alms to Your Servants.'"⁵⁰

[Similarly,] you must be generous of soul (sakhā' al-naḥs, = 'ready to relinquish what one has') – that is, expend the soul/self to satisfy the needs of mankind;⁵¹

Do favors (iṣṭinā' al-ma'rūf) for both friend and foe, treating all alike with humility, gentleness and long-suffering;

47. These first 'ten commandments' correspond to the "indispensable" aspect of the robe of God-fearing. What follows represents the pearls of cultivated virtue, which adorn those more spiritual whose "treasures are in Heaven."

48. Cf. Qur. 82: 10–13.

49. The second clause is added only in E (and those sources based on it) and C.

50. Not included in any of the major collections of ḥadīth, but compare the saying of Abū Dardā': "Lend from your self/honor for the day of your need." Though it may connote 'honor' (ḥasab, sharaf), 'ird' is a synonym of naḥs (self); hence, Abū Dardā''s maxim is similar to the lines following.

51. From this point I have translated the continuous series of recommended virtues as imperatives (although the author does not actually begin using the imperative mode until later).

Overlook the misstep of Brethren;

Do not go into the disputes that broke out among the Companions [of the Prophet] and the great ones of the past;⁵²

Abandon the company of the heedless, except to call them to the Recollection of God or to mention His Name in their presence;

Refrain from becoming engrossed in the subject of the non-essential accidents (al-a'rāḍ) or in the Signs of God (āyāt al-Lāh);⁵³

Abstain from speaking evil of rulers⁵⁴ and of sinners in the Community of Muḥammad (May God bless and keep him!);

Renounce anger – except over violation of the Sacred things of God (maḥārim al-Lāh) – and relinquish malice and spite in your heart;

Pardon the one who has harmed you – that is, do not even defend yourself [from harm];⁵⁵

“Annul the inadvertent stumblings” of men of Virtue (ahl al-murū'ah = ‘gentlemen’), “those of Goodly-qualities” (dhawū l-hay'āt);⁵⁶

Maintain the protection of women (ahl al-sitr = ‘ladies’);

Revere Religious scholars (al-'ulāmā') and all people of Religion (ahl al-dīn);

Honor the aged;⁵⁷ and honor the ‘Honored one of the nation’ (karīmat al-qawm) – whoever that may be, whether Muslim or infidel – all of that in accordance with the Divine-legal statute as to how you should honor that personage;⁵⁸

Show ‘courtesy’ (ḥusn al-adab) toward God and toward everyone else – living or dead, present or absent;

Refute the slander against a Muslim’s reputation;

Beware of much talking, affectation and bragging – for, truly, much talk leads to a fall;

But have due respect for the great, kindness for the weak, and mercy for him of little stature – seeking out those who are needy to share your possessions with them by means of charitable donation and gift;

52. This is found only in E and C and, indeed, a similar dictum is given below (at n. 74).

53. The accidents are unintelligible in their phenomenal nature and the Signs of God are inscrutable as noumena.

54. “Of rulers”: only in E and C.

55. Only he who does not resist evil can sincerely pardon it, because he has not personally interacted with it.

56. An allusion to the ḥadīth, “Annul the inadvertent stumblings of those of goodly qualities” (see Musnad Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal [Cairo, 1894–6], vol. VI, p. 181; and Sunan Abī Dā'ūd [Cairo, 1950], vol. IV, p. 189, no. 4).

57. Cf. ibid., p. 361, no. 23: “Part of the honoring (ijlāl) of God is the honoring (ikrām) of the aged.”

58. The reference, I think, is to the de facto ruler of the land (who, in Crusader times, might well be a Christian or an Ismā'īlī).

Be easy-going in your speech and guidance,⁵⁹ and entertain the guest;

Disseminate peace and long life [in your social greetings] to people, pursuant to the Divine-legal statute, and be not one who curses and defames, finds fault and loudly scolds;

Requite no one with evil though you be in your right, except by way of doing good (iḥsān^{an});⁶⁰

Give “sincere counsel (al-naṣīḥah) for the sake of God, His Messenger and the leaders of the Muslims and their common people”;⁶¹

Do not look for misfortunes for anyone, and curse no one – specifically, one of God’s Servants [i.e., any human being] – whether living or dead. For you cannot know what will be the end of the infidel who is still living, nor [do you know] what was the end of the departed [if he was not an unbeliever].⁶²

Do not condemn any of those addicted to carnal appetites (al-shahawāt) for their lusts;

Do not urge leadership (al-riyāsah) upon anyone;

Do not hold down your children to serve your own interests;

Beware lest you let people ‘urinate’ in your ear by passing on to you what you will be sorry to hear about yourself or another;⁶³

And, certainly, you should love the Believers, all of them – those who do you harm and those who are good to you – because of their love of God and His Messenger. Do not despise them on account of their contempt for you or anyone else other than God and His Messenger. This I was advised by the Messenger of God (May God bless and keep him!) in a Dream (al-manām) concerning someone [namely, Abū ‘Abd al-Lāh al-Ṭarṭūsī] who had slandered my Master [Abū Madyan] so that I became angry with him.⁶⁴ Then I saw the Messenger of God (May God bless and keep him!) in the Dream, and he asked me:

59. Or perhaps this word should go with the following clause: ‘Guide and entertain the travelling guest.’

60. Maḥmūd cites Qur. 41: 34 in this connection.

61. This is part of a well-known ḥadīth (recorded by both al-Bukhārī and Muslim) which identifies ‘sincere counsel’ as the very essence of religion (see A. J. Wensinck, et al., Concordance et indices de la tradition musulmane [Leiden, 1936–69], s.v. naṣīḥah, for references to this and related traditions). Addas points out that Ibn al-‘Arabī has discussed this ḥadīth at length in the Futūḥāt (IV, 468–70).

62. The unbeliever who is still alive may repent before his death, and even a professed Muslim who has died may not have his belief accepted by God. (One can be sure only of the fate of unbelievers who have died). This passage can be read otherwise, however, by taking the mention of the infidel’s end (mā yakhtimu la-hu) as a reference to Qur. 2: 7, et al., where it is said of the unbelievers that “God has sealed (khatama) their hearts,” etc.

63. Some sources read: “What will delight you to hear.”

64. We are told the identities of those concerned in Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Al-Durrah al-fākhirah (MS. Esad Ef. 1777, “Why are you angry with So-and-so?” “Because of his anger,” I answered, “and his slandering my Master.”

Then he said (Peace be upon him!): “Do you not know that he loves God and he loves me?” I answered, “Yes, of course.”

“Then why do you not love him for his love of me,” he asked, “when you are angry with him because of his anger for your Master?” “O Messenger of God,” I replied, “from this very moment I will do so! There is no better Teacher (mu‘allim) than you, who have called my attention to something of which I had been forgetful.”

Take no joy in a reputation flattering to yourself spreading among the general public, even if you deserve it. For you never know – will it remain with you or be stripped from you?⁶⁵

Do not set yourself apart from the Believers by a praiseworthy, extraordinary Virtue (khulq gharīb maḥmūd) distinguished from you, except you be counted among those who merely seek to emulate that Virtue.⁶⁶

Do not put on a display of humility (al-khushū‘) in your outward behavior (zāhiru-ka) by casting yourself supine on the ground, unless you are really so disposed in your Inner being (bātinu-ka).

Desire not vain increase (al-takaththur) from the World.

Care nothing for the ignorance of him who does not know your worth; rather, it is not seemly that there be any sense of your worth even in your own eyes.

Have no desire that people should listen to your speech.

Be not anxious⁶⁷ to give answer to anything displeasing said about you.

Be patient ‘with’ the Real and ‘along with’ the Real:⁶⁸ “And be patient⁶⁹ along with those who call upon their Lord, morning and evening, seeking His Face. Do not look beyond them, desiring the adornment of the life of this World (zīnat al-ḥayāh

f. 105, translated by Ralph W. J. Austin in Sufis of Andalusia [London, 1971], p. 155), and in the Futūḥāt (IV, 498, ll. 27–33seq.) we learn that the episode took place in Tlemcen in 1194.

65. As a coat of arms is stripped from a fallen enemy.

66. That is, your ‘genius’ is the “virtue” (khulq: ‘natural disposition; moral characteristic’), not yourself.

67. Lā tajza‘u. The verb is the contrary of iṣbir (“be patient”) in the next line.

68. Wa-ṣbir li-l-Ḥaqqi wa-ma‘a l-Ḥaqqi. The first verbal phrase has ‘with’ (li-) in the sense of against: ‘withstand, endure’; and the second is its contrary: ‘along with’ (ma‘a). Thus, the Divine reality is to be viewed as both ‘Agent’ and ‘Patient’ of the trials of life requiring endurance – both “those who call” for help and their “Lord” to Whom they appeal in the verse following.

69. Wa-ṣbir nafsa-ka. The object here is actually redundant, being implicit in all intransitive usages of this verb. Moreover, God is the implicit cause of the afflictions requiring the soul’s patience, as we may see in ‘Amr b. ‘Uthmān’s definition of ṣabara (quoted by Lane): “to maintain patience with/against God and to receive His trials with an unstrained mind” (Lexicon, s.v.).

al-dunyā), and obey not him whose heart We have made heedless of Our Remembrance, who follows his pleasure and whose affair is lost.⁷⁰ Say: 'The Real/Truth is from your Lord!' So, whoever will, may he believe; and whosoever will, let him disbelieve."⁷¹

Be equitable in the face of [the demands of] your lower-soul, but do not demand equity from anyone else in regard to your own right.

Greet Muslims in the first place; and return the greeting of Peace upon whomever greets you – loud enough that he can hear.

Be careful not to speak evil of the wealthy when they are niggardly or of worldly people when they vie with each other in the World, and do not covet what they have.

Invoke God in favor of the rulers and those in authority, not against them, even when they are oppressive.

Strive against your lower-soul and your passion, for, truly, it is your greatest enemy.⁷²

Do not sit much in the market-streets, nor even stroll therein.

Forbear presenting your [complaint of] damage to the Religious authorities (a'immat al-dīn), and do not even bear testimony against the people of the Qiblah (viz., Muslims) in anything that may lead the hearer thereof to depart from the Community.⁷³

Hold back from going into what was disputed among the Companions [of the Prophet] – indeed, regarding [anything having to do with the condition of] the dead, "for they have reached what they sent ahead".⁷⁴

Abandon him who is a hypocrite (al-murā') with regard to [faith in] the Qur'ān and Predestination (al-qadar).⁷⁵

70. Qur. 18: 28. The ostensible purpose for quoting this verse in this context is the mention of zīnah (adornment; clothing). The adornment of this world are pleasures (ahwā'), while the 'Adornment of God' is the saving grace of His Remembrance (dhikr), made manifest within in the moral teachings which are the subject of this portion of the Nasab.

71. Qur. 18: 29. "The Real/Truth is from your Lord": Al-ḥaqq min Rabbi-kum. That is, while we are to be patient "along with" those who believe and "call upon their Lord" through the trials of life, we are also to remind ourselves that the reality of our suffering has its true source in God, and we are, thus, to be patient with/against Him as the Lord even as we are along with Him in the company of His servants.

72. The 'greater jihād' is the struggle of one's true, higher self and intellect ('aql) against the lower-self (nafs) and passion (hawā').

73. That is, to turn away from the qiblah (the direction of Mecca, which all Muslims face in prayer).

74. Fa-anna-hum afdaw ilā mā qaddamū. This is a quote from a ḥadīth which begins: "Do not revile the dead..." (see al-Bukhārī, Al-Jāmi' al-ṣaḥīḥ, 23: 97 and 81: 42; and Musnad, VI, 180, et al.). The point is that all we can really know about the state of the Afterlife (mā ba'd al-mawt) is that it is determined by our actions in this life. And it was precisely such matters as eschatology and the Hereafter on which the Companions did not always agree.

75. That is, faith in the eternity (uncreatedness) of the Qur'ān as the Speech of God and in predestination as a sixth tenet of Islam (after belief in God, His angels, His books, His prophets, and the Resurrection of the body).

Avoid the company of sectarians and innovators (ahl al-ahwā' wa-l-bida') pernicious to Religion and secular authority (al-dīn wa-l-mulk).⁷⁶

You must expel greed, envy and vanity from your heart when you give free rein to these qualities in other than their legitimate places (al-mawāṭin al-mashrū'ah).⁷⁷

You must enter into the company of people (al-jamā'ah), for 'the wolf eats none but the stray [sheep]'.⁷⁸

Beware of haste in your affairs, except in five things: in Prayer, to begin at the right time; in undertaking the Pilgrimage as soon as you are able; in giving food to guests before beginning conversation; in preparation of the dead for burial; and the marrying-off of the virgin as soon as she reaches maturity.

Exert every effort in the sincere counsel (naṣḥ) of God's Servants – whether Muslim, infidel or polytheist – with knowledge and practical advice.⁷⁹

Cut off the causes/opportunities of carelessness [in matters of formal Religion], and uphold the performance of [the five daily] Prayers and the perfection of their ritual form.

Carry out a reckoning (al-ḥisbah) upon the lower-soul [before you are called to the Reckoning].⁸⁰

Depart from ignorance in the pursuit of Knowledge: And [an instance of that is] that you have the best intentions towards anyone pursuing Knowledge; and regret any neglect in putting those intentions to good use.⁸¹

Shun passions and the Abode of Illusion (dār al-ghurūr) [= this World].⁸²

Believe that the lower-soul (al-naḥs) is loathsome, for the lower-soul – in the belief of the People of God – is every objectionable thought/inclination (khāṭir madhmūm).

Oppose acts of injustice;

Improve your eating habits;⁸³

76. The last word is read as mulūk (kings), milk (property), and milal (minority religious communities) by the various sources, and is omitted by others.

77. Greed for knowledge, envy of the virtuous and pride in accomplishment may not always be wrong.

78. 'Ilm wa-siyāsah. From this point on in the series, the 'praiseworthy morals' (akhlāq maḥmūdah) are no longer phrased as imperatives in the Arabic, though I have continued to render them as such for stylistic reasons.

79. As Maḥmūd suggests, this could be reminiscent of the ḥadīth, "Call your selves to reckoning before you are called to the Reckoning" (Ṣaḥīḥ al-Tirmidhī [Cairo, 1931], 35: 25).

80. Like Jesus, Ibn al-'Arabī often takes a general moral platitude and expands upon it in provocative new ways.

81. An allusion to Qur. 57: 20, describing the life of this world.

82. Ṭī'mah: 'one's manner of eating'. To be ṭayyib al-ṭī'mah is to be careful to eat only what is lawful (see Lexicon, s.v. ṭī'mah). In a tradition (quoted by Maḥmūd), the Prophet told a companion that if he Strive to reconcile discord⁸³ – for God will bring together His Servants on the Day of Resurrection;

Drop suspicion [of people], but always be cautious;

And have fear and anxiety (al-khashiyah wa-l-hamm) only with respect to [the Judgment of] God.

And have love and hate (al-hubb wa-l-bughd) for the sake of Him, loving affection (al-mawaddah) for the Family of God's Messenger – May God bless and keep him! – and friendship (al-muwālāh) for the Righteous.

Weep much [for the love of God];

Implore God and supplicate Him, night and day;

Flee from the path of leisurely comforts;

Humble yourself in every circumstance (hāl) before God – Be He exalted!;

Watch out for inordinate sadness and spoiling life by mulling over the debt you owe the Benefactor (shukr al-Mun'im) for all that He has bestowed upon you.

Aspire to God in every circumstance you are in;

Help each other to Piety and Fear of God (al-birr wa-l-taqwā);

[Answer the call of the Summoner (ijābat al-dā'ī)];⁸⁴

Support the oppressed (nuṣrat al-maẓlūm) and answer the one who calls out for help;⁸⁵

Aid the one who is grieving and dispel the sorrow of the sorrowful;

Fast by day and rise to pray at night – and if it be to spend the whole night in prayer (al-tahajjud), that is better.

Commemorate the dead and undertake to visit their graves, but do not use evil speech (hujr) while you are there.⁸⁶

Give your blessing to funeral processions and follow in them – in the forefront if you are on foot, and at the rear if you are riding.

Stroke the heads of orphans,⁸⁷ visit the sick, dispense free-will offerings of charity improved his eating habits his prayer would be answered. We could also read tu'mah (means of subsistence; manner of gain, livelihood).

83. Cf. Qur. 8: 1 and 49: 9–10.

84. Only in E and C (the first of which evinces Imāmīte sympathies).

85. The Egyptian editor of C opines that this applies to the obligation to help Muslim countries under attack by infidels.

86. The last clause is omitted in E. Hujr here probably refers to some kind of tabu language related to pagan superstitions concerning supplication of the dead. As we may infer from many traditions cited by Wensinck (see A Handbook of Early Muhammadan Tradition [rep., Leiden, 1971], s.v. grave[s]), visiting cemeteries was at first prohibited by Islamic law, but later allowed.

87. Cf. Musnad, II, 263 & 287 and V, 250.

[to the poor] (al-ṣadaqāt), and love those who are good (ahl al-khayr).⁸⁸

Continuously remember [the Names of God] and fear [Him] (dawām al-dhikr wa-l-murāqabah).⁸⁹

Have your soul keep strict account of its actions (muḥāsabat al-nafs ‘alā l-af‘āl), external and internal.

Become intimately familiar with the Speech of God [viz., the Qur’ān] (uns bi-kalām al-Lāh).

Take wisdom (al-ḥikmah) from the words of every speaker – indeed, from your observation of everything seen.

Bear patiently with God’s Judgments (aḥkām al-Lāh) – for, verily, you are before His Eye (bi-‘ayni-hi), as He has declared to you: “Wait patiently for your Lord’s Judgment, for, indeed, you are before Our Eyes.”⁹⁰

Give preference/your whole attention to the Command/Affair of God (al-uthrah li-amr al-Lāh),⁹¹ and resist [turning to] every secondary cause brought close (sabab muqarrab) to Him.⁹²

Use all of your strength (tāqah) to satisfy the ‘conditions’ of God’s Love and His Acceptance (maḥābb al-Lāh wa-marādī-hi).⁹³

Be content with [God’s] Decree (al-qadā’) – not necessarily with each thing decreed (al-maqḍī), but, rather, with its Decree itself⁹⁴ – and receive with joy whatever may come from Him (Be He exalted!).⁹⁵

88. That is, treat all for the best according to their circumstances.

89. Murāqabah means to ‘observe carefully, watch out for, keep an eye on’, but the undertood object is God, not the heart (as is frequently assumed by westerners); so, unless otherwise qualified, the expression should best be translated as ‘fear of God’ in the sense of constant watchfulness.

90. Qur. 52: 48. The verse actually applied specifically to Muḥammad.

91. C alone reads īthār, which is a synonym of uthrah. Athira li-l-amri: ‘He gave his whole attention to the matter to the exclusion of all other things’ (see Lexicon, s.v. athira, uthrah and atharah). The double entendre seems to comprise both meanings: ‘Give the first choice in any matter to the Command of God’; ‘Give your whole attention to the Affair of God’.

92. Compare this with a similar counsel among the first ten listed above. It would be equally plausible to read the last clause (as Addas has): ‘Inquire into everything that might bring you closer to God’.

93. Maḥābb is the plural of maḥabbah in the sense of ‘something which causes love’; while marād ⁱⁿ is the plural of marḍāh (something that causes/occasions satisfaction).

94. Maḥmūd indicates that this is the subject of one of the masā’il (questions) in Ibn al-‘Arabī’s book of that title (edited by him on the basis of an Azhar manuscript under the title of Al-Tanazzulāt al-layliyah [Cairo, 1987], p. 28, no. 46), which may also be found in the Futūḥāt (I, 45, ll. 26–7); and Addas points out that the same idea is treated in the context of Job’s patience in the Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam (see R. W. J. Austin, trans., The Bezels of Wisdom [New York, 1971], pp. 216–17).

95. It is very hard to see how this does not contradict the preceding clause: Does not the “thing decreed” proceed directly from the Divine “Decree” itself? But inasmuch as different conditioned resolutions may result from a transcendent imperative, some, of course, will be preferable to others.

Be the Friend/Partisan of the Real (muwālāt al-Ḥaqq) in being with Him always – ‘for He is with His Servants wherever they may be’⁹⁶ – and turn with the Real wheresoever He may turn;⁹⁷

And rid yourself of falsehood (al-bāṭil).⁹⁸

Be patient in times of trial;

Be abstemious even regarding what is lawful;

Concern yourself with what is most important at the time;

Seek Paradise with all longing for its being the place where you will see the Real (maḥall ru’at al-Ḥaqq);

Keep company respectfully with those undergoing tribulation; converse with the poor, sitting down with them in their humble quarters; and give assistance to him whose condition demands that you assist him.

Be of sound heart (salāmat al-ṣadr);

Pray for the Believers in secret, and serve the Poor [in spirit] (al-fuqarā’).⁹⁹

Be for other people and against your self, for it is when you are against it that you are really for it.¹⁰⁰

Take joy in the goodness of the Community (ṣalāḥ al-ummah), and be sad at its corruption (fasādu-hā).

Give priority to the one to whom God (Exalted be He!) and His Messenger have given priority in that [degree to which] he has been given priority; and hold back the one whom God and His Messenger have held back inasmuch as he has been held back.¹⁰¹

Now if you have ‘put on’ these [foregoing] Vestments (al-malābis), then it is permissible for you to be seated in the forefront of the Assemblies before God (al-majālīs ‘inda l-Lāh) – Be He exalted! – and be among the People of the First Ranks (ahl al-ṣufūf al-uwal),¹⁰² for this is the vestiture of those who fear God (malābis ahl al-taqwā), which 96. A paraphrase of Qur. 58: 7 (cf. also 57: 4).

97. The final clause is only in E and C.

98. Cf. Qur. 17: 81: “Say: ‘The Real has come and falsehood has passed away!’ Truly, falsehood was ever passing away.” The present dictum and the one preceding it may be understood in the light of Qur. 55: 26–7: “All that dwells on the earth is passing away (fān ⁱⁿ); but the Face of your Lord shall remain (yabqā)...”

99. Or else the believers, having means, might repay you; while the “poor” (viz., the Ṣūfīs) have nothing with which to recompense you but their prayers, so your reward will be in Heaven (cf. Luke 14: 12–14 and Matt. 6: 5–6).

100. Cf. Matt. 16: 24–5 and John 12: 25.

101. Addas indicates that Ibn al-‘Arabī often makes this point, particularly when enjoining the (Zāhirite) principle of following the literal order of enumerations figuring in the Scripture (see Futūḥāt, I, 560, ll. 21 seq.).

102. Cf. Qur. 18: 48. In a canonical tradition the “first ranks” are said to be formed by angels in the presence of God (see Concordance, III, 323, l. 29).

is the “Best Vestment”.¹⁰³ Strive, therefore, to make this your clothing – or, at least, most of it – for [the Initiate-Ṣūfīs are] all in the state of [God-fearing]. In it Shaqīq of Balkh,¹⁰⁴ for instance, invested the likes of Ḥātim ‘the Hard-of-hearing’ (al-Aṣamm).¹⁰⁵ He was not really deaf, you know, but a certain woman came to speak with him one day and [as she was about to ask a question] some wind suddenly broke from her – that is, she farted. The poor woman was mortified before the Shaykh, of course, but he simply called out to her, as if she had just said something to him, “Speak louder, please!” – pretending that he had not heard [her fart]. So her shame was relieved as she said to herself, “He didn’t hear me.” And, thus, he was known as Ḥātim the Hard-of-hearing.¹⁰⁶

[All of the Ṣūfīs] have proceeded in accordance with such Moral qualities as these, that being their vestiture and their ornament (libāsu-hum wa-ḥilyatu-hum). And I, too, have ‘put on’ such vestiture, and I have invested whom I have invested¹⁰⁷ accordingly, for God’s sake – praised be He for that!¹⁰⁸

[The Qādirite Investiture]

I HEREBY INVEST YOU by my own hand with [the Mantle of Initiation as a sign] of Companionship and Moral instruction, O my saintly Friend, Muwaffaq al-Dīn Aḥmad b. ‘Alī b. Aḥmad al-‘Absī of Seville.¹⁰⁹ I myself was invested with the Mantle at the hand of the Master, Jamāl al-Dīn Yūnus b. Yaḥyá b. Abī l-Ḥasan al-‘Abbāsī al-Qaṣṣār,¹¹⁰ in the Sacred Precincts of Mecca [in 1202–03], before the Sublime Ka’bah. Yūnus had 103. That is, fear of God is the “best vestment” (see above, before n. 30).

104. Abū ‘Alī Shaqīq b. Ibrāhīm al-Balkhī (d. 809), a disciple of Ibrāhīm Ibn Ad’ham (see at nn. 139–40).

105. Abū ‘Abd al-Raḥmān Ḥātim al-Aṣamm (d. 851), also from Balkh in Khurāsān.

106. In his Tadhkirat al-awliyā’ Farīd al-Dīn al-‘Attār adds that for fifteen years, as long as the woman remained alive, Ḥātim continued to feign deafness so that no one would tell her that he really could hear (see A. J. Arberry, trans., Muslim Saints and Mystics [London, 1966], p. 150).

107. “I...have put on” (labistu): ‘I have been invested with/dressed in the mantle of initiation’; “I have invested” (albastu): ‘I have attired (someone)/passed on the mantle of initiation.’ From here on I will translate these verbs according to their technical connotations.

108. C ends at this point.

109. I have been unable to obtain further information on this person. He is thus named as the addressee of the Nasab in most of the extant manuscripts (but another name, given by Addas, is substituted in those sources based on E). Conceivably he is related (a grandson?) to the Aḥmad al-Ishbīlī portrayed in the R. Rūḥ al-quḍḥ as a childhood neighbor and friend of Ibn al-‘Arabī, who later died in Egypt (see Sufis of Andalusia, pp. 91–5, no. 10).

110. D. 1211. Addas notes that he was a well-known Qādirite muḥaddith from Baghdad, under whom Ibn al-‘Arabī studied traditions in Mecca (see “La Filiation spirituelle,” p. 41, n. 123, for references). This was actually the third time Ibn al-‘Arabī had received the mantle.

received it from the Master of the Age, ‘Abd al-Qādir b. Abī Ṣāliḥ b. ‘Abd al-Lāh al-Jīlī,¹¹¹ who received it from Abū Sa‘īd al-Mubārak b. ‘Alī al-Mukharrimī,¹¹² who, in turn, had it from Abū l-Ḥasan ‘Alī al-Hakkārī,¹¹³ who had it from Abū l-Faraj al-Ṭarsūsī,¹¹⁴ who had it from Abū l-Faḍl ‘Abd al-Wāḥid al-Tamīmī,¹¹⁵ who had it from Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Jaḥdar al-Shiblī,¹¹⁶ who was a companion of (ṣaḥība) Abū l-Qāsim al-Junayd,¹¹⁷ whose moral instruction he followed (ta’addaba bi-hi).

Al-Junayd, in turn, was the companion of his maternal uncle, Sarī al-Saqaṭī,¹¹⁸ whose moral instruction he followed, as Sarī had been the companion of Ma‘rūf al-Karkhī,¹¹⁹ whose moral instruction he followed. Similarly, Ma‘rūf accompanied and followed ‘Alī [al-Riḍā],¹²⁰ who accompanied and followed his father, Mūsā [al-Kāẓim],¹²¹ who accompanied and followed his father, Ja‘far [al-Ṣādiq],¹²² who accompanied and followed his father, Muḥammad [al-Bāqir],¹²³ who accompanied and followed his father, ‘Alī [Zayn al-‘Ābidīn],¹²⁴ who accompanied and followed his father, al-Ḥusayn b. ‘Alī,¹²⁵ who accompanied and followed both his grandfather, Muḥammad, the Messenger of God (May God bless and keep him!), and his father, ‘Alī b. Abī Ṭālib,¹²⁶ who also accompanied and followed the Messenger of God.

111. Known best as ‘Abd al-Qādir al-Jīlānī, in whose name the Qādirīyah order of Ṣūfism was founded. He died in Baghdad in 1166 (one year after the birth of Ibn al-‘Arabī).

112. Ḥanbalite legal scholar, judge and head of a law school in Baghdad (d. 1119).

113. ‘Alī b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Qurashī al-Hakkārī (fl. late 11th century). The nisbah is Kurdish, related to the region south of Lake Van. Addas supposes him to be the same individual listed in the second khirqah, below, as the initiator of Ibn Khafīf (d. 982; see at n. 134, infra; and Quest, pp. 316–17), but that would hardly be chronologically possible.

114. I have not been able to further identify this individual. His surname relates him to Tarsus in Cilicia.

115. ‘Abd al-Wāḥid b. ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Tamīmī (d. circa 1011–19), a Ḥanbalite scholar of Baghdad (see Louis Massignon, The Passion of al-Ḥallāj [rep., Princeton, 1982], vol. II, p. 135).

116. See n. 40, above. One source inserts at this point: “Down to here the [formal] investiture of the mantle (libās) extends, and what follows is [informal] companionship (ṣuḥbah) only” – which, indeed, seems to be the case.

117. D. 910 in Baghdad. For an account of al-Shiblī’s apprenticeship to al-Junayd, see Muslim Saints and Mystics, pp. 278–9.

118. Abū l-Ḥasan Sarī b. al-Mughallis al-Saqaṭī of Baghdad (d. 867).

119. Abū Maḥfūẓ Ma‘rūf b. Fayrūz al-Karkhī of Baghdad (d. 815).

120. Abū l-Ḥasan ‘Alī b. Mūsā al-Riḍā (d. 818), the eighth Shī‘ite imām. The legend that had Ma‘rūf converted to Islam by ‘Alī al-Riḍā is generally rejected by modern scholarship. He was more credibly said to have been the disciple of Dā‘ūd al-Ṭā‘ī (d. circa 782).

121. Abū l-Ḥasan Mūsā b. Ja‘far al-Kāẓim (d. 799), the seventh imām.

122. Abū ‘Abd al-Lāh Ja‘far b. Muḥammad al-Ṣādiq (d. 765), the celebrated sixth imām.

123. Abū Ja‘far Muḥammad b. ‘Alī al-Bāqir (d. 735), the fifth imām.

124. Abū Muḥammad ‘Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, known as Zayn al-‘Ābidīn (the ornament of the worshippers), the fourth imām (d. 712–13).

125. The third imām (after his elder brother, al-Ḥasan), who was martyred at Karbalā on ‘Āshūrā’ in 680.

126. The cousin of the Prophet and husband of his daughter, Fāṭimah, the fourth and last Rightly-guided

And Muḥammad ‘took from’ the Angel Gabriel (Upon him be peace!), and Gabriel ‘took from’ God (Be He exalted!). I asked Shaykh Yūnus: “What did [Muḥammad/Gabriel] ‘take’ from [Gabriel/God]?” and he replied: “I asked Shaykh ‘Abd al-Qādir [that same question] – or, it was asked of him – and he declared: ‘He took from Him Knowledge and Moral instruction (al-‘ilm wa-l-adab).’ ”

[The Maḥmūdite Investiture]

LIKEWISE, I hereby invest you, also, with the Mantle which I received (in the city of Fez at the Azhar Mosque in the quarter of the Horse Well in 593 [= 1197])¹²⁷ at the hand of Abū ‘Abd al-Lāh Muḥammad b. Qāsim b. ‘Abd al-Raḥmān b. ‘Abd al-Karīm al-Tamīmī¹²⁸ of Fez and from Taqī al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān b. ‘Alī b. Maymūn b. Ābb al-Tawzarī of Egypt.¹²⁹ Both of them told me that they received the Mantle from Abū l-Faṭḥ Maḥmūd b. Aḥmad b. Maḥmūd al-Maḥmūdī,¹³⁰ who received it from Abū l-Ḥasan ‘Alī b. Muḥammad of Basra,¹³¹ who had it from Abū l-Faṭḥ b. Shaykh al-shuyūkh,¹³² who had it from Abū Ishāq b. Shahriyār al-Murshidī,¹³³ who had it from caliph and first Shī‘ite imām, who was murdered in Kufa in 661.

127. This information is supplied only in E, and it may well be a false interpolation by the copyist, since the same place and date is mentioned in the Futūḥāt (II, 486, ll. 23–4; IV, 503, ll. 23–5; and I, 491, l. 7), as Addas points out.

128. D. 1206. He was the sometime imām of the Azhar Mosque in Fez (see ibid., IV, 503 [23–5]), all of whose writings Ibn al-‘Arabī studied, according to his declaration in the Ijāzah li-l-Malik al-Muẓaffar (A. R. Badawī, ed., “Autobibliografía”, in Al-Andalus, 20 [1955], p. 120). He also received traditions from him – Prophetary ḥadīth and akhbār of Ṣūfīs of Fez (see Futūḥāt, IV, 541 [22–3] & 549 [25–6]) – which al-Tamīmī collected from many teachers over a fifteen-year tour of the East (see Ibn al-Abbār, Al-Takmilah li-Kitāb al-Ṣilah [Madrid, 1886], vol. I, pp. 374–5, no. 1064). Ibn al-Abbār, by the way, did not have a favorable opinion of al-Tamīmī’s accuracy as a transmitter, accusing him of publishing “conjectures and errors” (awḥām wa-aghlat).

129. Al-Miṣrī is found only in al-Ghimārī’s text (see n. 5; and cf. n. 147), who also asserts that this investiture took place in 1190. Addas shows that al-Tawzarī is the ‘Abd al-Raḥmān b. ‘Alī...b. Maymūn...al-Qaṣṭallānī treated briefly by Ibn al-Abbār (in ibid., vol. II, p. 591, no. 1654), and gives some further particulars about his family (which hailed from Tozeur/Qaṣṭīliyah in southern Tunisia) in Quest, p. 143 (and nn. 42–4). The only other occasion known to me that Ibn al-‘Arabī mentions him, in Futūḥāt, I, 186–7 (translated below, n. 147) brings up a whole other problem which is outlined in Quest, pp. 144–5, but which need not concern us at this time.

130. Or: Abū l-Ḥasan b. Aḥmad Faṭḥ Maḥmūd al-Maḥmūdī (see The Passion of al-Ḥallāj, vol. II, p. 477).

131. I have not verified the identities of this or the next individual listed.

132. The office of shaykh al-shuyūkh was ostensibly in charge of the general superintendence of Ṣūfī convents for a particular city or region (see ibid., vol. I, p. 44, for an interesting case).

133. Or: Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm al-Murshid b. Shahriyār al-Kāzarūnī (d. 1033), founder of the Kāzarūnīyah/Murshidīyah order in Fars. He was a descendent of Salmān al-Fārisī, and, according to Massignon, his khirqah extended to Salmān as well as Uways (see ibid., vol. II, pp. 186–7).

Ḥasan or Ḥusayn al-Akkār,¹³⁴ who had it from Abū ‘Abd al-Lāh Ibn Khafīf,¹³⁵ who was the companion of Ja‘far al-Ḥadhdhā’.¹³⁶

Al-Ḥadhdhā’, in turn, was the companion of his master, Abū ‘Amr al-Iṣṭakhrī,¹³⁷ who was the companion of his master, Abū Turāb al-Nakhshabī,¹³⁸ who accompanied his master, Shaqīq of Balkh,¹³⁹ who accompanied his master, Ibrāhīm Ibn Ad’ham,¹⁴⁰ who accompanied Mūsā b. Zayd al-Rā‘ī,¹⁴¹ who accompanied Uways al-Qaranī,¹⁴² who accompanied ‘Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb¹⁴³ and ‘Alī b. Abī Ṭālib,¹⁴⁴ who both accompanied the Messenger of God (May God bless and keep him!).

[The Khaḍirite Investiture]

LIKEWISE, I invest you, also, with the Mantle which I received at the hand of Abū l-Ḥasan ‘Alī b. ‘Abd al-Lāh Ibn Jāmi’¹⁴⁵ (in his garden in al-Miqlā, on the outskirts of Mosul, in the year 601 [= 1204–05]).¹⁴⁶ Ibn Jāmi’ had been the companion of al-Khaḍir (Peace be upon him!), whose Moral instruction he followed and from whom he acquired 134. Thus in all of the sources. He is Abū ‘Alī Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad b. al-Akkār (or: ‘Akkār) Bāzyār Firūzābādī al-Jūrī (d. 1001; see ibid.). Cf. n. 113.

135. See n. 41, above; and ibid., pp. 182–6 et seq. Ibn Khafīf was also said to have received the mantle of Ruwaym b. Aḥmad (d. 915).

136. D. 952. The name (meaning ‘the cobbler’) is given thus in most of the Nasab sources, but it was also frequently spelled al-Ḥaddā’ (the cameleer).

137. The name is thus in most sources, but the correct reading is perhaps Abū ‘Umar – in which case the reference could be to the son of ‘Umar b. Shallūyah al-Iṣṭakhrī (see ibid., p. 110, n. 17).

138. D. 859. He was a celebrated exponent of tawakkal (trust in God), who was devoured by lions in the desert.

139. See n. 104.

140. Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm b. Ad’ham al-Tamīmī al-‘Ijlī of Balkh (d. circa 782), who left Khurāsān for Syria.

141. I have not been able to identify this individual, whose surname means ‘the shepherd’. We might speculate that the name is a confabulation inspired by the early precedent of Abū Ḥalīm b. Salīm al-Rā‘ī, who was a companion of Salmān al-Fārisī and who, according to al-Hujwīrī, was renowned for performing a miracle like that of Moses in Qur. 7: 160 (see R. A. Nicholson, trans., The Kashf al-Maḥjūb [London, 1936], pp. 90–1).

142. Uways b. ‘Āmir b. Jaz’ b. Mālīk al-Qaranī of Yemen (d. after 657), the very type of the independent, ‘masterless’ walī.

143. The second Rightly-guided caliph, who was assassinated in 644.

144. See n. 126. Actually, according to legend, it was ‘Umar and ‘Alī who sought the company of Uways in Yemen (see my paper, “The Uwaysī Spirit of Autodidactic Sainthood as the Breath of the Merciful,” forthcoming in this journal).

145. He was a disciple of ‘Alī al-Mutawakkil and of the well-known Ṣūfī, Abū ‘Abd al-Lāh Qaḍīb al-Bān (see n. 147).

146. This and the parenthetic statement at the end of the paragraph are found only in E, and they may have been added by the copyist on the basis of the material found in Futūḥāt, I, 187 [1–3] (see next note).

Knowledge. (On the same spot that Ibn Jāmi' donned the Mantle he invested me with it, and in the exact same manner – without addition or omission).¹⁴⁷

[A Fourth Investiture]

SIMILARLY, I myself had also been the companion of al-Khaḍir (Peace be upon him!), whose Moral instruction I followed and from whom I learned [by way of advice (waṣīyah) which he entrusted to me orally]¹⁴⁸ correct submission to the pronouncements of masters (al-taslīm li-maḡālāt al-shukūkh) – as to the letter [if not the spirit], 'from his mouth to my mouth'¹⁴⁹ – and other points of Knowledge.¹⁵⁰ (I have seen 147. Ibn al-'Arabī describes this investiture (signified by the placing of a small cotton cap) in his entry devoted to Ibn Jāmi' in the Durrah al-fākhirah (see Sufis of Andalusia, p. 157). In addition, the following account occurs in Futūḥāt, I, 186–7 (translated also by Henry Corbin in Creative Imagination in the Sūfism of Ibn 'Arabī [Princeton, 1969], pp. 64–5; and in Quest, pp. 145–6): "One of our shaykhs had consociated with al-Khaḍir. He was 'Alī b. 'Abd al-Lāh Ibn Jāmi' – a companion of 'Alī al-Mutawakkil and Abū 'Abd al-Lāh Qaḍīb al-Bān – who used to live in al-Miqlā, outside Mosul, in a garden he owned. Al-Khaḍir had invested him with the Mantle in the presence of Qaḍīb al-Bān, and the Shaykh, in turn, transmitted it to me in the very same place in his garden [but indoors, according to the Durrah description] and observing the same procedure that al-Khaḍir had used in his investiture of him. I had already received the Mantle of al-Khaḍir – but in a way quite different from this – at the hand of our companion, Taqī al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Alī b. Maymūn b. Ābb al-Tawzarī, who received it in Egypt from Ṣadr al-Dīn Ibn Ḥamawayh, the Shaykh al-shuyūkh [of Damascus (d. 1219)], whose grandfather, in turn, had it from al-Khaḍir.

"From that time onward I professed the Sūfī doctrine of the Mantle of Initiation (libās al-khirqah) and I invested other people with it, since I saw how al-Khaḍir had esteemed it. But before that I had not espoused the doctrine of the Mantle as it is generally known today. For, really, the Mantle with us [latter-day Sūfīs] is simply a symbol for Companionship, Moral instruction and 'Assimilation to the Divine Character-traits' (al-takhalluq) – for which reason no Vestiture going all the way back to the Messenger of God will be found but, rather, only Companionship and Moral instruction. And this is all that is meant by the 'Robe of God-fearing.'

"It is the custom among Masters of the spiritual States (aṣḡāb al-aḡwāl) that when they discern a deficiency in some matter in one of their companions and they want to perfect his State for him, the shaykh [mentally] becomes one with him (ittahāda bi-hi). Then, when he has done so, the shaykh takes the garment that he was wearing when he was in that State, removes it and casts it (afraqha-hu) on the man so that the [psychic power of the] State flows into him, perfecting him. That, then, is the 'Investiture' as it is known among us and transmitted by the Fully-realized (al-muḡaqqiqūn) among our shaykhs."

148. Only in E.

149. Naṣṣ^{an} min fi-hi ilā fīya. That is, submit to the rightful authorities externally even if they are wrong (unless, of course, it is a matter of Divine law), but reserve your internal assent, allowing al-Khaḍir to speak through your mouth, as it were, with the proper intent (cf. Luke 12:11–12). For a description of the circumstances in which al-Khaḍir gave this instruction to Ibn al-'Arabī in Seville in 1196, see Futūḥāt, I, 336–7, translated by Addas in Quest, pp. 63–4.

150. At this juncture all of the sources except for E (and those based on it) proceed to the sentence after the next, then conclude with the 'addendum'.

al-Khaḍir perform three miracles: I saw him walk on the water, ‘roll up’ the earth, and pray in the air).¹⁵¹

All of these [four above-mentioned Masters, along with al-Khaḍir] have authorized me to invest with the Mantle of Initiation whomever I will.¹⁵² Then may my Friend [Muwaffaq al-Dīn Aḥmad] (May God grant him success!) invest with this Mantle in this same Lineage whomever he will and whomsoever he like – young or old, male or female – of the Believers, in accordance with the above-mentioned condition.¹⁵³

God willing, I will now quote one of our poems on this Mantle and this special discipline:¹⁵⁴

151. In Futūḥāt, I, 186 (12–18), Ibn al-‘Arabī describes a memorable moonlit night on a boat in the harbor of Tunis when he saw al-Khaḍir walking to him on the water. After talking to the Shaykh in a mode of expression peculiar to him, al-Khaḍir saluted him and suddenly traversed the distance to a lighthouse over two miles away in two or three steps. This supernatural transport over space is what is meant by ‘rolling, or folding up the earth’. The story of al-Khaḍir’s praying in mid-air is recounted in ll.18–26 on the same page (both passages are translated by Austin in Sufis of Andalusia, pp. 27 & 28–9).

152. This and the last sentence of the preceding paragraph are only found in E.

153. This presumably refers to the general condition of moral fitness (summed up in the fear of God) stated at the conclusion of the list of counsels (“Now if you have put on these vestments...”), making one suited to join the Ṣūfī brotherhood. The original recension of the Nasab al-khirqah probably ended here.

154. The poem, minus the first verse, may be found in the Dīwān (p. 52, no. 129), where it is the first of 26 occasional pieces devoted to the subject of investiture. The metre is al-basīt.

[THE MANTLE OF GOD-FEARING]

Put on the Mantle, for Man's "Best Vestment" is God-fearing, which is the truest Religion and the strongest World.
 None fear God except every discerning one, chosen and guided, whom God has distinguished:
 He interrupts the night with Praise unto his Lord, bleary-eyed [from rising] in the darkest hours;
 He entreats: "My Master, O End-all of my hope, who but his Lord shall have Mercy on His slave?"
 God is much more Kind than this created Nature and Attribute; for if they call Him, He complies!¹⁵⁵
 Were it not for Him, earth would not break out in laughter with her flowers, nor reproving clouds overcome her.
 God it is Who prefers [that a thing come into being],
 God Who completes, balances and sets it in order.
 O Essence of Religion, You are All of Religion:
 Heaven is redolent with the fragrance of Your Name!¹⁵⁶

[Addendum]¹⁵⁷

There is no condition in the investiture of this Mantle, or Companionship, that it can only be received from one person. No one ever imposed such a condition. On the contrary, one Ṣūfī is known to have said that whoever wanted to see three-hundred men in one need only look at him, for he had been the companion of three-hundred masters and he had acquired a Moral quality (khulq) from each one. And just look at the Epistle [on Ṣūfism] by al-Qushayrī,¹⁵⁸ whenever he mentions any one of the Ṣūfīs – he hardly ever does so without saying that "he accompanied Such-a-one and

155. This line is garbled in the Dīwān. "Nature": sajīyah. "Attribute": na't. These are both 'creation' as the manifestation of the merciful Divine Essence.

156. The poem has only been included in those sources which are based on E.

157. I am not convinced that this would-be 'epilogue' is actually the work of Ibn al-'Arabī (for reasons which I will give in a later study).

158. The Risālah fī 'ilm al-taṣawwuf, by Abū l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karīm al-Qushayrī (d. 1074), is one of the standard manuals of Ṣūfism from the middle-classical period of consolidation. It has been translated by Richard Gramlich as Das Sendschreiben al-Qushayrīs über das Sufitum (Stuttgart, 1989).

Such-another.” Investiture of the Mantle is nothing but Companionship and Moral instruction, and that is unrestricted. But a group of ignorant ‘Şūfis’ (tā’ifat juhalā) having no knowledge has sprung up, and they imagine that a man may not receive investiture except from a single person. But no one ever said that before. God is the Giver of success! There is no Lord other than He.

“Ibn ‘Arabī: Le Livre de la filiation spirituelle” [Nasab al-khirqah]. Translated by Claude Addas. ‘Ayn al-Hayāt, 5, 1999. 44 pages.

The recent annotated French translation of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s K. Nasab al-khirqah by Claude Addas, entitled “Le Livre de la filiation spirituelle”, marks the culmination of that scholar’s committed study of this important work which began with an initial translation of it as part of her Master’s thesis (memoire de Maîtrise), submitted in 1980. With the publication of Addas’s revised doctoral dissertation, La Quête du soufre rouge, in 1989 some passages and other significant information gleaned from the Nasab was made available for the first time in any western language.¹ In the subsequent English version of her book (Quest, 1993) a schematic silsilah of the ‘Akbarian’ mantle was featured as an appendix (pp. 316–17) diagramming all four lines of master-initiators claimed by Ibn al-‘Arabī as his formal spiritual pedigree and detailed by him in the Nasab (and Futūḥāt al-makkīyah). With the appearance of “La Filiation spirituelle” (including critical introduction and a Note complémentaire on the hierurgy of Şūfī initiation by the translator’s esteemed father, Michel Chodkiewicz) the entire Nasab al-khirqah has finally become accessible to non-specialists, marking yet another milestone in Addas’s career of original scholarship.

The quality of translation is exemplary (a fine comprehension of the Arabic rendered lucidly in French), but the greatest asset of Addas, as I have observed elsewhere, is her extraordinary familiarity with an extensive range of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s writings, particularly the whole gargantuan corpus of the Meccan Revelations. An instance of this capacity for in-depth contextualizing may be appreciated in her note 71, where an obscure passage in the Nasab concerning the Prophet Muḥammad's perpetual chanting (taghann^m) of the Qur'ān is explicated by Addas with reference to descriptions in the Futūḥāt of the 'pentecostal' descent of the Scripture on the Prophet's followers, the awliyā', by whose tongues his blessed enunciation may be said to live on. Some of the translator's comments are less illuminating but illustrative, nonetheless; as when she points out (in n. 75) that Qur. 7: 32 ("the Adornment of God which He brings forth for His servants", quoted in the Nasab) is cited in the Futūḥāt (vol. I, p. 560, ll. 24seq.) as a proof-text in support of Ibn al-'Arabī's (typically Zāhirite) literalist rejection of luxury-taxes. Other examples of researcher-friendly footnotes: 80, 82, 91, 94, 99, 102, 104 and 118.²

1. Although Ralph Austin had read the Nasab in manuscript (see his Sufis of Andalusia [London, 1971], p.39, n.1), and, of course, Osman Yahia had described it in Histoire et classification de l’oeuvre d’Ibn ‘Arabī (Damascus, 1964), pp.407–8, no.530.

Apart from the rhymed-prose prologue and densely-woven beginning of the work, most of the Nasab al-khirqah is relatively painless to read – at least by Akbarian standards. The 'genealogies' may offer little of interest to any but historians and specialists (who can argue about their tenability and whether or not a chain is only as strong as its weakest link, after all) but the heart of the book, the long series of moral instructions, or exhortations (waṣāyā), will be found refreshingly attractive to the general reader – precious counsels to be cherished in practice by serious students of the Shaykh. The more substantive differences between Addas's presentation of the Nasab and my own (on pp. 1–33 of this issue) will be treated in a later study incorporating the Arabic text. In this review I will only address some technical matters and a rather important point of general interpretation affecting the whole perspective of Ibn al-'Arabī's various receptions of the mantle of initiation.

As a fellow text-critic I would have liked to see from my colleague a fuller description of the sources she used to establish her text. But since I myself thought best to burden the reader with even fewer technical details, let me say more precisely that Addas's account of two of her sources might have been less misleading. Specifically, MS. Esad Efendi 1507 (E), which she declares as her basic text, is not as good as her brief description tends to imply, and the 1987 Cairo edition of A. R. H. Maḥmūd (C) not really so bad as she states (p. 24). In fact, the two are quite comparable, sharing most of the additional content not found in other sources, and they differ primarily in two respects only: E is marred by a number of careless errors of the copyist (even evincing a non-native grasp of Arabic grammar), whereas C is quite scrupulously printed;³ but the Cairo edition does suffer from several gaping lacunae – notably, the sajʿ prologue and the chains of transmission – and, so, only about two-thirds of the Nasab is represented in C. Most of the absent material was provided in Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ghimārī’s very serviceable study, Al-Burhān al-jalī (from which C was excerpted), published in 1979–80 in the journal, Liwāʾ al-Islām (see n. 5 of my translation), however, and Addas might have avoided a problem in her reading of the first two investitures by consulting that publication (see my n. 113). As it is, her suggestion (in n. 90) that a missing passage describing Ibn al-ʿArabī’s empirical method of initiation was deliberately “omitted” from C is a bit unfair since, in fact, a comparable description from Futūḥāt, I: 186–7, was quoted at length by al-Ghimārī – who, by the way, was personally very favorable towards Ibn al-ʿArabī (as was Maḥmūd). The manuscript basis of C is not identified⁴ but, as far as can be determined, it was quite as good as any other primary source I have examined.

2. While Addas has made a promising start, a desideratum which remains would be a thorough critical comparison of the teachings in the Nasab with those of Ibn al-'Arabī's other practical treatises, such as Al-Amr al-muḥkam and Kunh mā lā budda li-l-murīd min-hu, as well as the waṣāyā-chapter (560) of the Futūḥāt (IV, 444seq.).

As for E, although it does, indeed, appear to be a genuine copy of an original transcript of the Nasab read before Ibn al-ʿArabī in the summer of 633/1236 at his home (with his son, Saʿd al-Dīn Abū Saʿūd, and others present) by a disciple, Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Lāh al-ʿAlawī of Hama – that does not necessarily mean that it was well copied or that the form in which we have it now is free of interpolations. The full name of the original copyist (see “La Filiation spirituelle,” at n. 121) makes clear that he was a sharīf, and there is evidence in E that either he or the second scribe harbored Imāmite sympathies (see n. 84 in my translation). That al-ʿAlawī was a serious student of the Shaykh al-Akbar is proven by the existence of samāʾ’s certifying his reading of portions of the Futūḥāt. But that really has no bearing on the credibility of the second (that is, the actual) copyist of E, who may have been a very late inheritor of the original manuscript. It is unlikely that MS. Esad Ef. 1507, for all its interest and value, is nearly as old as MS. Şehid Ali Paşa 1344, which dates from the mid-10th/16th century.

A more significant criticism that I have of Addas’s representation of the khirqah motif does not relate, strictly speaking, to the content of the Nasab itself but, rather, to her reading of the important passage from Futūḥāt, I: 186–7, translated by her

3. For instance, C is the only source to give the correct reading of lā tajzaʿu (be not anxious), where the verb is the contrary of işbir (be patient) in the line following (see n. 67 of my translation). All of the manuscript sources contain at least as many mistakes as the Cairo edition.

4. As al-Ghimārī studied at the Azhar, we may conjecture that his source was MS. Azhar 1070 [33580], ff. 29–36 (mentioned by Yahia).

in Quest (p. 145) and in “La Filiation spirituelle” (pp. 14–15). In the first version she left out the lines referring to Ibn al-‘Arabī’s investiture at the hand of al-Tawzarī – (compare my translation in n. 147), thus giving the false impression that what was mentioned before, the investiture by Ibn Jāmi’ in Mosul, was what caused the Shaykh to “revise his opinion . . . of the libs al-khirqah.” (She reiterates the same interpretation in “La Filiation spirituelle,” p. 16, even though there the entire passage was given.) But in the original Arabic it is the Khāḍirite investiture of al-Tawzarī which is clearly the point of reference of the words, “from that time”. The precise date and place of that first initiation remains uncertain (and the Nasab material only makes the question more complicated). Addas suggests that it took place in Seville in 595/1196 on the authority of a single anonymous manuscript (A) of dubious provenience, supplied to her by Osman Yahia. Al-Ghimārī’s source, however, asserts that the date was 586/1190; and Austin, for his part, assumed that it was six years earlier, when Ibn al-‘Arabī first encountered the mysterious, immortal Khāḍir. But whatever the case, it was obviously that first Khāḍirite initiation in the Maghrib that was the occasion of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s realizing the legitimacy of the practice of investiture (despite its not being an actual Prophetic institution, as he himself stipulates).

Finally, I should mention that ‘Ayn al-Ḥayāt is a recently-founded journal of the ṭarīqah Naqshbandīyah, published privately in Italy and with a limited circulation. As the quality of the contributions (from such scholars as Addas and Hamid Algar) has so far been very high, there is certain to be an unrequited demand for issues of the journal, which, at least, will hopefully be available in the US through Interlibrary Loan (otherwise, copies may perhaps be acquired through the good offices of the librarian of the Muhyiddin Ibn ‘Arabī Society Oxford).

Naqshbandi Aliya Teachings of Levels of the Heart and The 9 Lataif / Points & Realities of The Cave

From the Teachings of Shaykh Abdullah Daghestani [Q] through the teachings of Shaykh Muhammad Hisham Kabbani in Naqshbandi Sufi Way Guidebook.

The Golden Chain

Shaykh Sharafuddin (q) asked Shaykh `Abdullah (q) to host their guest. Shaykh `Abdullah recounted the events of the meeting to several of his murids many years later. As soon as they met, Shaykh `Abdullah said, "You are interested in the knowledge of the Nine Points. We can speak on it in the morning after Fajr prayer. Now you eat something and rest." At Fajr time Shaykh `Abdullah called Gurdjieff to come and pray with him. As soon as the prayer finished, the Shaykh began to recite Surat Ya Sin from the Holy Qur'an. As he finished reading, Gurdjieff approached him and asked if he could speak of what he had just experienced. Gurdjieff said:

A Meeting With Gurdjieff

Through your spiritual power I was able to ascend to the knowledge of the power of the Nine Points. Then a voice, addressing me as `Abd an-Nur, said: 'This light and knowledge have been granted to you from the Divine Presence of Allah to bring peace to your heart. However, you must not use the power of this knowledge.' The voice bid me farewell with the salutation of Peace and the vision ended as you were finishing the recitation from the Qur'an." The Enneagram image above Holds the Secret of The 9 Points , 9 States of Humanity, 9 Sultan al Awliya Shaykh `Abdullah replied, "Surat Ya Sin was called 'the Heart of the Qur'an' by the Holy Prophet and the knowledge of these Nine Points was opened to you through it.

The vision was by the blessings of the verse: 'Peace! a Word (of salutation) from a Lord Most Merciful' [36:58]. "Each of the Nine Points is represented by one of nine Saints who are at the Highest Level in the Divine Presence.

They are the keys to the untold powers within man, but there is no permission to use these keys. This is a secret that in general will not be opened until the Last Days when the Mahdi (as) appears and Jesus (as) returns. "This meeting of ours has been blessed. Keep it as a secret in your heart and don't speak of it in this life. 'Abd an-Nur, for that is your name with us, you are free to stay or go as your responsibilities allow. You are always welcome with us. You have attained safety in the Divine Presence. May Allah bless you and strengthen you in your journey

His States and Discourses After His Second Seclusion At 30 years of age, Shaykh Abdullah was ordered to enter a second long seclusion for five years. During that seclusion, many visions and states were granted to him, which it would be impossible to describe within the span of this book. After he completed this second seclusion, the power of his spiritual attraction increased. He became so renowned that even during his Shaykh's lifetime, people used to come from everywhere to learn from him. Following are some of his discourses: "I do not speak to you about any Station (Maqam), Manifestation (Tajalli), or Rank (Rutbah) without my having already entered that station or position and experienced that Manifestation. I am not like many others, I do not speak separating my sight from my heart, enumerating the Stations (Maqamat) for you without my knowing their Reality (Haqiqat). No! First of all I followed that path and saw what it was. I learned those Realities and Secrets which may be found along it, and I worked my way along it until I obtained the

- Knowledge of Certainty ('ilm al-yaqin),
- the Eye of Certainty ('ayn al-yaqin), and
- the Truth of Certainty (haqq al-yaqin).
- Only then do I speak to you, giving you a tiny taste of what I have tasted, until I am able to make you reach that station without tiring you and without difficulties.

Stations of the Heart – Lataiful Qalb

"There are five stations of the Heart: Qalb, Sirr, Sirr as-Sirr, Khafa and Akhfa.

- Qalb is the Heart,
- Sirr is the Secret,
- Sirr as-Sirr is the Secret of the Secret,
- Khafa is the Hidden, and
- Akhfa the Most Hidden. The secret of this Tariqat is based on these five lata'if (Subtle Things), the Stations of the heart.

"Latifat al-qalb, the stage of the Heart, is under the authority of Sayyidina Adam, because it represents the physical aspect of the heart.

Latifat as-sirr, the station of the Secret, is under Sayyidina Nuh , because it is the Vessel which is saved from the Ocean of Darkness, salvation from the flood of ignorance.

Latifat Sirr as-Sirr, the station of the Secret of the Secret, is under two Prophet s: Ibrahim and Masa , who represent Allah's Divine Presence on Earth. Allah made Ibrahim the symbol of all His Khalifs on this Earth, as mentioned in the verse of the creation of mankind, "I will create a vicegerent on earth." [2:30]. Musa was blessed with hearing and speaking to Allah which are the two essential attributes of knowledge.

"Latifat al-khafa, the Hidden Station, is under Sayyidina Isa { Jesus }. Because of his relationship with Hidden Knowledge, he represents spiritual understanding.

"Latifat al-Akhfa, the Most Hidden Station, is under the Reality of Sayyidina Muhammad , because he was granted a station high above that of all other Prophet s and messengers. He was the one who was raised up, in the Night of Ascension, to the Divine Presence. This is represented by the Kalima (Sacred Phrase), because there is no la ilaha illallah without Muhammadun Rasulullah. "The lights of these stations have been shown to me.

- The light of the Heart is a yellow hue;
- the light of the Secret is red;
- the light of the Secret of the Secret is white;
- the light of the Hidden Station is green; and
- the light of the Most Hidden Station is black."

These Five Stations are the center of the Nine Points which represent the locus of Revelation and Inspiration of the Divine Presence in the heart of the human being. These Nine Points are located on the chest of each person and they represent nine different hidden states in every human being. Every state is connected to a saint, who has the authority to control that point.

"If the seeker in the Naqshbandi Way is able to unveil and to make spiritual contact with the authorized master controlling these points, he may be given knowledge of and power to use these nine points.

"The conditions related to opening these nine points can only be alluded to obliquely.

1. The first station involves the power of imprisoning the ego
2. The key to the second state is Dhikr with la ilaha illallah.
3. The third state consists in witnessing the engraving of Allah's name on the heart (naqsh).
4. The fourth state relates to the meaning of that engraving on the heart.
5. The fifth state is to imprint the engraving with your dhikr.
6. In the sixth state the heart is made to stop pumping at will and to start pumping at will.

7. The seventh state is to be aware of the number of times one stops the heart from pumping and the number of times one restores the pumping of the heart.
8. "In the eighth state one mentions the phrase Muhammadun Rasulullah in every cessation of the heart and every restoration of its pumping.
9. The ninth stage is to return to your Cave, as Allah mentioned in Surat al-Kahf, "When ye turn away from them and the things they worship other than Allah, betake yourself to the Cave: your Lord will shower His mercies on you..." [18:16]. { 9:40 This the Power of 9 Importance of the King, Return to the King, 12 Veil of Power 9 in Holy Quran Tauba Surah 9 Verse 40 is the Beginning of entrance to the THAWR Cave}

"The Cave is the Divine Presence. Here one utters the cherished prayer of the Prophet : 'O God, You are my destination and Your Pleasure is what I seek.' The heart, as it cycles between the cessation and restoration of its pumping, is existing at the level of the Essence of the Divine Presence. Because that Divine Essence is the source of all created being, that heart will be at one with every minutest creation in this universe. The heart which has reached the secrets of the nine points will be able to see everything, hear everything, know everything, taste everything, sense everything, 'Until He will be the ears with which he hears, the eyes with which he sees, the tongue with which he speaks, the hand with which he grasps, and the feet with which he walks. He will be Lordly, he only need say to a thing Be! and it will be.'" { This is Perfectly Manifested in Sayedena Muhammad {s} Our Eternal Messenger of Allah.}

Why did he go to that cave? The 'Cave of Silence' as it has been called? Indeed, it is the 'Cave of Silent Secrets'. Why was the Prophet ordered by God to go to that cave, which is one day's travel from Makkah, when he had a distance of fifteen days journeying to go?

"29" When the Prophet went into that cave, a spider and a dove came and made a house over the door in order that no one would know what was inside. { The Spider is 29th Surah directing us that the secrets of 29 and the Lam Alif is the seal for the entry into the divine presence | The Dove is the Angelic Realm and Eggs are the story of Creation.} 29 Secretly encoded Surahs .

Knowledge of Letters , Fawatih Letters of Mugatta'at and Secrets of Numbers

This is common knowledge. As for the secret, look to love. When love for someone is pure, God will never forget that person. Before leaving Makkah for Madinah, the Prophet put someone in his bed because the ignorant people came to his door intent on killing him. He put Ali (as) in his bed. There is a secret to that, it means that he made Ali (as) his representative, in his place. He did not put Umar (r) there. He did not put Uthman (r)-none of the Companions, but someone of his own flesh and blood.

The Full Moon has 2 Faces

The Full Moon has 2 Faces One That Shines on Earth the Other Dark side is Hidden. The Prophet took with him as company his other mirror-image, Abu Bakr (r), to the cave. He said, "I am the city of knowledge and Ali is the door." {You Must Be Ahl Bayt, Either Pure Blood Line or By Way of Sayedena Saliman Farsi (AS) in Service to the Rasul} The door is something physical, external. When you want to enter the house, how do you enter? Through the door. In order to enter to the Prophet and to come to the knowledge that the Prophet is giving, you have to enter through the door. That door is Ali (r). The Prophet () also said, "Whatever God has poured into my heart, I poured into the heart of Abu Bakr as-Siddiq."3 The Prophet (s) referred again to the secret of Abu Bakr (r) when he said, "Abu Bakr does not surpass you because of fasting or praying more, but because of a secret that took root in his heart." So inside the house, we find Abu Bakr (r) and outside the house, we find Ali (as).

That is why, of the two sources of Sufi knowledge, one came from Abu Bakr (r) and the other from Ali (as). From the time of the different schools of Divine Law, Muslims have agreed that the knowledge of the heart came from these two paths. Justice and laws, on the other hand, came from Hadrat Umar (r). The Prophet's comment about Abu Bakr (r) is the secret of the cave. To represent his body, the Prophet put Ali (as) in his bed prior to his departure from Makkah to Madinah. This means that Ali (as) represented the external. But he took Abu Bakr (r) to the cave for the cave represents what is interior.

Shaykh Sharafuddin on Will and Destiny

"It is known that there are two types of destiny. The first kind of destiny is termed qada'an mucallaq, which means Suspended or Mutable Destiny. It is written on the Lawh al-Mahfoudh (the Preserved Tablet). This will vary according to will and behavior, cause and effect. All saints can change this kind of destiny for their murids, in order to train them and to influence their destiny by changing their actions and behavior. The authority to change the Mutable Destiny is given to the Shaykhs for their murids because they are connected to each other by Divine Will.

"The second type of destiny is contained in Umm al-Kitab, the Mother of the Book, as mentioned in the ayat:

13:39 – "Yamho Allahu ma yashao wa yuthbitu, wa 'indahu ommu al kitab."

"Allah eliminates what He wills or confirms, and with Him is the Mother of the Book." (Holy Quran, The Thunder 13:39)

And is called qada'an mubram, which means Fixed Destiny. Saints never interfere in that Fixed Destiny, which is in the Hand of the Creator. "Allah gave the authority to change the Fixed Destiny only to the Nine Saints who are at the highest level in the Divine Presence by permission from the Prophet who is first to take that power from Allah.

They control the Nine Points of human consciousness related to the different stages of the Ascent of an Individual on his path to the Divine Presence. Allah gave these Nine Saints, whose number has not changed from the time of the Prophet until today, the power to use Sultan adh-dhikr, the Greatest Remembrance.

"Everyone knows that Dhikr is primarily the repetition of la ilaha illallah, and that is what is practiced by all tariqats, including the Naqshbandiyya. But the Sultan adh-dhikr is a completely different type of Dhikr.

Allah said, "Inna nahnu nazzalna-dh-dhikra wa inna lahu la-hafidhun [15:9], "We have revealed the Dhikr, and we are the One to protect that Dhikr in you."

The Dhikr mentioned here is the Holy Qur'an. The Dhikr of these nine saints, besides la ilaha illallah, is the Secret of the Holy Qur'an. They recite the Qur'an, not as we recite it reading from beginning to end, but they recite it with all its secrets and inner realities. Because Allah said, 6:59 – "Wala ratbin wala yabisin illa fee kitabin mubeenin.

"Nor is there anything fresh or dry but is inscribed in a clear Record."

None of God's creations in all the created universes has not been mentioned already, with all its secrets, in the Clear Book, the Qur'an.

"The saint reciting the Qur'an in Sultan adh-Dhikr is therefore reciting it with all the secrets of every creation, from beginning to end. Allah gave every letter of the Qur'an, according to the Nine Highest Masters of the Naqshbandi Order [this was the first time the Shaykh ever mentioned this secret], twelve thousand knowledge's.

The Qur'an contains around 600,000 letters, so for every letter, these saints are able to take 12,000 knowledge's!

"Each of these nine saints differs from the other in his level as well. We may see that one of them, for example, was able to recite the Holy Qur'an by the power of Sultan adh-Dhikr, which is to grasp 12,000 meanings on every letter, only once in his life.

Another was able to recite it three times in his life.

The third was able to do it nine times in his life.

Another was able to recite it 99 times in his life.

"This secret differed from one saint to another.

- Shah Mawlana Naqshband (q) was able to do it 999 times in his life.
- Our Master Ahmad al-Faruqi was able to recite it 9,999 times in his life.
- Shaykh Sharafuddin was able to recite it 19,999 times."

- Here Shaykh `Abdullah stopped. Shaykh Nazim said,
- "In every breath Grandshaykh `Abdullah Daghestani was exhaling with Sultan adh-Dhikr and inhaling with Sultan adh-Dhikr.
- He used to complete the secret of Qur'an twice in every breath."
- Mawlana Shaykh Nazim Inheritor of This Trust

Grandshaykh Abdullah

مشكاة الأنوار

أبو حامد الغزالي

بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم

رب أنعمت فزد بفضلك

الحمد لله فائض الأنوار وفتاح الأبصار. وكاشف الأسرار ورافع الأستار. والصلاة على محمد نور الأنوار وسيد الأبرار وحبیب الجبار وبشير الغفار ونذير القهار، وقامع الكفار وفاضح الفجار؛ وعلى آله وأصحابه الطيبين الطاهرين الأخيار. أما بعد فقد سألتني أيها الأخ الكريم قيضك الله لطلب السعادة الكبرى، ورشحك للعروج إلى الذروة العليا، وكحل بنور الحقيقة بصيرتك، ونقى عما سوى الحق سريرتك، أن أثبت إليك أسرار الأنوار الإلهية مقرونة بتأويل ما يشير إليه ظاهر الآيات المتلوة والأخبار المروية مثل قوله تعالى (الله نور السموات والأرض) ومعنى تمثيله ذلك بالمشكاة والزجاجة والمصباح والزيت والشجرة، مع قوله عليه السلام (إن لله سبعين حجاباً من نور وظلمة وإنه لو كشفها لأحرقت سبحات وجهه كل من أدركه بصره).

ولقد ارتقيت بسؤالك مرتقى صعباً تنخفض دون أعاليه أعين الناظرين؛ وقرعت باباً مغلقاً لا يفتح إلا للعلماء الراخسين. ثم ليس كل سر يكشف ويفشى، ولا كل حقيقة تعرض وتجلي، بل صدور الأحرار قبور الأسرار

وَمَنْ مَنَعَ الْمُسْتَوْجِبِ

عِلْمًا أَضَاعَهُ

فانفع بإشارات مختصرة وتلويحات موجزة؛ فإن تحقيق القول فيه يستدعي تمهيد أصول وشرح فصول ليس يتسع الآن لها وقتي، وليس ينصرف إليه همي وفكرتي. ومفاتيح القلوب بيد الله يفتحها إذا شاء كما شاء بما يشاء. وإنما الذي يفتح في الوقت فصول ثلاثة.

الفصل الأول

في بيان أن النور الحق هو الله تعالى

وأن اسم النور لغيره مجاز محض لا حقيقة له

وبيانه بأن يعرف معنى النور بالوضع الأول عند العوام، ثم بالوضع الثاني عند الخواص، ثم بالوضع الثالث عند خواص الخواص. ثم تعرف درجات الأنوار المذكورة المنسوبة إلى خواص الخواص وحقائقها لينكشف لك عند ظهور درجاتها أن الله تعالى هو النور الأعلى الأقصى، وعند انكشاف حقائقها أنه النور الحق الحقيقي وحده لا شريك له فيه.

أما الوضع الأول عند العامي فالنور يشير إلى ظهوره، والظهور أمر إضافي: إذ يظهر الشيء لا محالة الإنسان ويطن عن غيره: فيكون ظاهراً بالإضافة وباطناً بالإضافة. وإضافة ظهوره إلى الإدراكات لا محالة. وأقوى الإدراكات وأجلاها عند العوام الحواس، ومنها حاسة البصر.

والأشياء بالإضافة إلى الحس البصري ثلاثة أقسام: منها ما لا يبصر بنفسه كالأجسام المظلمة. ومنها ما يبصر بنفسه ولا يبصر به غيره كالأجسام المضيئة كالكوكب وجمرة النار إذا لم تكن مشتعلة. ومنها ما يبصر بنفسه ويبصر به أيضاً غيره كالشمس والقمر والسراج والنيران المشتعلة. والنور اسم لهذا القسم الثالث. ثم تارة يطلق على ما يفيض من الأجسام على ظاهر الأجسام الكثيفة، فيقال استنارت

وعلى الجملة فالنور عبارة عما يبصر بنفسه ويبصر به غيره كالشمس. هذا حده وحقيقته بالوضع الأول.

لما كان سر النور وروحه هو الظهور للإدراك، وكان الإدراك موقوفاً على وجود النور وعلى وجود العين الباصرة أيضاً: إذ النور هو الظاهر المظهر؛ وليس شيء من الأنوار ظاهراً في حق العميان ولا مظهرًا. فقد تساوى الروح الباصرة والنور الظاهر في كونه ركناً لا بد منه للإدراك ثم ترجح عليه في أن الروح الباصرة هي المدركة وبها الإدراك. وأما النور فليس بمدرك ولا به الإدراك، بل عنده الإدراك. فكان اسم النور بالنور الباصر أحق منه بالنور المبصر. وأطلقوا اسم النور على نور العين المبصرة فقالوا في الخفاش إن نور عينه ضعيف، وفي الأعمش إنه ضعيف نور بصره،

وفي الأعمى إنه فقد نور البصر، وفي السواد إنه يجمع نور البصر ويقويه، وإن الأجفان إنما خصتها الحكمة بلون السواد

وجعل العين مخفوفة بها لتجمع ضوء العين. وأما البياض فيفرق ضوء العين ويضعف نوره، حتى إن إدامة النظر إلى البياض

المشرق، بل إلى نور الشمس يبهر نور العين ويمحقه كما ينمحق الضعيف في جنب القوى.

فقد عرفت بهذا أن الروح الباصر سمى نورا، وأنه لم سمى نورا، وأنه لم كان بهذا الاسم أولى. وهذا هو الوضع الثاني وهو

وضع الخواص.

إعلم أن نور بصر العين موسوم بأنواع النقصان: فإنه يبصر غيره ولا يبصر نفسه، ولا يبصر ما بعد منه، ولا يبصر ما هو وراء حجاب.

ويبصر من الأشياء ظاهرها دون باطنها؛ ويبصر من الموجودات بعضها دون كلها. ويبصر أشياء متناهية ولا يبصر ما لا نهاية له. ويغلط كثيرا في إبصاره: فيرى الكبير صغيرا والبعيد قريبا والساكن متحركا والمتحرك ساكنا. فهذه سبع نقائص لا تفارق العين الظاهرة. فإن كان في العين عين منزهة عن هذه النقائص كلها فليت شعري هل هو أولى باسم النور أم لا.

الرابع أن العين تدرك من الأشياء ظاهرها وسطحها الأعلى دون باطنها؛ بل قوالبها وصورها دون حقائقها. والعقل

الخامس أن العين تبصر بعض الموجودات إذ تقصر عن جميع المعقولات وعن كثير من المحسوسات: إذ لا تدرك الأصوات والروائح والطعوم والحرارة والبرودة والقوى المدركة: أعني قوة السمع والبصر والشم والذوق، بل الصفات الباطنة النفسانية كالفرح والسرور والغم والحزن والألم واللذة والعشق والشهوة والقدرة والإرادة والعلم إلى غير ذلك من موجودات لا تحصى ولا تعد؛ فهو ضيق المجال مختصر المجرى لا تسعة مجاوزة الألوان والأشكال وهما أخس الموجودات: فإن الأجسام في أصلها أخس أقسام الموجودات، والألوان والأشكال من أخس أعراضها.

فالموجودات كلها مجال العقل؛ إذ يدرك هذه الموجودات التي عددها وما لم نعددها، وهو الأكثر: فيتصرف في جميعها

ويحكم عليها حكما يقينا صادقا. فالأسرار الباطنة عنده ظاهرة، والمعاني الخفية عنده جلية. فمن أين للعين الظاهرة

مساماته ومجاراته في استحقاق اسم النور كلا إنها نور بالإضافة إلى غيرها لكنها ظلمة بالإضافة إليه. بل هي جاسوس

من جواسيسه وكله بأخس خزائنه وهي خزانة الألوان والأشكال لترفع إلى حضرته أخبارها فيقضي فيها بما يقتضيه رأيه

الثاقب وحكمه النافذ.

والحواس الخمس جواسيسه. وله في الباطن جواسيس سواها من خيال ووهم وفكر وذكر وحفظ؛ ووراءهم خدم وجنود

مسخرة له في عالمه الخاص يستسخروهم ويتصرف فيهم استسخر الملك عبيده بل أشد. وشرح ذلك يطول. وقد ذكرناه في

كتاب (عجاب القلب) من كتاب الإحياء.

السادس ان العين لا تبصر ما لانهاية له، فإنها تبصر صفات الأجسام والأجسام لا تتصور إلامتناهية. والعقل يدرك

المعلومات، والمعلومات لا يتصور أن تكون متناهيه.

نعم إذا لاحظ العلوم المفصلة فلا يكون الحاضر الحاصل عنده إلا متناهيًا. لكن في قوته إدراك ما لا نهاية له. وشرح ذلك يطول.

فإن أردت له مثالا فخذ من الجليات، فإنه يدرك الأعداد ولا نهاية لها؛ بل يدرك تضعيفات الإثنين والثلاثة وسائر الأعداد ولا يتصور لها نهاية. ويدرك أنواعا من النسب بين الأعداد لا يتصور التناهي عليها: بل يدرك علمه بالشيء وعلمه بعلمه بالشيء، وعلمه بعلمه بعلمه. فقوته في هذا الواحد لا تقف عند نهاية.

السابع أن العين تبصر الكبير صغيرا، فترى الشمس في مقدار مجن والكواكب في صور دنائير ماثورة على بساط أزرق. والعقل يدرك أن الكواكب والشمس أكبر من الأرض أضعافا مضاعفة؛ والعين ترى الكواكب ساكنة، بل ترى الظل بين يديه ساكنا، وترى الصبي ساكنا في مقداره، والعقل يدرك أن الصبي متحرك في النشوء والتزايد على الدوام، والظل متحرك دائما، والكواكب تتحرك في كل لحظة أميالا كثيرة كما قال صلى الله عليه وسلم لجبريل عليه السلام: (أزالت الشمس) فقال لا: نعم قال كيف قال (منذ قلت لا إلى أن قلت نعم): قد تحرك مسيرة خمسمائة سنة).

النظر).

فأما العقل إذا تجرد عن غشاوة الوهم والخيال لم يتصور أن يغلط؛ بل رأى الأشياء على ما هي عليه، وفي تجريده عسر عظيم. وإنما يكمل تجرده عن هذه النوازع بعد الموت، وعند ذلك ينكشف الغطاء وتنجلي الأسرار ويصادف كل أحد ما قدم من خير أو شر محضراً؛ ويشاهد كتاباً لا يغادر صغيرة ولا كبيرة إلا أحصاها، وعنده يقال، فكشفنا عنك غطاءك فبصرك اليوم حديد. وإنما الغطاء غطاء الخيال والوهم وغيرهما؛ وعنده يقول المغرور بأوهامه واعتقاداته الفاسدة وخیالاته الباطلة (رَبَّنَا أَبْصَرْنَا وَسَمِعْنَا فَارْجِعْنَا نَعْمَلْ صَالِحاً) الآية.

فقد عرفت بهذا أن العين أولى باسم النور من النور المعروف، ثم عرفت أن العقل أولى باسم النور من العين. بل بينهما من التفاوت ما يصح معه أن يقال إنه أولى بل الحق أنه المستحق للاسم دونه.

اعلم أن العقول وإن كانت مبصرة، فليست المبصرات كلها عندها على وتيرة واحدة، بل بعضها يكون عندها كأنه حاضر كالعلوم الضرورية مثل علمه بأن الشيء الواحد لا يكون قديماً حادثاً ولا يكون موجوداً معدوماً، والقول الواحد لا يكون صدقاً وكذباً، وأن الحكم إذا ثبت للشيء جوازه ثبت لمثله، وأن الأخص إذا كان موجوداً كان الأعم واجب

الوجود: فإذا وجد السواد فقد وجد اللون، وإذا وجد الإنسان فقد وجد الحيوان. وأما عكسه فلا يلزم في العقل، إذ لا يلزم من وجود اللون وجود السواد ولا من وجود الحيوان وجود لإنسان إلى غير ذلك من القضايا الضرورية في الواجبات والجائزات والمستحيلات. ومنها ما لا يقارن العقل في كل حال إذا عرض عليه بل يحتاج إلى أن يهز أعطافه ويستوري زناده وينبه عليه بالتنبيه كالنظريات. وإنما ينبهه كلام الحكمة، فعند إشراق نور الحكمة يصير العقل مبصراً بالفعل بعد أن كان مبصراً بالقوة. وأعظم الحكمة كلام الله تعالى. ومن جملة كلامه القرآن خاصة، فتكون منزلة آيات القرآن عند عين العقل منزلة نور الشمس عند العين الظاهرة إذ به يتم الإبصار. فبالحرى أن يسمى القرآن نورا كما يسمى نور الشمس نورا فمثال القرآن نور الشمس ومثال العقل نور العين. وبهذا نفهم معنى قوله: (فَأْمِنُوا بِاللَّهِ وَرَسُولِهِ وَالنَّورِ الَّذِي أَنْزَلْنَا)، وقوله: (قَدْ جَاءَكُمْ بُرْهَانٌ مِنْ رَبِّكُمْ وَأَنْزَلْنَا إِلَيْكُمْ نُوراً مُبِيناً).

فقد فهمت من هذا أن العين عيان: ظاهرة وباطنة: فالظاهرة من عالم الحس والشهادة، والباطنة من عالم آخر وهو عالم الملكوت. ولكل عين من العينين شمس ونور عنده تصوير كاملة الإبصار إحداها ظاهرة والأخرى باطنة؛ والظاهرة من عالم الشهادة وهي الشمس المحسوسة. والباطنة من عالم الملكوت وهو القرآن وكتب الله تعالى المنزلة.

وأعلم أن الشهادة بالإضافة إلى عالم الملكوت كالقشر بالإضافة إلى اللب، وكالصورة والقلب بالإضافة إلى الروح، وكالظلمة بالإضافة إلى النور، كالسفل بالإضافة إلى العلو. ولذلك يسمى عالم الملكوت العالم العلوي والعالم الروحاني والعالم النوراني. وفي مقابلته السفلي والجسماني والظلماني.

دقيقة

إذا كان اللائق بالذي يستفاد منه نور الإبصار أن يسمى سراجا منيرا فالذي يقتبس منه السراج في نفسه جدير بأن يكنى عنه بالنار. وهذه السرج الأرضية إنما تقتبس في أصلها من أنوار علوية. فالروح القدسي النبوي يكاد زيتة يضيء ولو لم تمسسه نار. ولكن إنما يصير نورا على نور إذا مسته النار. وبالحرى أن يكون مقتبس الأرواح الأرضية هي الروح الإلهية العلوية التي وصفها علي وابن عباس رضي الله عنهما فقالا: (إن لله ملكا) له سبعون ألف وجه في كل وجه سبعون ألف لسان يسبح الله بجميعها) وهو الذي قوبل بالملائكة كلهم فقيل (يوم القيامة) يَوْمَ يَقُومُ الرُّوحُ وَالْمَلَائِكَةُ صَفًّا) فهي إذا اعتبرت من حيث يقتبس منها السرج الأرضية لم يكن لها مثال إلا النار، وذلك لا يؤانس إلا من جانب الطور.

على المرآة تابع لما في القمر، وما في القمر تابع لما في الشمس: إذ منها يشرق النور على القمر. وهذه الأنوار الأربعة مرتبة بعضها أعلى وأكمل من بعض، ولكل واحد مقام معلوم ودرجة خاصة لا يتعدها. فاعلم أنه قد انكشف لأرباب البصائر أن الأنوار الملكوتية إنما وجدت على ترتيب كذلك، وأن المقرب هو الأقرب إلى النور الأقصى. فلا يبعد أن تكون رتبة إسرافيل فوق رتبة جبريل، وأن فيهم الأقرب لقرب درجته من حضرة الربوبية التي هي منبع الأنوار كلها، وأن فيهم الأدنى، وبينهما درجات تستعصي على الإحصاء. وإنما المعلوم كثرتهم وترتيبهم في مقاماتهم وصفوفهم، وأنهم كما وصفوا به أنفسهم إذ قالوا: (وَإِنَّا لَنَحْنُ الصَّاقُونَ. وَإِنَّا لَنَحْنُ الْمُسَبِّحُونَ).

إذا عرفت أن الأنوار لها ترتيب فاعلم أنه لا يتسلسل إلى غير نهاية، بل يرتقي إلى منبع أول هو النور لذاته وبداته، ليس يأتيه نور من غيره، ومنه تشرق الأنوار كلها على ترتيبها. فانظر الآن اسم النور أحق وأولى بالمستنير المستعير نوره من غيره، أو بالنير في ذاته المنير لكل ما سواه فما عندي أنه يخفى عليك الحق فيه. وبه يتحقق أن اسم النور أحق بالنور الأقصى الأعلى الذي لا نور فوقه، ومنه ينزل النور إلى غيره.

بل أقول ولا أبالي إن اسم النور على غير النور الأول مجاز محض: إذ كل ما سواه إذا اعتبر ذاته فهو في ذاته من حيث ذاته لا نور له: بل نورانيته مستعارة من غيره ولا قوام لنورانيته المستعارى بنفسها، بل بغيرها. ونسبة المستعار إلى المستعير مجاز محض. أفترى أن من استعار ثيابا وفرسا ومركبا وسرجا، وركبه في الوقت الذي أركبه المعير، وعلى الحد الذي رسمه، غنى بالحقيقة أو بالمجاز؟ وأن المعير هو الغنى أو المستعير؟ كلا، بل المستعير فقير في نفسه كما كان. وإنما الغنى هو المعير الذي منه الإعارة والإعطاء، وإليه الاسترداد والانتزاع. فإذا النور الحق هو الذي بيده الخلق والأمر، ومنه الإنارة أولا والإدامة ثانيا. فلا شركة لأحد معه في حقيقة هذا الاسم ولا في استحقاقه إلا من حيث يسميه به ويتفضل عليه بتسميته تفضل المالك على عبده إذا أعطاه مالا ثم سماه مالكا. وإذا انكشف للعبد الحقيقة علم أنه وماله لملكه على التفرد لا شريك له فيه أصلا وألبته.

مهما عرفت أن النور يرجع إلى الظهور والإظهار ومراتبه، فاعلم أنه لا ظلمة أشد من كتم العدم: لأن المظلم سمي مظلماً لأنه ليس للإبصار إليه وصول، إذ ليس يصير موجوداً للبصير مع أنه موجود في نفسه.

فالذي ليس موجوداً لا لغيره ولا لنفسه كيف لا يستحق أن يكون هو الغاية في الظلمة وفي مقابله الوجود فهو النور:

فإن الشيء ما لم يظهر في ذاته لا يظهر لغيره.

والوجود ينقسم إلى ما للشيء من ذاته وإلى ماله من غيره. وما له الوجود من غيره فوجوده مستعار لا قوام له بنفسه. بل

إذا اعتبر ذاته من حيث ذاته فهو عدم محض. وإنما هو موجود من حيث نسبته إلى غيره، وذلك ليس بوجود حقيقي كما

عرفت في مثال استعارة الثوب والغنى. فالموجود الحق هو الله تعالى، كما أن النور الحق هو الله تعالى.

حقيقة الحقائق

من هنا ترقى العارفون من حضيض المجاز إلى يفاع الحقيقة، واستكملوا معراجهم فرأوا بالمشاهدة العيانة أن ليس في الوجود إلا الله تعالى، وأن (كُلُّ شَيْءٍ هَالِكٌ إِلَّا وَجْهَهُ) لا أنه يصير هالكا في وقت من الأوقات، بل هو هالك أزلا وأبدا لا يتصور إلا كذلك، فإن كل شيء سواه إذا اعتبر ذاته من حيث ذاته فهو عدم محض؛ وإذا اعتبر من الوجه الذي يسري إليه الوجود من الأول الحق رؤى موجودا لا في ذاته لكن من الوجه الذي يلي موجدته فيكون الموجود وجه الله تعالى فقط. فلكل شيء وجهان: وجه إلى نفسه ووجه إلى ربه؛ فإذا لا موجود إلا الله تعالى ووجهه. فإذا كل شيء هالك إلا وجهه أزلا وأبدا. ولم يفتقر هؤلاء إلى يوم القيامة ليسمعوا نداء الباري تعالى (لِمَنِ الْمُلْكُ الْيَوْمَ لِلَّهِ الْوَاحِدِ الْقَهَّارِ) بل هذا النداء لا يفارق سمعهم أدبا. ولم يفهموا من معنى قوله (الله أكبر) أنه أكبر من غيره، حاش لله، إذ ليس في الوجود معه غيره حتى يكون أكبر منه؛ بل ببس لغيره رتبة المعية، بل رتبة التبعية. بل ليس لغيره وجود إلا من الوجه الذي يليه. فالموجود وجهه فقط. ومحال أن يقال إنه أكبر من وجهه. بل معناها أنه أكبر من أن يقال له أكبر بمعنى الإضافة والمقايسة، وأكبر من أن يدرك غيره كنهه كبريائه، نبيا كان أو ملكا. بل لا يعرف الله كنه معرفته إلا الله. بل كل معروف داخل في سلطة العارف واستيلائه دخولا ما، وذلك ينافي الجلال والكبرياء. وهذا له تحقيق ذكرناه في كتاب (المقصد الأسنى) في معاني أسماء الله الحسنى).

العارفون - بعد العروج إلى سماء الحقيقة - اتفقوا على أنهم لم يروا في الوجود إلا الواحد الحق. لكن منهم من كان له هذه الحال عرفانا علميا، ومنهم من صار له ذلك حالا ذوقيا. وانتفت عنهم الكثرة بالكلية واستغرقوا بالفردانية المحضة واستوفيت فيها عقولهم فصاروا كالمبهوتين فيه ولم يبق فيهم متسع لا لذكر غير الله ولا لذكر أنفسهم أيضا. فلم يكن عندهم إلا الله، فسكروا سكرا دفع دونه سلطان عقولهم، فقال أحدهم (أنا الحق) وقال الآخر (سبحاني ما أعظم شأنني) وقال آخر (ما في الجبة إلا الله) وكلام العشاق في حال السكر يطوى ولا يحكى. فلما خف عنهم سكرهم وردوا إلى سلطان العقل الذي هو ميزان الله في أرضه، عرفوا أن ذلك لم يكن حقيقة الاتحاد بل شبه الاتحاد مثل قول العاشق في حال فرط عشقه (أنا من أهوى ومن أهوى أنا) ولا يبعد أن يفاجيء الإنسان مرآة فينظر فيها ولم ير المرأة قط، فيظن أن الصورة التي رآها هي صورة المرأة متحدة بها، ويرى الخمر في الزجاج فيظن أن الخمر لون الزجاج. وإذا صار ذلك عنده مألوفاً ورسخ فيه قدمه استغفر وقال:

فَتَشَاهَا فَتَنَ

وَكَأَمَّا قَدْ

تِ الْحَمْرُ

قَدْ خُ

لعلك تشتهي أن تعرف وجه إضافة نوره إلى السموات والأرض، بل وجه كونه في ذاته نور السموات والأرض، فلا ينبغي أن يخفى ذلك عليك بعد أن عرفت أنه النور ولا نور سواه وأنه كل الأنوار، وأنه النور الكلي، لأن النور عبارة عما ينكشف به الأشياء، وأعلى منه ما ينكشف به وله، وأعلى منه ما ينكشف به وله ومنه، وأن الحقيقي منه ما ينكشف به وله، وأعلى منه ما ينكشف به وله ومنه، وأن الحقيقي منه ما ينكشف به وله ومنه، وليس فوقه نور منه اقتباسه واستمداده: بل ذلك له في ذاته من ذاته لذاته لا من غيره. ثم عرفت أن هذا لن يتصف به إلا النور الأول. ثم عرفت أن السموات والأرض مشحونة نورا من طبقتي النور: اعني المنسوب إلى البصر والبصيرة: أي إلى الحس والعقل. أما البصر فما نشاهده في السموات من الكواكب والشمس والقمر، وما نشاهده في الأرض من الأشعة المنبسطة على كل ما على الأرض حتى ظهرت به الألوان المختلفة خصوصا في الربيع، وعلى كل حال في الحيوانات والمعادن وأصناف الموجودات. ولولاها لم يكن للألوان ظهور، بل وجود. ثم سائر ما يظهر للحس من الأشكال والمقادير يدرك تبعا للألوان ولا يتصور إدراكها إلا بواسطتها. وأما الأنوار العقلية المعنوية فالعالم الأعلى مشحون بها، وهي جواهر الملائكة، والعالم الأسفل مشحون بها وهي الحياة الحيوانية ثم الإنسانية. وبالنور الإنساني السفلي ظهر نظام عالم السفلى كما بالنور الملكي ظهر نظام عالم العلو. وهو المعنى بقوله (أنشأكم من

الأَرْضِ وَاسْتَعْمَرَكُمْ فِيهَا) (وقال تعالى:)لَيْسَتْ خَلْقُهُمْ فِي الْأَرْضِ (وقال:)وَيَجْعَلُكُمْ خُلَفَاءَ الْأَرْضِ(، وقال:)إِنِّي جَاعِلٌ فِي الْأَرْضِ خَلِيفَةً(.

فإذا (عرفت هذا عرفت أن العالم بأسره مشحون بالأنوار الظاهرة البصرية والباطنة العقلية، ثم عرفت أن السفلية فائضة بعضها من بعض فيضان النور من السراج وأن السراج هو الروح النبوي القدسي، وأن الأرواح النبوية القدسية مقتبسة من الأرواح العلوية اقتباس السراج من النور؛ وأن العلويات بعضها مقتبسة من البعض، وأن ترتيبها ترتيب مقامات. ثم ترقى جملتها إلى نور الأنوار ومعدنها ومنبعها الأول؛ وأن ذلك هو الله تعالى وحده لا شريك له، وأن سائر الأنوار مستعارة، وإنما الحقيقي نوره فقط؛ وأن الكل نوره، بل هو الكل، بل لا هوية لغيره إلا بالجاز. فإذا لا نور إلا نوره، وسائر الأنوار أنوار من الذي يليه لا من ذاته. فوجه كل ذي وجه إليه ومولّ شطره:)فَأَيْنَمَا تُوَلُّوا فَثَمَّ وَجْهُ اللَّهِ(فإذا لا إله إلا هو: فإن الإله عبارة عما الوجه موليه نحوه بالعبادة والتأله: أعني وجوه القلوب فإنها الأنوار. بل كما لا إله إلا هو، فلا هو إلا هو: لأن (هو) عبارة عما إليه إشارة كيفما كان، ولا إشارة إلا إليه. بل كل ما أشرت إليه فهو بالحقيقة إشارة عليه وإن كنت لا تعرفه أنت لغفلتك عن حقيقة الحقائق التي ذكرناها. ولا إشارى إلى نور الشمس بل إلى الشمس. فكل ما في الوجود فنسبته إليه في ظاهر المثل كنسبة النور إلى الشمس. فإذا (لا إله إلا الله) توحيد العوام، و (لا إله إلا هو) توحيد الخواص، لأن هذا أتم وأخص وأشمل وأحق وأدق وأدخل بصاحبه في الفردانية المحضة والوحدانية الصرفة. ومنتهى معراج الخلائق مملكة الفردانية. وليس وراء ذلك مرقى: إذ الترقى لا يتصور إلا بكثرة: فإنه نوع إضافة يستدعى ما منه الارتقاء وما إليه الارتقاء. وإذا ارتفعت الكثرة حقت الوحدة وبطلت الإضافات وطاحت الإشارات ولم يبق علو وسفل ونازل ومرتفع: واستحال الترقى فاستحال العروج. فليس وراء الأعلى علو، ولا مع الوحدة كثرة، ولا مع انتفاء الكثرة عروج، فإن كان من تغير حال. فالنزول إلى سماء الدنيا: أعني بالإشراف من علو إلى سفل لأن الأعلى له أسفل وليس له أعلى. فهذه هي غاية الغايات ومنتهى الطلبات: يعلمه من يعلمه وينكره من يجهله. وهو من العلم الذي هو كهيئة المكنون الذي لا يعلمه إلا العلماء بالله. فإذا نطقوا به لم ينكره إلا أهل الغرة بالله. ولا يبعد أن قال العلماء إن النزول إلى السماء الدنيا هو نزول ملك: فقد توهم العلماء ما هو أبعد منه؛ إذ قال هذا المستغرق بالفردانية أيضا له نزول إلى السماء الدنيا: فإن 1 ذلك هو نزوله إلى استعمال الحواس أو تحريك الأعضاء. وإليه الإشارة بقوله (صرت سمعه الذي يسمع به وبصره الذي يبصر به ولسانه الذي ينطق به) فإذا كان هو سمعه وبصره ولسانه، فهو السامع والباصر والناطق إذن لا غيره؛ وإليه الإشارة بقوله: (مرضت فلم تعدني) الحديث.

واعلم أن معنى كونه نور السموات والأرض تعرفه بالنسبة إلى النور الظاهر البصري. فإذا رأيت أنوار الربيع وخضرته مثلاً في ضياء النهار فلست تشك في أنك ترى الألوان. وربما ظننت أنك لست ترى مع الألوان غيرها، فإنك تقول لست أرى مع الخضرة غير الخضرة. ولقد أصر على هذا قوم فزعموا أن النور لا معنى له، وأنه ليس مع الألوان غير الألوان، فأنكروا وجود النور مع أنه أظهر الأشياء، وكيف لا وبه تظهر الأشياء، وهو الذي يبصر في نفسه ويبصر به غيره كما سبق. لكن عند غروب الشمس وغيبية السراج ووقوع الظل أدركوا تفرقة ضرورية بين محل الظل وبين موقع الضياء فاعترفوا بأن النور معنى وراء الألوان يدرك مع الألوان حتى كأنه لشدة انجلائه لا يدرك، ولشدة ظهوره يخفى. وقد يكون الظهور سبب الخفاء. والشيء إذا جاوز حده انعكس علي ضده.

رأيت الله قبله) لأن منهم من يرى الأشياء به ومنهم من يرى الأشياء فيراه بالأشياء. وإلى الأول الإشارة بقوله تعالى: (أَوَلَمْ

يَكْفِ بِرَبِّكَ أَنَّهُ عَلَى كُلِّ شَيْءٍ شَهِيدٌ؛ وعلى الثاني الإشارة بقوله تعالى: (سُئِلَهُمْ آيَاتِنَا فِي الْآفَاقِ) فالأول صاحب

مشاهدة، والثاني صاحب الاستدلال عليه، والأول درجة الصديقين، والثاني درجة العلماء الراسخين، وليس بعدهما إلا

المحجوبين.

الغافلين

درجة

وإذ قد عرفت هذا فاعلم أنه كما ظهر كل شيء للبصر بالنور الظاهر، فقد ظهر كل شيء للبصيرة الباطنة بالله. فهو مع

كل شيء لا يفارقه ثم يظهر كل شيء، كما أن النور مع كل شيء وبه يظهر. ولكن بقي ها هنا تفاوت: وهو أن النور

الظاهر يتصور أن يغيب بغروب الشمس ويحجب حتى يظهر الظل، وأما النور الإلهي الذي به يظهر كل شيء، لا يتصور

غييبته بل يستحيل تغييره. فيبقى مع الأشياء دائما، فانقطع طريق الاستدلال بالتفرقة. ولو تصور غييبته لالتهدت السموات

والأرض، ولأدرك به من التفرقة ما يضطر معه إلى المعرفة بما به ظهرت الأشياء. ولكن لما تساوت الأشياء كلها على نمط

واحد في الشهادة على وحدانية خالقها ارتفع التفريق وخفي الطريق: إذ الطريق الظاهر معرفة الأشياء بالأضداد فما لا

ضد له ولا تغير له تتشابه الأحوال في الشهادة له. فلا يبعد أن يخفى ويكون خفاؤه لشدة جلائه والغفلة عنه لإشراق

ضياءه. فسبحان من اختفى عن الخلق لشدة ظهوره، واحتجب عنهم لإشراق نوره. وربما لم يفهم أيضا كنه هذا الكلام

بعض القاصرين، فيفهم من قولنا (إن الله مع كل شيء كالنور مع الأشياء) (أنه في كل مكان؛ تعالى وتقدس عن النسبة

إلى المكان. بل لعل الأبعد عن إثارة هذا الخيال أن نقول إنه قبل كل شيء؛ وإنه فوق كل شيء؛ وإنه مظهر كل شيء.

الفصل الثاني

في بيان مثال المشكاة والمصباح

والزجاجة والشجرة والزيت والنار

ومعرفة هذا يستعدي تقديم قطبين يتسع المجال فيهما إلى غير حد محدود. لكنني أشير إليهما بالرمز والاختصار: أحدهما في بيان سر التمثيل ومنهاجه ووجه ضبط أرواح المعاني بقوالب الأمثلة، ووجه كيفية المناسبة بينها، وكيفية الموازنة بين عالم الشهادة التي منها تتخذ طينة الأمثال، وعالم الملكوت الذي منه تستنزل أرواح المعاني.

والثاني في طبقات أرواح الطينة البشرية ومراتب أنوارها؛ فإن هذا المثال مسوق لبيان ذلك؛ إذ قرأ ابن مسعود (مثل نوره في قلب المؤمن كمشكاة) وقرأ أبي بن كعب: (مثل نور قلب من آمن).

الأول في سر التمثيل ومنهاجه

اعلم أن العالم عالمان: روحاني وجسماني: وإن شئت قلت: حسي وعقلي؛ وإن شئت علوي وسفلي. والكل متقارب، وإنما تختلف باختلاف الاعتبار: فإذا اعتبرتهما في أنفسهما قلت جسماني وروحاني، وإن اعتبرتهما بالإضافة إلى العين المدركة لهما قلت حسي وعقلي. وإن اعتبرتهما بإضافة أحدهما إلى الآخر قلت علوي وسفلي. وربما سميت أحدهما عالم الملك والشهادة والآخر عالم الغيب والملكوت. ومن نظر إلى الحقائق من الألفاظ ربما تحير عند كثرة الألفاظ وتخيل كثرة المعاني. والذي تنكشف له الحقائق يجعل المعاني أصلاً والألفاظ تابعاً. وأمر الضعيف بالعكس؛ إذ يطلب الحقائق من الألفاظ. وإلى الفريقين الإشارة بقوله تعالى: (أَفَمَنْ يَمْشِي مُكِبًّا عَلَى وَجْهِهِ أَهْدَى أَم مَّن يَمْشِي سَوِيًّا عَلَى صِرَاطٍ مُسْتَقِيمٍ).

والسالك للطريق أولا ينتهي إلى ما درجته درجة الكواكب فيتضح له إشراق نوره وينكشف له أن العالم الأسفل بأسره تحت سلطانه وتحت إشراق نوره؛ ويتضح له من جماله وعلو درجته ما يبادر فيقول: (هذا ربي) ثم إذا اتضح له ما فوقه مما رتبته رتبة القمر، رأى دخول الأول في مغرب الهوى بالإضافة إلى ما فوقه فقال: (لا أحب الآفلين) وكذلك يترقى حتى ينتهي إلى ما مثاله الشمس فيراه أكبر وأعلى، فيراه قابلا للمثال بنوع مناسبة له معه. والمناسبة مع ذي النقص نقص وأقول أيضا. فمنه يقول: (وَجْهْتُ وَجْهِي لِلَّذِي فَطَرَ السَّمَوَاتِ وَالْأَرْضَ حَنِيفًا) ومعنى (الذي) إشارة مبهمة لا مناسبة لها: إذ لو قال قائل ما مثال مفهوم (الذي) لم يتصور أن يجاب عنه. فالمتنزه عن كل مناسبة هو الأول الحق. ولذلك لما قال بعض الأعراب لرسول الله صلى الله عليه وسلم: (ما نسب الإله؟) نزل في جوابه (قُلْ هُوَ اللَّهُ أَحَدٌ. اللَّهُ الصَّمَدُ. لَمْ يَلِدْ وَلَمْ يُولَدْ) إلى آخرها، معناه أن التقديس والتنزه عن النسبة نسبته. ولذلك لما قال فرعون لموسى: (وَمَا رَبُّ الْعَالَمِينَ) كالمطالب لماهيته لم يجب إلا بتعريفه بأفعاله، إذ كانت الأفعال أظهر عند السائل فقال: (رَبِّ السَّمَوَاتِ وَالْأَرْضِ)، فقال فرعون لمن حوله (أَلَا تَسْمَعُونَ) كالمنكر عليه في عدوله في جوابه عن طلب الماهية، فقال موسى: (رَبُّكُمْ وَرَبُّ آبَائِكُمُ الْأُولِينَ) فنسبه فرعون إلى الجنون إذ كان مطلبه المثال والماهية؛ وهو يجيب عن الأفعال، فقال: (إِنَّ رَسُولَكُمْ الَّذِي أُرْسِلَ إِلَيْكُمْ لَمَجْنُونٌ).

منظوم فمثاله (الصورة) وإن كان يوجد للصورة الإنسانية نوع ترتيب على هذه الشاكلة، فهي على صورة الرحمن. وفرق بين أن يقال (على صورة الرحمن) وبين أن يقال (على صورة الله) لأن الرحمة الإلهية هي التي صورت الحضرة الإلهية بهذه الصورة.

ثم أنعم على آدم فأعطاه صورة مختصرة جامعة لجميع أصناف ما في العالم حتى كأنه كل ما في العالم أو هو نسخة من العالم مختصرة. وصورة آدم- أعني هذه الصورة- مكتوبة بخط الله. فهو الخط الإلهي الذي ليس برقم حروف، إذ تنزه خطه عن أن يكون رقما وحروفا كما تنزه كلامه عن أن يكون صوتا وحرفا، وقلمه عن أن يكون خشبا وقصبا، ويده عن أن تكون لحما وعظما. ولولا هذه الرحمة لعجز الآدمي عن معرفة ربه: إذ لا يعرف ربه إلا من عرف نفسه. فلما كان هذا من آثار الرحمة صار على صورة الرحمن لا على صورة الله: فإن حضرة الإلهية غير حضرة الرحمة وغير حضرة الملك وغير حضرة الربوبية. ولذلك أمر بالعباد بجميع هذه الحضرات فقال: (قُلْ أَعُوذُ بِرَبِّ النَّاسِ، مَلِكِ النَّاسِ، إِلَهِ النَّاسِ) ولولا هذا المعنى لكان ينبغي أن يقول على صورته واللفظ الوارد في الحديث الصحيح على صورة الرحمن. ولأن تمييز حضرة الملك عن الإلهية والربوبية يستدعي شرحا طويلا فلنتجاوز، ويكفيك من الأنموذج هذا القدر، فإن هذا بحر لا ساحل له. فإن وجدت في نفسك نفورا عن هذه الأمثال فآن قلبك بقوله تعالى: (أَنْزَلَ مِنَ السَّمَاءِ مَاءً فَسَالَتْ أَوْدِيَةٌ بِقَدَرِهَا) الآية، وأنه كيف ورد في التفسير أن الماء هو المعرفة والقرآن والأودية القلوب.

لا تظنن من هذا النموذج وطريق ضرب المثال رخصة مني في رفع الظاهر واعتقادا في إبطالها حتى أقول مثلاً لم يكن مع موسى نعلان، ولم يسمع الخطاب بقوله: (اخلع نعليك) حاش لله فإن إبطال الظواهر رأى الباطنية الذين نظروا بالعين العوراء إلى أحد العالمين ولم يعرفوا الموازنة بين العالمين، ولم يفهموا وجهه. كما أن إبطال الأسرار مذهب الحشوية. فالذي يجرد الظاهر حشوى، والذي يجرد الباطن باطني. والذي يجمع بينهما كامل. ولذلك قال عليه السلام: (للقرآن ظاهر وباطن وحدٌ ومطلع) وربما نقل هذا عن عليٍّ موقوفاً عليه. بل أقول فهم موسى من الأمر بخلع النعلين اطراح الكونين فامتثل الأمر ظاهراً بخلع نعليه، وباطناً باطراح العالمين. وهذا هو (الاعتبار) أي العبور من الشيء إلى غيره، ومن الظاهر إلى السر. وفرق بين من يسمع قول رسول الله صلى الله عليه وسلم: (لا يدخل الملائكة بيتاً فيه كلب) فيقتنى الكلب في البيت ويقول ليس الظاهر مراداً، بل المراد تخلية بيت القلب عن كلب الغضب لأنه يمنع المعرفة التي هي من أنوار الملائكة: إذا الغضب غول العقل، وبين من يمتثل الأمر في الظاهر ثم يقول: الكلب ليس كلباً لصورته بل لمعناه - وهو السبعية والضراوة - وإذا كان حفظ البيت الذي هو مقر الشخص والبدن واجبا عن صورة الكلب، فبأن يجب حفظ بيت القلب - وهو مقر الجوهر الحقيقي الخاص - عن شر الكلبة أولى. فأنا أجمع بين الظاهر والسر جميعاً، فهذا هو الكامل: وهو المعنى بقولهم (الكامل من لا يطفئ نور معرفته نور ورعه) ولذلك ترى الكامل لا تسمح نفسه بترك حد من حدود الشرع مع كمال البصيرة. وهذه مغلطة منها وقع بعض السالكين إلى الإباحة وطى بساط الأحكام ظاهراً، حتى أنه ترك أحدهم الصلاة وزعم أنه دائماً في الصلاة بسره. وهذا سوى مغلطة الحمقى من الإباحية الذين مأخذهم ترهات كقول بعضهم (إن الله غني عن عملنا) وقول بعضهم إن الباطن مشحون بالخبائث ليس يمكن تركيته ولا يطمع في استئصال الغضب والشهوة لظنه أنه مأمور باستئصالها: وهذه حماقات.

فأما ما ذكرناه فهو كبوة جواد وهفوة سالك حسده الشيطان فدلاًه بجبل الغرور. وأرجع إلى حديث النعلين فأقول:

ظاهر خلع النعلين منبه على ترك الكونين. فالمثال في الظاهر حق وأدائه إلى السر الباطن حقيقة. وأهل هذا التنبيه هم

الذين بلغوا درجة الزجاجة كما سيأتي معنى الزجاجة؛ لأن الخيال الذي من طبيئته يتخذ المثال صلب كثيف يحجب

إذا قال الرسول عليه السلام: (رأيت عبد الرحمن بن عوف يدخل الجنة حبوا) فلا تظن أنه لم يشاهده بالبصر كذلك، بل رآه في يقظته كما يراه النائم في نومه؛ وإن كان عبد الرحمن مثلاً نائماً في بيته بشخصه، فإن النوم إنما أثر في أمثال هذه المشاهدات لقهره سلطان الحواس عن النور الباطن الإلهي، فإن الحواس شاغلة له وجاذبة إياه إلى عالم الحس، وصارفة وجهه عن عالم الغيب والملكوت. وبعض الأنوار النبوية قد يستعلي ويستولي بحيث لا تستجره الحواس إلى عالمها ولا تشغله، فيشاهد في اليقظة ما يشاهد غيره في المنام. ولكنه إذا كان في غاية الكمال لم يقتصر إدراكه على محض الصورة المبصرة، بل عبر منها إلى السر فانكشف له أن الإيمان جاذب إلى العالم الذي يعبر عنه بالجنة؛ والغنى والثروة جاذب إلى الحياة الحاضرة وهي العالم الأسفل. فإن كان الجاذب إلى أشغال الدنيا أقوى أو مقاوماً للجاذب الآخر صد

في بيان مراتب الأرواح

البشرية النورانية إذ بمعرفتها تعرف أمثلة القرآن

فالأول منها الروح الحساس وهو الذي يتلقى ما تورده الحواس الخمس، وكأنه أصل الروح الحيواني وأوله، إذ به يصير الحيوان حيواناً. وهو موجود للصبي الرضيع.

الثاني الروح الخيالي، وهو الذي يستثبت ما أورده الحواس ويحفظه مخزوناً عنده ليعرضه على الروح العقلي الذي فوقه عند الحاجة إليه. وهذا لا يوجد للصبي الرضيع في بداية نشوئه: ولذلك يولع بالشيء ليأخذه، فإذا غاب عنه ينساه ولا تنازعه نفسه إليه إلى أن يكبر قليلاً فيصير بحيث إذا غُيب عنه بكى وطلب ذلك لبقاء صورته محفوظة في خياله. وهذا قد يوجد لبعض الحيوانات دون بعض، ولا يوجد للفراش المتهافت على النار لأنه يقصد النار لشغفه بضياء النهار: فيظن أن السراج كوة مفتوحة إلى موضع الضياء فيلقي نفسه عليه فيتأذى به. لكنه إذا جاوزه وحصل في الظلمة عاوده مرة بعد مرة. ولو كان له الروح الحافظ المستثبت لما أداه الحس إليه من الألم لما عاوده بعد أن تضرر مرة به فالكلب إذا ضرب مرة بخشبة، فإذا رأى الخشبة بعد ذلك من بعد هرب.

الرابع الروح الفكري، وهو الذي يأخذ العلوم العقلية المحضة فيوقع بينها تأليفات وازدواجات ويستنتج منها معارف

شريفة. ثم إذا استفاد نتيجتين مثلاً، ألف بينهما مرة أخرى واستفاد نتيجة أخرى. ولا يزال يتزايد كذلك إلى غير نهاية.

الخامس الروح القدسي النبوي الذي يختص به الأنبياء وبعض الأولياء، وفيه تتجلى لوائح الغيب وأحكام الآخرة وجملة

من معارف ملكوت السموات والأرض، بل من المعارف الربانية التي يقصر دونها الروح العقلي والفكري. وإليه الإشارة

بقوله تعالى: (وَكَذَلِكَ أَوْحَيْنَا إِلَيْكَ رُوحاً مِّنْ أَمْرِنَا مَا كُنْتَ تَدْرِي مَا الْكِتَابُ وَلَا الْإِيمَانُ، وَلَكِنْ جَعَلْنَاهُ نَوْراً تَهْدِي بِهِ)

الآية. فلا يبعد أيها العاكف في عالم العقل أن يكون وراء العقل طور آخر يظهر فيه ما لا يظهر في العقل، كما لا يبعد

كون العقل طورا وراء التمييز والإحساس تنكشف فيه غرائب وعجائب يقصر عنها الإحساس والتمييز. ولا تجعل أقصى الكمال وقفا على نفسك. وإن أردت مثالا مما نشاهده من جملة خواص بعض البشر فانظر إلى ذوق الشعر كيف يختص به قوم من الناس وهو نوع إحساس وإدراك، ويحرم عنه بعضهم حتى لا تتميز عندهم الألحان الموزونة من المنزحفة. وانظر كيف عظمت قوة الذوق في طائفة حتى استخرجوا بها الموسيقى والأغاني والأوتار وصنوف الدستانات التي منها المحزن ومنها المطرب ومنها المنوم ومنها المضحك ومنها المجنن ومنها القاتل، ومنها الموجب للغشى. وإنما تقوى هذه الآثار فيمن له أصل الذوق. وأما العاقل عن خاصية الذوق فيشارك في سماع الصوت وتضعف فيه هذه الآثار، وهو يتعجب من صاحب الوجد والشغى. ولو اجتمع العقلاء كلهم من أرباب الذوق على تفهيمه معنى الذوق لم يقدروا عليه.

اعلم أن القول في موازنة هذه الأرواح الخمسة للمشكاة والزجاجة والمصباح والشجرة والزيت يمكن تطويله، لكنني أوجزه وأقتصر على التنبيه على طريقه فأقول: أما الروح الحساس فإذا نظرت إلى خاصيته وجدت أنواره خارجة من ثقب عدة كالعينين والأذنين والمنخرين وغيرها. وأوفق مثال له من عالم الشهادة المشكاة. وأما الروح الخيالي فنجد له خواص ثلاثاً: إحداهما: أنه من طينة العالم السفلي الكثيف: لأن الشيء المتخيل ذو مقدار وشكل وجهات محصورة مخصوصة. وهو على نسبة من المتخيل من قرب أو بعد. ومن شأن الكثيف الموصوف بأوصاف الأجسام أن يحجب عن الأنوار العقلية المحضة التي تنتزه عن الوصف بالجهات والمقادير والقرب والبعد. الثانية: أن هذا الخيال الكثيف إذا صفى ودقق وهذب وضبط صار موازياً للمعاني العقلية ومؤدياً لأنوارها، غير حائل عن إشراق نورها منها. الثالثة: أن الخيال في بداية الأمر محتاج إليه جداً ليضبط به المعارف العقلية فلا تضطرب ولا تتزلزل ولا تنتشر انتشاراً يخرج

وإذا كانت هذه كلها أنواراً بعضها فوق بعض فبالحرى أن تكون نورا هذا المثال إنما يتضح لقلوب المؤمنين أو لقلوب الأنبياء والأولياء لا لقلوب الكفار: فإن النور يراد للهداية. فالمصروف عن طريق الهدى باطل وظلمة، بل أشد من الظلمة: لأن الظلمة لا تهدي إلى الباطل كما لا تهدي إلى الحق. وعقول الكفار انتكست، وكذلك سائر إدراكاتهم

وتعاونت على الإضلال في حقهم. فمثالهم كرجل في (بَحْرٍ لُجِّيٍّ يَغْشَاهُ مَوْجٌ مِّنْ فَوْقِهِ مَوْجٌ مِّنْ فَوْقِهِ سَحَابٌ ظُلُمَاتٌ بَعْضُهَا فَوْقَ بَعْضٍ) والبحر واللجِّي هو الدنيا بما فيها من الأخطار المهلكة والأشغال المردية والكدورات المعمية. والموج الأول موج الشهوات الداعية إلى الصفات البهيمية والإشتغال بالذات الحسية وقضاء الأوطار الدنيوية حتى إنهم يأكلون ويتمتعون كما تأكل الأنعام. وبالحرى أن يكون هذا الموج مظلماً لأن حب الشيء يعمى ويصم. والموج الثاني موج الصفات السبعية الباعثة على الغضب والعداوة والبغضاء والحقد والحسد والمباهاة والتفاخر والتكاثر. وبالحرى أن يكون مظلماً لأن الغضب غول العقل. وبالحرى أن يكون هو الموج الأعلى: لأن الغضب في الأكثر مستول على الشهوات حتى إذا هاج أذهل عن الشهوات وأغفل عن اللذات المشتهاة. وأما الشهوة فلا تقاوم الغضب الهائج أصلاً. وأما السحاب فهو الاعتقادات الخبيثة، والظنون الكاذبة، والخيالات الفاسدة التي صارت حجباً بين الكافرين وبين الإيمان ومعرفة الحق والاستضاءة بنور شمس القرآن والعقل: فإن خاصية السحاب أن يحجب إشراق نور الشمس.

في معنى قوله عليه السلام

إن لله سبعين حجاباً من نور وظلمة

لو كشفها لأحرقت سبحات وجهه كل من أدركه بصره

وفي بعض الروايات سبعمائة، وفي بعضها سبعين ألفاً: فأقول: إن الله تعالى متجل في ذاته لذاته، ويكون الحجاب بالإضافة إلى محجوب لا محالة؛ وإن المحجوبين من الخلق ثلاثة أقسام: منهم من حجب بمجرد الظلمة؛ ومنهم من حجب بالنور المحض؛ ومنهم من حجب بنور مقرون بظلمة. وأصناف هذه الأقسام كثيرة أتتقق كثرتها، ويمكنني أن أتكلف حصرها في سبعين، لكن لا أثق بما يلوح لي من تحديد وحصر، إذ لا أدري أنه المراد بالحديث أم لا. أما الحصر إلى سبعمائة وسبعين ألفاً فذلك لا يستقل به إلا القوة النبوية، مع أن ظاهر ظني أن هذه الأعداد المذكورة للتكثير لا للتحديد؛ وقد تجري العادة بذكر عدد ولا يراد به الحصر بل التكثير. والله أعلم بتحقيق ذلك، فذلك خارج عن الوسع. وإنما الذي يمكنني الآن أن أعرفك هذه الأقسام وبعض أصناف كل قسم فأقول:

وفرقة رابعة ترقى عن جهالة هؤلاء وتعاقلت، وزعمت أن أعظم السعادات في اتساع الجاه والصيت وانتشار الذكر وكثرة

الأتباع ونفوذ الأمر المطاع. فتراها لا هم لها إلا المراءاة وعمارة مطارح أبصار الناظرين حتى إن الواحد قد يجوع في بيته

ويحتمل الضر ويصرف ماله إلى ثياب يتجمل بها عند خروجه كي لا ينظر إليه بعين الحقارة. وأصناف هؤلاء لا يحصون،

وكلهم محجوبون عن الله تعالى بمحض الظلمة، وهي نفوسهم المظلمة.

ولا معنى لذكر آحاد الفرق بعد وقوع التنبيه على الأجناس. ويدخل في جملة هؤلاء جماعة يقولون بلسانهم (لا إله إلا

الله)، لكن ربما حملهم على ذلك خوف أو استظهار بالمسلمين وتحمل بهم أو استمداد من مالهم؛ أو لأجل التعصب

لنصرة مذهب الآباء. فهؤلاء إذا لم تحملهم هذه الكلمة على العمل الصالح فلا تخرجهم الكلمة من الظلمات إلى النور،

بل (أولياؤهم الطاغوت يُخْرِجُونَهُمْ مِنَ النُّورِ إِلَى الظُّلُمَاتِ). أما من أثرت فيه الكلمة بحيث ساءت سيئته وسرته حسنته

فهو خارج عن محض الظلمة وإن كان كثيرا المعصية.

القسم الثاني

طائفة حجبوا بنور مقرون بظلمة وهم ثلاثة أصناف: صنف منشأ ظلمتهم من الحس، وصنف منشأ ظلمتهم من الخيال، وصنف منشأ ظلمتهم من مقاييسات عقلية فاسدة.

الصنف الأول المحجوبون بالظلمة الحسية وهم طوائف لا يخلو واحد منهم عن مجاوزة الالتفات إلى نفسه وعن التأله والتشوف إلى معرفة ربه. وأول درجاتهم عبدة الأوثان وآخرهم الثنوية، وبينهما درجات. فالطائفة الأولى عبدة الأوثان: علموا على الجملة أن لهم ربا يلزمهم إثارة على نفوسهم المظلمة، واعتقدوا أن ربهم أعز من كل شيء ولكن حجبهم ظلمة الحس عن أن يجاوزوا العالم المحسوس فاتخذوا من أنفس الجواهر كالذهب والفضة والياقوت أشخاصا مصورة بأحسن الصور واتخذوها آلهة. فهؤلاء محجوبون بنور العزة والجمال، والعزة والجمال من صفات الله وأنواره، ولكنهم ألصقوها بالأجسام المحسوسة وصدهم عن ذلك ظلمة الحس، فإن الحس ظلمة بالإضافة إلى العالم الروحاني العقلي كما سبق. الطائفة الثانية جماعة من أقاصي الترك ليس لهم ملة ولا شريعة يعتقدون أن لهم ربا وأنه أجمل الأشياء، فإذا رأوا إنسانا في

لكن لم يمكنهم مجاوزة الخيال، فعبدوا موجودا قاعدا على العرش. وأخسهم رتبة المجسمة ثم أصناف الكرامية بأجمعهم. ولا

يمكنني شرح مقالاتهم ومذاهبهم فلا فائدة في التكاثر. لكن أرفعهم درجة من نفى الجسمية وجميع عوارضها إلا الجهة

المخصوصة بجهة فوق: لأن الذي لا ينسب إلى الجهات ولا يوصف بأنه خارج العالم ولا داخله لم يكن عندهم موجودا إذ

لم يكن متخيلا. ولم يدركوا أن أول درجات المعقولات تجاوز النسبة إلى الجهات. الصنف الثالث المحجوبون بالأنوار الإلهية مقرونة بمقاييس عقلية فاسدة مظلمة فعبدوا إلهها سميعا بصيرا متكلمة عالما قادرا مريدا حيا، منزها عن الجهات، لكن فهموا هذه الصفات على حسب مناسبة صفاتهم. وربما صرّح بعضهم فقال: (كلامه صوت وحرف ككلامنا) وربما ترقى بعضهم فقال: (لا بل هو كحديث نفسنا ولا هو صوت ولا حرف) وكذلك إذا طولبوا بحقيقة السمع والبصر والحياة رجعوا إلى التشبيه من حيث المعنى وإن أنكروها باللفظ إذ لم يدركوا أصلا معاني هذه الإطلاقات في حق الله تعالى. ولذلك قالوا في إرادته إنها حادثة مثل إرادتنا. وإنها طلب وقصد مثل قصدنا. وهذه مذاهب مشهورة فلا حاجة إلى تفصيلها. فهؤلاء محجوبون بجملة من الأنوار مع ظلمة المقاييس العقلية. فهؤلاء أصناف القسم الثاني الذين حجبوا بنور مقرون بظلمة. وبالله التوفيق.

أو بالخيال أو بمقايضة العقل، أو بالنور المحض كما سبق. فهذا ما حضرني في جواب هذه الأسئلة، مع أن السؤال صادفني والفكر متقسم، والخاطر متشعب، والهم إلى غيرها هذا الفن منصرف، ومقترحي عليه أن يسأل الله تعالى العفو عما طغى به القلم، أو زلت به القدم؛ فإن خوض غمرة الأسرار الإلهية خطير، واستشفاف الأنوار الإلهية من وراء الحجب البشرية عسير غير يسير.

Seeing With Three Eyes

Ibn al-ʿArabī's barzakh and the Contemporary World Situation

Abstract

The author of this paper attempts to write about the mystery of the barzakh in and from Ibn al-ʿArabī's perspective. Ibn al-ʿArabī's perspective observes things from three dimensions: the two dimensions of the positive and negative, which are familiar to us by means of our ordinary binary perception, and in addition the third dimension that belongs neither to the one, nor to the other. This is the dimension of the barzakh, which can be called tertiary, since it is unitive and inclusive of the two familiar dimensions. "Seeing" the third dimension of the barzakh is not accessible to ordinary binary perception; it is accessible, according to Ibn al-ʿArabī, only to those who possess a special kind of seeing; they are the ahl al-kashf, those who "see" with three eyes, as it were. Nevertheless, between the binary and the tertiary/unitive perceptions there is a pervasive tension of relatedness. It is a dynamic tension that makes its mark on all levels of existence, whether consciously or unconsciously. In other words, although the barzakh belongs to the dimension of the mysterious "third", it is powerfully present and influential all around. It manifests itself as the cognitive function that Ibn al-ʿArabī calls 'imagination' (al-khayāl). For him, the barzakh-imagination is the most powerful cognitive function in the human makeup, and it hinges on a paradox: it makes everything that it conceives an "it/not it". God, too, from this perspective, is "He/not He". Following from the cognitive field that evolves from the tertiary-barzakh-imaginative perspective, I consider the notion coincidentia oppositorum ('the union of the opposites', al-jamʿ bayna al-ḡiddayn). Finally, I apply the insights stemming from Ibn al-ʿArabī's perspective to the question of 'identities' and to the ethical dilemmas of our contemporary world.

Muḥyī al-Dīn Muḥammad ibn ʿAlī Ibn al-ʿArabī,¹ known also as al-Shaykh al-akbar (the Great Master), was born in Murcia in 1165 to a respectable Andalusian family. In his twenties, probably in Seville, he was formally initiated into the Sufi Path, and, during many years and in several localities, studied with several Sufi teachers, among them women. However, he claimed to be, and has thus been considered, an Uwaisī, that is to say, a mystic, whose inspiration and training in the deepest sense have come not from an earthly master, but from al-Khaḍir (= al-Khiḍr), the undying teacher of those who do not have a flesh-and-blood one.² In 1200, already widely known as a stimulating spiritual authority with several literary works to his name, he left al-Andalus and the West for the Islamic East. After much traveling, he settled in Damascus, where he died in 1240. During his wandering years, he started working on his huge opus, The Meccan Revelations (al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiyya). This, as well as the Bezels of Wisdom (Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam) – the work on the cosmic panorama of prophets and prophecy – were completed in Damascus during the last years of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s life.³

At the threshold of writing this paper, I stand perplexed; who would not, in view of the formidable corpus of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s works,⁴ and the daunting volume of the scholarly discussions on him.⁵ But the bulk of these literary corpora is the least of my concerns; it is IA’s visionary perspective in front of which I stand perplexed. IA is a master of creating unique, grand patterns – conceptual as well as linguistic – by interlacing diverse themes and syntactical patterns together. Unravelling his complex and interconnected lacework and sorting out neatly its fine threads, often results in an obfuscated view, unwieldy style and watered-down account. Still, the work of scholars is precisely this: to sort, classify, paraphrase, compare, analyze, and reduce. Moreover, whereas IA’s writing stems from an inclusive, visionary perspective that transcends conventional forms and structures, his interpreter, by definition, must limit her reproductions to the level of the familiar and comprehensible. This is bound to be frustrating, especially when the binary cognition of the interpreter is the tool by which she faces IA’s barzakh, what I have termed his tertiary-imaginative vision. Is scholarly hermeneutics suitable at all to review a visionary writing such as IA’s? Can we see what he sees in the unitive perspective from which he sees it?⁶

IA often warns his readers that to understand what he is writing, one should be either a ‘mystic’, that is, one who possesses visionary seeing (min ahl al-kashf), or a pure and simple believer (min al-mu’minīn). Those who belong to either of these two groups may follow his view without speculative argumentations or sophisticated interpretations.⁷ But for most, the experience of reading him will result in the perplexity (ḥayra) about which I am complaining.⁸ Out of frustration and perplexity the interpreter may relegate IA’s writing to the category of apophysis, the language of unsaying, of paradox, of negative theology. But would such a classification help make the objects of IA’s vision satisfyingly meaningful?

For all these inhibitions, I ask myself why not give up, from the outset, writing on IA, either in general or on any specific theme. Well, there is an answer and it is simple: his writing is magnetically captivating and his visionary perspective alluring; not unlike a detective’s obsession with deciphering the mystery behind a complex crime. His daring syntactical structures and the intricacy and mistiness of his writing seem to suggest that behind them hides a field of truths (ḥaqā’iq) and meanings (ma’ānī) worth unravelling; if only one could see it with IA’s eyes.

One mystery in particular has lured me to search for a meaning. It concerns IA’s mysterious barzakh, the middle, the ‘third’ principle which challenges and even overrides the binary structure of our cognitive faculties. Through their in-built predilection to hover between the ‘yes’ and the ‘no’, between viewing something as ‘positive’ and its opposite as ‘negative’, between an ‘I’ and an ‘other’, our conceptions and ideologies, even the most precious among them, are built on dichotomies. IA's barzakh is that fine line, which belongs neither to the side of the 'yes' nor to the side of the 'no'. How are we to conceive it? And, since our minds are bound by spatial configurations – where is this line to be found? Sensing that at the heart of the barzakh nests the key to IA's all-embracing outlook, I have been driven, despite my inhibitions, to ponder this enigma from Ibn al-'Arabī's perspective; to enter his mind, as it were.

In my attempt at making some sense of these questions, I have found it helpful to juxtapose various passages from IA's writing and use them as road signs. I shall start by introducing the barzakh in IA's own words. In chapter 72 of The Meccan Revelations (= al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiyya), he writes:

"The 'middle', that which separates between two sides and makes them distinguished from one another, is more hidden than they are (akhfā minhumā). For example, the line that separates between the shadow and the sun; or the barrier (barzakh) between the two seas – the sweet one and the bitter one; or that which separates between black and white. We know that there is a separating line there, but the eye does not perceive it; the intellect acknowledges it, though it does not conceive of what it is, namely, it does not conceive its 'whatness' (quiddity)."³

By "the two seas" IA alludes to "the sweet one and the bitter one" of the Qur'ānic verse 25:53. The verse runs as follows:

"And it is He who has released the two seas, one fresh and sweet and one salty and bitter, and He placed between them a barrier (wa-jā'ala baynahumā barzakhān) and a prohibiting partition."

These two seas, undeniably, are contrary to one another, entirely different from one another, characterized by opposite attributes, yet contiguous, sharing an imaginary line, which keeps them apart and prevents their waters from mixing. The features of "sweet water" versus "bitter water" are thus kept intact thanks to a barzakh, which IA describes as "more hidden than they are". What is, and where is, this "hidden" line that carries out concurrently two contradictory functions – separating between two opposites yet holding them together?

The “two seas” of the Q. 25:53 are obviously associated with the “the two seas” of the Q. 18:60. The group of verses 60–82 of Sura 18, the Sura of the Cave (sūrat al-kahf), presents one of the most enigmatic passages in the Qur’ān. The protagonist of this Qur’ānic passage is Moses. He and his servant are supposed to meet an enigmatic person, whom God names “one of Our servants” (‘abdan min ‘ibādīnā) and to whom God has given special knowledge (‘allamnāhu min ladunnā ‘ilman [18:65]). The meeting place is identified only as being “the confluence of the two seas” (majma‘ al-baḥrayn). Apparently – the Qur’ānic verses are not explicit about this – Moses sets out to seek the enigmatic servant of God¹⁰ at this wondrous place in order to learn from him the divine knowledge (al-‘ilm al-ladunnī) bestowed on him. This is why Moses is resolved to search for this person until he reaches “where the two seas meet (majma‘ al-baḥrayn)”, though, he vows, “I may march on for ages”. Moses thus sets out to face three mysteries: a place, a person and knowledge; and all these as a preamble to the later stage of his search, in which he will have to face odd, seemingly unreasonable and unjust deeds performed by this servant of God (see verses 66–82). Indeed Sura 18 is replete with wonders and enigmas,¹¹ and thus concurs with IA’s pursuit of the extraordinary and mysterious barzakh.

The enigmatic barzakh of the Qur’ānic verses is, from IA’s perspective, a paradox, a contradiction in terms: “that which separates between two sides and makes them distinguished from one another” and yet, “is more hidden than they are”. “More hidden”, that is to say, belongs to an imperceptible dimension, the dimension of the unseen, or that which can be revealed only by means of the ‘imagination’ (al-khayāl). Here, in paradoxical terms, is how IA describes the barzakh in chapter 63 of The Meccan Revelations:

“Since the barzakh is something that separates what is knowable and what is unknowable (ma’lūm wa-ghayr ma’lūm); non-existent (ma’dūm) and existent (mawjūd); intelligible and un-intelligible (ma’qūl wa-ghayr ma’qūl); negated (manfiyy) and affirmed (muthbat) – it has been given the term barzakh. In itself it is intelligible (ma’qūl), though there is nothing there but imagination (khayāl) [...]. For imagination is neither existent nor non-existent; neither known nor unknown; neither negated nor affirmed.”¹²

By endorsing the linguistic, or ‘nominal’, validity of the barzakh (“it has been given the term barzakh”, summiya barzakhan iṣṭilāḥan), IA asserts that it has an ontic existence of sorts,¹³ while immediately negating it:

“When you grasp it, being intelligent, you will know that you have grasped an existent thing (adrakta shay‘an wujūdiyyan) on which your gaze has fallen, while you [also] know categorically, with proof (qaṭ‘an bi-dalīl), that there is nothing there to begin with and in principle (ra‘ṣan wa-aṣlan); what is this thing for which you have affirmed an ontic existence (shay‘iyya wujūdiyya) and at the moment of your affirmation you have denied it?”¹⁴

With such contradictory attributes of the barzakh and the perception of it, IA takes us to the field of paradox and apophysis, to the “mystical languages of unsaying”, to borrow the phrasing of Michael Sells’ brilliant title.¹⁵ But beyond this comparative classification, may we not consider the meaning of the epistemological and existential challenges with which IA presents us in these passages? May we not ask how to ‘see’ the barzakh, while with our binary perception we can only perceive the contrasting features of objects such as “the two seas”? And consequently, how to know what is between, or beyond, the two seas? Is there anything beyond our binary perception and, if so, what is it? And another question lurks in the vision of the barzakhi confluence of the two seas: from this ‘third-dimensional’ perspective, do the separate identities of the “two seas” merge and annihilate in the barzakh, and hence lose their identifying individual features of “sweetness” and “bitterness”; or are their ontological identities kept intact notwithstanding such conflation? IA, it seems to me, encourages us to ponder these questions, since, by saying “When you grasp it, being intelligent, you will know...” (ch. 63), as well as “the intellect acknowledges it, though it does not conceive of what it is, namely, it does not conceive of its ‘whatness’” (ch. 72), he suggests that the ‘intellect’ can grasp something of this tertian universe, at least the enigma behind our existential-epistemological grasp of reality.

In my attempt to grasp the elusive barzakh that emerges from the Qur’ānic passages above, I muse over another facet of its polar nature and ask: Being a majmaʿ, is the barzakh a ‘coincidence of opposites’? Can we qualify it with this concept borrowed from the field of the study of religions?¹⁶ On the linguistic level, al-jamʿ bayna al-diddayn is precisely identical to the Latin term coincidentia oppositorum. Looked at from the Arabic terminology, majmaʿ (as in majmaʿ al-bahrayn) shares the root j-m- with jamʿ. Lexically, majmaʿ denotes a place of coming together and jamʿ the act of gathering and holding diverse things together, as well as the state that results from such an act – collectedness, aggregation, unity. In IA’s writing, jamʿ and its antonym farq (separation, differentiation) are cardinal concepts upon which his understanding of the God-Creation relationship is built. Their juxtaposition indicates indeed a coincidence of opposites.¹⁷ Notably, IA often quotes a saying which he ascribes to the ninth-century Sufi Abū Saʿīd al-Kharrāz. When Abū Saʿīd was asked “By what means have you known God?”, he answered:

Islamic tradition identifies this person with Khadr/Khiḍr; in the Sufi tradition, Khiḍr is the divine teacher of those who do not have a flesh-and-blood one. For jamʿ and farq (also tafriqa) in Sufi technical terminology, see, e.g., [Abū al-Ḥasan Hujwīrī, ʿAlī ibn ʿUthmān] The Kashf al-Mahjūb: The Oldest Persian Treatise on Sufism by ʿAlī B. Uthmān al-Jullābī al-Hujwīrī, trans. by Reynold A. Nicholson, London: Luzac, 1976, pp. 251–260 et passim. On the topic of ‘coincidence of opposites’, see Sara Sviri, “Between Fear and Hope: On the Coincidence of Opposites in Islamic Mysticism”, Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam, No. 9, 1987, pp. 316–349.

Then he recited:

“He is the First and the Last, the Apparent and the Hidden, (huwa al-awwal wa-l-ākhir wa-l-ẓāhir wa-l-bāṭin) and He has knowledge of all things (Q. 57:3).”¹⁸

So how does IA perceive the ‘coincidence’? How does he perceive the nature of reality in the realm of the barzakh? What happens to the differentiated identities which are held there together? Or does he leave it out of his existential map as a transcendent territory to which no man has access? In pursuing these questions, I find help in another passage from The Meccan Revelations.

Chapter 24 of The Meccan Revelations is not a long chapter, but it has a lengthy title. Here is the rendering of its first part: “The Twenty-Fourth Chapter Concerning the Knowledge that derives from the Ontological Sciences (... jā’at ‘an al-‘ulūm al-kawniyya) and the Wonders that it Contains”.¹⁹ Indeed, the chapter deals with various ‘ontological’ themes that can be cumulatively described as concerning the relationship of God – qua King and Owner (mālik) – with man and the world – qua kingdom and property (mulk) subsumed under God’s kingship and ownership. But the picture that IA paints in this chapter is not of a hierarchical relationship; what interests him specifically is the fate of the ‘property’, the ‘owned’, the ‘created’ within this interwoven existence. Or, to put it differently: how can the ‘property’ hold on to its differentiated, individual identity and attributes within such a close-knit relationship with its ‘owner’? Here, towards the last third of the chapter, IA introduces another concept worth contemplating: God’s ‘expansiveness’ (al-tawassu’ al-ilāhī). He writes:

“God’s expansiveness (al-ittisā’ al-ilāhī) entails that ‘God is He who gave everything its creation’ (Q. 20:50) and distinguished each and every thing in this world by this [creative] decree. He is he who distinguished it from any other; this is the [individual] unity of each and every thing; hence, no two things are merged in one mixture (fa-mā ijtama’a ithnāni fī mizāj wāhid). [...] There is nothing but the [individual] unity of each and every thing; never do two things merge where differentiation has occurred [...]. From this point you will know [how] the large can mount the small and the broad the narrow without the broad becoming narrow or the narrow broad; in other words: nothing in their [contrasting] states changes [...].”²⁰ Concerning this, Abū Sa’īd al-Kharrāz said: ‘God is only known by bringing opposites together.’ Then he recited: ‘He is the First and the Last, the Apparent and the Hidden’ (Q. 57:3). He meant from one face (min wajh wāhid), not from diverse references (min nisab mukhtalifa).”²¹

In this extraordinary passage IA asserts the singular individuality and particularity of every existing thing. Every created thing is unique. God does not clone. Hence, nothing really merges with anything to the point of losing one’s pre-ordained individual and distinct identity. Unlike some theologians and philosophers, IA does not subscribe to the theory of generalized, abstract, isolated ‘ideas’ as the transcendent exempla of all that is. Everything that is has its own individual blueprint and its existence is concrete and tangible inasmuch as its fullness is hidden and unknown. Nothing is the same as anything else. And yet all are embraced by God, who thus becomes known, according to Al-Kharrāz’s saying and the supporting Qur’ānic proof, as a coincidentia oppositorum. This is the embrace of the ‘First-Last-Apparent-Hidden’ totality in an inclusive unity of polar opposites. This unity is “the one face” by which God is known, not unlike the proverbial elephant who, in order to be known qua ‘elephant’, must be known through all its parts and members.²² At the same time, none of the individual attributes is obliterated in this ‘knowing’. Each and every thing has its place in the unity of opposites. Thus, the coincidentia oppositorum is not a fuzzy mixture of different aspects or attributes, but a unity in which diverse parts co-exist. Such unity in all its fullness, suggests IA, is the paradigm for everything that is, and it allows for wonders and possibilities beyond the grasp of the binary thought.

The ethical implications of this vision are far-reaching, especially at the global moment in which this essay is written. There is nothing more remote in this moment than the vision of a coincidence of opposites seen from the tertiary dimension of Ibn al-‘Arabī’s barzakh. Ours is a world of binary thinking, dichotomies, polarization, opposing opinions and antagonistic value-systems: ‘right’ is contrary to ‘wrong’; ‘good’ contrary to ‘bad’; ‘just’ to ‘unjust’; ‘sacred’ to ‘profane’. Right, good, just and sacred are praiseworthy; wrong, bad, unjust and profane are blameworthy. In our world-existence, wherever we are, wars of identities and values are raging from unrelenting convictions all-round – right, left and center. Far be it for us is to know how to hold on to our singular, individual identities without devouring the individual identities of others; they seem, to us, set on cancelling us and each one out. Hence, to preserve our identity demands that we defend it against its enemies at all cost; ironically, to the point of sacrificing it. When we tenaciously cling on to what, in our fancy, makes up our ‘identity’, we are perceived as loyal; when, out of the fold, we pledge the viability and validity of other identities, we are perceived as traitors. We pay lip service to the politics of the ‘other’, but culturally, religiously, socially and politically, in the name of ‘identities’ and under the umbrella of values, ideologies and dogmas, a culture of blame, self-righteousness and victimhood thrives. It is never ‘I’ who is responsible for this or that, it is always ‘you’; and so on, and so forth.

The state of dynamic perplexity vis-à-vis the shifting faces of reality, and the practice of ‘seeing with three eyes’ derived from Ibn al-‘Arabī’s vision of the barzakh, suggest that the two-dimensional and binary limits of our cognition miss out on glimpsing a larger, more inclusive and unitive picture. Ibn al-‘Arabī’s perspective teaches that beyond the dichotomies at the root of our cultural, religious, moral and political viewpoints – and even beyond the benign slogans of peace and love – there stretches a larger and wider perspective; if you wish, you can call it ‘mystical’, of a land of marvels, where “the large can mount the small and the broad the narrow without the broad becoming narrow or the narrow broad”.²³ From this perspective, the singularity of all things becomes both an apparent and a marvelous phenomenon. This singularity is not lost within the mesh of variant and contrasting identities; it is never annihilated in what is named the ‘Oneness of Being’ (waḥdat al-wujūd), or the ‘Coincidence of Opposites’ (al-jam’ bayna al-ḍiddayn). The water of the “bitter sea” remains bitter and that of the “sweet sea” sweet. In view of the divine ‘expansiveness’, nothing is lost, for it allows that in each and every thing there exists its singular and concrete existence while co-existing even alongside its opposite.

Videnje trima očima

Ibn al-‘Arabījev barzakh i suvremena svjetska situacija

Sažetak

Autorica ovog rada nastoji pisati o misteriji barzakh u perspektivi Ibn al-‘Arabīja i iz njegove perspektive. Ibn al-‘Arabījeva perspektiva motri stvari iz tri dimenzije: dvije dimenzije pozitivnog i negativnog, koje su nam bliske zbog naše svakidašnje binarne percepcije, i dodatne, treće dimenzije, koja ne pripada ni jednoj ni drugoj. To je dimenzija barzakh, koju možemo nazvati terciarnom jer ona ujedinjuje i uključuje ove dvije poznate dimenzije. »Videnje« treće dimenzije, barzakh, nije dostižno uobičajenoj binarnoj percepciji, nego je dostižno, sukladno Ibn al-‘Arabīju, samo onima koji posjeduju naročitu vrstu videnja; oni su ahl al-kashf, oni koji, takoreći, »vide« trima očima. Ipak, između binarnih i terciarnih/ujedinjujućih percepcija postoji sveprožimajuća veza napetosti. To je dinamična napetost koja obilježava sve stupnjeve postojanja, svjesno ili nesvjesno. Drugim riječima kazano: iako barzakh pripada dimenziji mističnog »trećeg«, snažno je prisutan i utjecajan posvuda. Manifestira se kao kognitivna funkcija koju Ibn al-‘Arabī naziva ‘imaginacijom’ (al-khayāl). Za njega je barzakh-imaginacija najsnažnija kognitivna funkcija u ljudskom ustrojstvu i ona ovisi o paradoksu: ona čini sve što koncipira »to/nije to«. Također, Bog, motren iz ove perspektive, jest »On/nije On«. Kako slijedi iz kognitivnog polja koje nastaje iz terciarne-barzakh-imaginativne perspektive, smatram da je taj pojam coincidentia oppositorum (‘jedinstvo suprotnosti’, al-jam’ bayna al-ḍiddayn). Konačno, primjenjujem uvide koji proistječu iz Ibn al-‘Arabījeve perspektive na pitanje ‘identiteta’ i na etičke dileme našeg suvremenog svijeta.

Sehen mit drei Augen

Ibn al-‘Arabīs barzakh und die zeitgenössische Weltsituation

Zusammenfassung

Die Verfasserin dieses Beitrags macht den Versuch, über das Mysterium von barzakh in und aus Ibn al-‘Arabīs Perspektive zu schreiben. Ibn al-‘Arabīs Blickwinkel beobachtet die Dinge aus drei Dimensionen: zwei Dimensionen des Positiven und Negativen, die uns dank unserer alltäglichen binären Wahrnehmung vertraut sind, und darüber hinaus eine dritte Dimension, die weder der einen noch der anderen angehört. Dies ist die Dimension des barzakh, die man tertiär nennen kann, da sie vereinigend ist und die beiden bekannten Dimensionen einbezieht. Das „Sehen“ der dritten Dimension des barzakh ist nicht erreichbar für gewöhnliche binäre Wahrnehmung; es ist, Ibn al-‘Arabī zufolge, nur für jene realisierbar, die über eine besondere Art des Sehens verfügen; sie sind die ahl al-kashf, also diejenigen, die sozusagen mit drei Augen „sehen“. Nichtsdestoweniger existiert zwischen den binären und den tertiären/vereinigenden Wahrnehmungen eine durchdringende Spannung der Verwandtschaft. Es ist eine dynamische Spannung, die auf allen Ebenen der Existenz, ob bewusst oder unbewusst, ihre Spuren hinterlässt. Mit anderen Worten, obzwar das barzakh zur Dimension des mysteriösen „Dritten“ gehört, ist es allenthalben stark präsent und einflussreich. Es manifestiert sich als kognitive Funktion, die Ibn al-‘Arabī „Imagination“ (al-khayāl) nennt. Für ihn ist die barzakh-Imagination die stärkste kognitive Funktion in der Struktur eines Menschen, wobei sie von einem Paradox abhängt: Alles, was sie konzipiert, macht sie zu einem „es/nicht es“. Aus dieser Perspektive ist Gott ebenfalls ein „Er/nicht Er“. Mit dem Ausgangspunkt im kognitiven Feld, das sich aus der tertiär-barzakh-imaginativen Perspektive herausbildet, nehme ich den Begriff coincidentia oppositorum („Zusammenfall der Gegensätze“, al-jam‘ bayna al-diddayn) in Augenschein. Schließlich verwende ich die Einsichten, die aus Ibn al-‘Arabī’s Perspektive hervorgehen, bei der Frage der „Identitäten“ sowie bei ethischen Dilemmas unserer zeitgenössischen Welt.

Voir avec trois yeux

Le barzakh d’Ibn al-‘Arabī et la situation mondiale contemporaine

Résumé

L’auteur de ce travail entreprend d’écrire sur le mystère du barzakh, dans et à partir de la perspective d’Ibn al-‘Arabī. La perspective d’Ibn al-‘Arabī observe les choses sur la base de trois dimensions : deux dimensions, celle du positif et celle du négatif, qui nous sont proches car notre perception quotidienne binaire reposent sur elles, et une troisième dimension en plus, qui n’appartient ni à l’une ni à l’autre. C’est la dimension du barzakh, que l’on pourrait appeler de tertiaire car elle unit et inclut les deux dimensions qui nous sont bien connues. « Voir » la troisième dimension du barzakh n’est pas accessible à la perception binaire ordinaire; elle est accessible, selon Ibn al-‘Arabī, seulement à ceux qui possèdent une qualité particulière dans « le voir » : ce sont des ahl al-kashf, ceux qui, pour ainsi dire, « voient » avec trois yeux. Néanmoins, il existe entre les perceptions binaires et tertiaires/unissantes une intime et omniprésente connexion de l’ordre d’une tension dynamique qui révèle tous les niveaux de l’existence, conscients ou inconscients. En d’autres termes, bien que le barzakh appartienne à la dimension mystique du « troisième », il est fortement présent et exerce son influence en tout lieu. Il se manifeste comme une fonction cognitive que Ibn al-‘Arabī nomme « imagination » (al-khayāl). Pour lui, l’imagination-barzakh est la plus puissante des fonctions cognitives présentes dans la constitution de l’Homme et repose sur un paradoxe : elle forme tout ce qui conçoit le « cela/cela n’est pas ». De même, Dieu, pensé à partir de cette perspective est « Lui/n’est pas Lui ». Sur la base du champ cognitif qui est apparu à partir de l’idée de l’imaginative-barzakh-tertiaire, je pense qu’il est question du concept de coincidentia oppositorum (« l’unité des opposés », al-jam‘ bayna al-diddayn). Enfin, j’applique les idées qui découlent de la perspective d’Ibn al-‘Arabī à la question des « identités » et aux dilemmes éthiques de notre monde contemporain.

1) The Seal of Divine Wisdom in the Word of Adam

When Allah - glory be to Him! - willed that the source of His most Beautiful Names - which are beyond enumeration - be seen (or you can equally say that He willed His source to be seen), He willed that they be seen in a microcosmic being which contained the entire matter, (1) endowed with existence, and through which His secret was manifested to Him. For how a thing sees itself through itself is not the same as how it sees itself in something else which acts as a mirror for it. So He manifests Himself to Himself in a form which is provided by the place in which He is seen. He would not appear thus without the existence of this place and His manifestation (tajalli) to Himself in it.

Allah brought the entire universe into existence through the existence of a form fashioned without a spirit (rûh), like an unpolished mirror. Part of the divine decree is that He does not fashion a locus without it receiving a divine spirit, which is described as being "blown" (2) into it. This is nothing other than the result of the predisposition of that fashioned form to receive the overflowing perpetual tajalli which has never ceased and which will never cease. Then we must speak of the container (qâbil). The container comes from nothing other than His most sacredly pure Overflowing. So the whole affair has its beginning from Him, and its end is to Him, and "the whole affair will be returned to Him" (11:123) as it began from Him. Thus the command decreed the polishing of the mirror of the universe. Adam was the very polishing of that mirror and the spirit of that form.

The angels are some of the faculties of that form which is the form of the universe, which the Sufis designate in their technical vocabulary as the Great Man (al-Insân al-Kabîr), for the angels are to it as the spiritual (rûhânî) and sensory faculties are to the human organism. Each of these faculties is veiled by itself, and it sees nothing which is superior to its own essence, for there is something in it which considers itself to be worthy of high rank and an elevated degree with Allah. It is like this because it has an aspect of the divine synthesis (jam'îya). In it is something which derives from the divine side and something which derives from the side of the reality of the realities. This organism carries these attributes as determined by the universal nature which encompasses the containers of the universe from the most exalted to the basest. However, the intellect cannot perceive this fact by means of logical investigation for this sort of perception only exists through divine unveiling by which one recognises the basis of the forms of the universe which receive the spirits.

This being was called both a human being (insân) and khalif. As for his humanness, it comes from the universality of his organism and his ability to embrace all of the realities. He is in relation to Allah as the pupil, (3) being the instrument of vision, is to the eye. This is why he is called "insân". It is by him that Allah beholds His creatures and has mercy on them. So he is a human being, both in-time [in his body] and before-time [in his spirit], an eternal and after-time organism. He is the word which distinguishes and unifies. The universe was completed by his existence. He is to the universe what the face of the seal is to the seal - for that is the locus of the seal and thus the token with which the King places the seal on his treasures.

Allah named him khalif for this reason, since man guards His creation as treasure is guarded with the seal. As long as the seal of the King is on the treasure, no one dares to open it without his permission. He made him a khalif in respect of safeguarding the universe, and it continues to be guarded as long as this Perfect Man is in it. Do you not see then, that when he disappears and is removed from the treasury of this world, nothing that Allah stored in it will remain? Everything that was in it will leave it, and all the parts will become confused, and everything will be transferred to the Next World. Then Man will be the seal on the treasury of the Next World for endless time and after-time. All the Divine Names contained in the divine form (4) appear in this human organism. Thus it possesses the rank of containing and integrating this existence. It was by this that Allah set up the proof against the angels, (5) so remember that! Allah admonishes you through others. Look at where that originates and where it ends up. The angels did not realise what was implied by the organism of the khalif, nor did they realise what the presence of the Truth demanded as 'ibâda (6) (worship). Each one only knows from Allah what his essence accords him. The angels do not possess the universality of Adam, and they did not understand the Divine Names with which he has been favoured, and by which he praises Allah and proclaims His purity. They only knew that Allah had names whose knowledge had not reached them, so they could not praise Him nor proclaim His purity through them. What we mentioned overcame them and this state overpowered them. They said about this organism, "Why put on it one who will cause corruption on it?" (2:30) This is only the argument which they were voicing.

What they said regarding Adam is exactly the state they were with regard to Allah. Had it not been that their nature was in accord with it, they would not have said what they said in respect of Adam, "and yet they were not aware." If they had had true recognition of themselves, they would have had knowledge, and had they been in possession of knowledge, they would have been protected and would not have resisted by belittling Adam and thus exceeding their claim of what they possessed of His praise and glorification. Adam was in possession of Divine Names which the angels did not have, so that their praise and glorification of Him was not the same as Adam's praise and glorification of Him. Allah describes this to us so that we may ponder it and learn adab (7) with Allah, and so that we will not lay claim to what we have not realised or possessed by pinning down. How can we allege something which is beyond us and of which we have no knowledge? We will only be exposed. This divine instruction is part of Allah's discipline of those of His slaves who are well-mannered, trusting and khalifs.

Let us return to the wisdom under discussion. Know that universal matters which have no existence in themselves are without a doubt intelligible and known in the mind. They are hidden and continue in their invisible existence. These universal matters have jurisdiction and effect on everything which has an individual existence. Indeed, they are the same thing and nothing else, i.e. the sources of existent individual things, and they continue to be intelligible in themselves. They are manifest in respect of the sources of existent things just as they are hidden in respect of their intelligibility. Each individual existent thing depends on these universal matters which cannot be dislodged from the intellect, nor would their existence be possible in the source once they ceased to be intelligible, whether that individual existent is in-time or out-of-time. The relationship of that which is in-time or out-of-time to this universal intelligible matter is the same. This universal matter only has jurisdiction in individual existent things according to what the realities of these individual existent things demand of it. It is like the relationship of knowledge to the knower, and life to the living. Life is an intelligible reality; knowledge is an intelligible reality. Knowledge is as distinct from life as life is distinct from knowledge. So we say that Allah has knowledge and life, and that He is the Living, the Knowing. We also say that the angel has life and knowledge, and is living and knowing. We say that man has life and knowledge, and is living and knowing. The reality of knowledge is one thing and the reality of life is another, and their relationship to the knowing and the living is the same relationship. We say that the knowledge of Allah is in non-time and the knowledge of man is in-time. So look at the evaluation that this relationship has brought about in this intelligible reality!

Examine this connection between individual intelligibles and stence is necessary, rather, it is necessary by another, not by itself. As knowledge determines the one who participates in it as he is called knowing so the one who is described by it can determine the knowledge. It is in-time in relation to the one in-time and non-time in relation to the one in non-time. Each of the two is determining and determined. It is known that these universal matters, even if they are intelligible, lack a source although they still have an authority. When they are determined, since they are ascribed to an individual existent thing, they accept the principle in the existent sources and do not accept distinction or fragmenting, for that is impossible for them. They themselves are in everything described by them, as humanity is in every person of this particular species, without distinction or the numbering which affects individuals; and it continues to be intelligible.

Now, as there is a connection between that which has an individual existence and that which does not have one and it is a non-existent relationship so the connection of existents to each other is easier to conceive because, in any case, there is a common factor between them which is individual existence. In the other, there is no common factor, yet there is a connection despite the lack of a common factor. So it is stronger and more real when there is a common factor. Without a doubt, the in-time establishes itself as being put into time and it needs something in time to put it into time. It has no place in itself so it exists from something other-than-it, and it is linked to That by the dependence of need. This dependence must be on That whose existence is necessary, which is independent in Its existence by Itself without need. It is That which, by Its own essence, gives existence to the in-time which depends on It. Since the existence of Its essence is necessary and what appears from It depends on It for its essence, it nevertheless depends on its form for everything which is from a name or attribute, except for the essential necessity. That is not the property of it in-time, even if its existence is necessary, rather, it is necessary by another, not by itself.

Since the matter is based on what we said about its manifestation in its form, Allah communicates to us knowledge of Himself through contemplation of the in-time. He tells us that He shows us His signs in the in-time, (8) so we draw conclusions about Him through ourselves. We do not describe Him with any quality without also possessing that quality, with the exception of that essential autonomy. Since we know Him by ourselves and from ourselves, we attribute to Him all that we attribute to ourselves. For that reason, divine communications came down on the tongues of our interpreters, (9) and so He described Himself to us through ourselves. When we witness, He witnesses Himself. We are certainly numerous as individuals and species, yet we are based on a single reality which unites us. So we certainly know that there are distinctions between individuals. If there were not, there would be no multiplicity in the One.

Similarly we are described in all aspects by that by which He describes Himself, but there must be a disinction and it is none other than our need of Him in our existence. Our existence depends on Him by virtue of our possibility and He is independent of that which makes us dependent on Him. Because of this, one can apply before-timeness and timelessness to Him which negates that firstness which is the opening to existence from non-existence. Although He is the First, firstness is not ascribed to Him, and for this reason, He is called the Last. Had His firstness been the firstness of the existence of determination, it would not have been valid for Him to be the Last of the determined because the possible has no last - for possibilities are endless. So they have no last. Rather, He is the Last because "the whole affair will be returned to Him" (11:123) after its attribution to us. So He is the Last in the source of His firstness and the First in the source of His lastness.

Then know that Allah has described Himself as the Outwardly Manifest and the Inwardly Hidden; (10) He brought the universe into existence as a Visible world and an Unseen world so that we might know the Hidden by the Unseen and the Manifest by the Visible. He described Himself with pleasure and wrath, and so He brought the world into existence as a place of fear and hope so we fear His wrath and hope for His pleasure. He described Himself with majesty and beauty, so He brought the universe into existence with awe and intimacy. It is the same for all that is connected with Him, may He be exalted, and by which He calls Himself. He designates these pairs of attributes by the two hands (11) which He held out in the creation of the Perfect Man. Man sums up all the realities of the universe and its individuals. So the universe is seen and the Khalif is unseen. It is with this meaning that the Sultan veils himself, even as Allah is mentioned and described as having with veils (12) of darkness, which are natural bodies, and luminous veils which are subtle spirits (arwâh). The universe is composed of both the gross and the subtle.

The universe is its own veil on itself and cannot perceive the Truth since it perceives itself. It is continuously in a veil which is not removed, since it knows that it is distinct from its Creator by its need of Him. It has no portion of that essential necessity which belongs to the existence of Allah, so it can never perceive Him. In this respect, Allah is never fully known by the knowledge of tasting and witnessing because the in-time has no hold on that.

Allah only applied "between His two hands" to Adam as a mark of honour, and so He said to Iblis, "What prevented you prostrating to what I created with My two Hands?" (38:76) That is none other than the union in Adam of the two forms - the form of the universe and the form of the Real: (13) and they are the two hands of Allah. Iblis is only a fragment of the universe and does not possess this comprehensive quality. It is because of this quality that Adam was a khalif. Had he not had the form of the One who appointed him khalif, he would not have been khalif. If there were not in him all that is in the world, and what his flocks, over whom he is khalif, demand of him because of their dependence on him (and he must undertake all they need from him) he would not have been khalif over them.

The khalifate is only valid for the Perfect Man, whose exterior form comes from the realities of the universe and its forms, and whose inner form is based on His form, may He be exalted! For that reason, Allah has said of him, "I am his hearing and his sight." (14) He did not say, "his eye and his ear." So He differentiated between the two forms. It is the same for every existent in the universe which appears according to what the reality of that existent demands of it. Nonetheless no one totally comprehends what the khalif has. One only surpasses others by this comprehensiveness. If it were not for the diffusion of Allah into the existents by the form, the universe would not have any existence. Similarly, were it not for these universal intelligible realities, no principle would have appeared in individual existent things. From this reality the universe depends on Allah for its existence. So all is in need, and nothing is independent.

This is the truth and we have not spoken metaphorically.
If I speak of a something independent without any need, you will know Who I mean by it.

The whole is tied to the whole and cannot be separated from it, so understand what I have said!

Now, you have learnt of the formation of the body of Adam his outer form and the formation of his spirit, his inner form, so he is the Real and a created being. Now you have learnt of the formation of his rank which is the comprehensiveness by virtue of which he is worthy of the khalifate. Adam is the unique self from which the perfect human species was created according to His words, "O mankind, be fearful of your Lord who created you from a single self, and created its mate from it, and disseminated many men and women from the two of them." (4:1)

His words, "Be fearful of your Lord," mean to make of what has appeared from you a safeguard for your Lord and make what is concealed of you, which is your Lord, a safeguard for yourselves. The matter consists of blame and praise, so be His safeguard in the blame and your safeguard in the praise, so that you will be among those of knowledge and adab. Then He showed him what He had placed in him, and He put that in His two hands - one handful contained the universe and the other handful contained Adam and his descendants - and He showed them their ranks in Adam.

Then Allah informed me in my inner heart (sirr) of what He placed in this Imam, the great progenitor. I have put in this book some of what was allotted to me but not all of what I realised. A book could not contain that and not even the present existent universe could contain it. I have put some of what I have witnessed in this book, as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, defined it. It was the divine wisdom in the word of Adam, that is, this chapter.

Then there is the wisdom of the breath of angelic inspiration in the word of Shith (Seth), the wisdom of divine inspiration in the word of Nuh (Noah), the wisdom of purity in the word of Idris, the wisdom of being lost in love in the word of Ibrahim (Abraham), the wisdom of truth in the word of Ishaq (Isaac), the wisdom of the elevation of the word in the name of Isma'il (Ishmael), the wisdom of the spirit in the word of Yusuf (Joseph), the wisdom of unity in the word of Hud, the wisdom of revelation in the word of Salih, the wisdom of the heart in the word of Shu'ayb, the wisdom of the power of the word of Lut (Lot), the wisdom of the decree in the word of 'Uzayr (Ezra), the wisdom of prophethood in the word of 'Isa (Jesus), the wisdom of mercy in the word of Sulayman (Solomon), the wisdom of existence in the word of Da'ud (David), the wisdom of the soul in the word of Yunus (Jonah), the wisdom of the unseen in the word of Ayyub (Job), the wisdom of majesty in the word of Yahya (John the Baptist), the wisdom of possession in the word of Zakariya (Zachariah), the wisdom of intimacy in the word of Ilyas (Elias), the wisdom of benevolence in the word of Luqman, the wisdom of the Imam in the word of Harun (Aaron), the wisdom of sublimity in the word of Musa (Moses), the wisdom of what one turns to in the word of Khalid, and the wisdom of uniqueness in the seal of Muhammad.

There is a seal for each wisdom. So I have condensed these wisdoms according to what is established in the Mother of the Book, and I complied with what was written out for me, and stopped at what was set as a limit for me. Even if I had desired to do more than that, I would not have been able to do so. Indeed, the Presence forbids that, and Allah is the One who grants success. There is no Lord but Him.

1. al-Insân al-Kâmil, the Perfect Man.
2. Nafkh, Qur'an 32:9, etc.
3. Insan, as well as meaning human being, also means the pupil of the eye.
4. The form chosen by Allah for the human being.
5. Qur'an 2:30-33.
6. 'Ibada: All the acts of worship: giving, praying, fasting, etc..
7. Adab: Manners. Here meaning the much deeper quality of spiritual manners, that is a courtesy engendered in the ritual acts of worship, the prostrations of the prayer, the fast, and giving gifts to the needy. Such a quality is imbued with awareness that you are the dependent, and the Real is the independent. You are poor, He is rich.
8. Qur'an 41:53, "We will show them Our signs on the horizons and in themselves..."
9. i.e. the Prophets.
10. Qur'an: 57:3.
11. Qur'an 38:75, "What I created with My two hands."
12. Hadith: "Allah has 70,000 veils of light and darkness. If they were to be removed, the splendour of His face would consume."
13. Hadith: "Allah created Adam on His form."
14. ref. to hadith qudsî via Abu Hurayra, "My slave does not draw near Me with anything I love more than what I have made obligatory for him. My slave continues to draw near me with superogatory actions until I love him. When I love him, I am his hearing with he hears, his sight by which he sees, his hand with which he strikes, and his foot with which he walks." (Sahih al-Bukhari, 81:38:2)

2) The Seal of Wisdom of the Breath of Angelic Inspiration (1) in the Word of Shith (Seth)

Know that the gifts and favours which appear in phenomenal being through human beings or without them fall into two categories: the gifts of the Essence and the gifts of the Divine Names. These two categories are distinct among the people of tasting according to whether as they come from a specific request for a specific thing, from a general request, or without any request. This applies whether they are gifts of the Essence or gifts of the Divine Names. They are specific when someone says, "O Lord, give me such-and-such a thing," and specifies something which occurs to him. They are general when someone says, "Give me what You know is good for all my parts, subtle and gross," without specifying it.

The askers fall into two groups - one group makes the request from a natural impulse to hasten its attainment, "for man is impetuous;" (17:11) and the other group asks because they know that there are matters with Allah which, in the foreknowledge of Allah, are only obtained after a request. They say, "Perhaps what I ask of Him is something of that sort." Their request takes into consideration this possibility. They do not know what is in the knowledge of Allah, nor what their capacity to receive will grant them. This is because it is one of the most difficult things to know capacity at any moment, for it refers to the capacity of the individual at that time. Furthermore, had he not been disposed by his capacity to make the request, he would not have made that particular request.

The goal of the people of presence, (2) who do not possess such a knowledge, is to know it in the moment in which they find themselves. They know by their state of presence what Allah has given them in that moment. and they only receive it by their predisposition for it. They are of two sorts: one group knows their predisposition from what they have already received, and the other group knows what they are going to receive based on their predisposition. This latter group has the most perfect recognition of predisposition.

Among this group are those who make a request, neither to hasten it nor for the possibilities of favour, but rather to comply with the command of Allah when He says, "Call on Me and I will answer you." (40:60) This sort of person is the pure slave and when he asks, his aspiration (himma) is not attached to what he asks for, be it specific or not, rather his aspiration is merely in or not, rather his aspiration is merely in obedience to his Lord's command. When his state requires, he asks for slavehood, and when it requires entrustment [to Allah] and silence, he is silent. So Ayyub and others were tried, and they did not ask Allah to remove their affliction from them. Then at another moment, their state required that they ask that it be removed, and Allah removed it from them.

The immediate granting of a request, or its deferment, depends on the decree which has been determined for it by Allah. If the request coincides with the moment, the answer comes quickly, and if the moment is deferred - either in this world or the next, the answer is also deferred except for the answer from Allah which is, "At your service" (3) - so understand this well!

As for the second category, it is received without making a request, and by "without request" we mean verbal expression of it. In actuality, there must always be a request - be it articulated, or by a state, or from a predisposition. Similarly, unrestricted praise only takes place through verbal expression. The state determines the meaning, for that which induces you to praise Allah is determined for you by a Name of Action (4) or a Name of Disconnection. (5) In the case of the predisposition of the slave, its possessor is not conscious of it, but he is aware of his state because he knows both what his motive is and the state itself. Predisposition is the most hidden form of making requests.

That which prevents some people from asking is their knowledge that Allah has predetermined their destiny, so they have prepared themselves to receive whatever comes from Him, and they have withdrawn from their selves and their desires.

Among these people are those who know that the knowledge which Allah has of them in all their states is their basic constitution in the state of their permanent source-form from before existence. They know that Allah will only give them what their source allows them according to Allah's knowledge of it when they were in their permanent source-forms. Thus these people know that Allah knows the way they will obtain anything.

There is no higher, nor more unveiled group among the People of Allah than this group, who understand on the secret of the Decree. They, in turn, fall into two sorts: those who know it in general and those who know it in particular. Those who know it in particular are higher and nearer perfection than those who know it in general. Such a person knows what is in the knowledge of Allah for him - be it by Allah informing him of the knowledge his own source has accorded to Him, or be it by direct unveiling to him from his permanent source-form whose unfolding states are endless. So he, in his knowledge of himself, is in the position of having Allah's knowledge of him, because it is derived from the same source. In respect of the slave, concern from Allah is predestined for him, and it is constituted by the sum of the states of his source which the possessor of this unveiling perceives when Allah allows him to perceive it, i.e. the states of his source. When Allah informs him of the states of his permanent source-form upon which the form of his existence depends, it is not in the capacity of the creature in this state to perceive what Allah perceives of his permanent source-form upon which the form of his existence depends, it is not in the capacity of the creature in this state to perceive what Allah perceives of these permanent sources in the state of their non-existence, since they are but essential relations without any form. In this respect, we say that divine concern precedes the slave's need because of this equivalence in the communication of knowledge.

In this way Allah speaks so that we will know, and it is an expression which is completely specific - not as is imagined by those who do not drink from this source. The goal of disconnection is to make that in-timeness in knowledge belong to Knowledge. It is the highest aspect of this question which the mutakallim (6) can comprehend with his intellect - unless he considers knowledge to be distinct from the Essence. If he does this, he ascribes relativity to knowledge, and not to the Essence, and because of this, he sets himself apart from the realised ones among the People of Allah, who are endowed with unveiling and real existence.

Let us return to those gifts which are either the gifts proceeding from the Essence or the Names. As for the favours, gifts and graces of the Essence, they only come by means of divine tajalli. (7) Tajalli only comes from the Essence by means of the form of the predisposition of the one to whom the tajalli is made. It never occurs otherwise. The one who receives the tajalli will only see his own form in the mirror of the Real. He will not see the Real, for it is not possible to see Him. At the same time, he knows that he sees only his own form. It is the same as a mirror in the Visible world inasmuch as you see forms in it or your own form but do not see the mirror. At the same time, however, you know that you see the forms, or your own form, only by virtue of the mirror. Allah manifests that as a model (8) appropriate to the tajalli of His Essence, so that the one receiving the tajalli knows that he does not see Him. There is no model nearer or more appropriate to vision and tajalli than this. When you see a form in a mirror, try to see the body of the mirror as well - you will never see it. It is true that some people who perceive this say that the reflected form is imposed between the vision of the seer and the mirror. This is the most that it is possible to say, and the matter is as we have mentioned. We have clarified this in the The Makkan Revelations.

If you wish to taste this, then experience the limit beyond which there is no higher limit possible in respect of the creature. Neither aspire to, nor tire yourself out in trying to go beyond this degree, for in principle, there is only pure non-existence after it.

Thus Allah is your mirror in which you see yourself, and you are His mirror in which He sees His Names. His Names are not other than Himself, as you know. The matter is confusing. One of us implied ignorance of the matter as part of knowledge and said, "The incapacity to achieve perception is perception." (9) Some of us know but do not express it in this way, even though it is the highest of words. Knowledge does not give incapacity to know as the first one said, but rather knowledge gives him the same silence which incapacity gives. This is the highest level of those who have knowledge of Allah.

This knowledge only belongs to the Seal of the Messengers and the Seal of the Awliyâ'. The Messengers and Prophets only see it from the niche of the Messenger who is the Seal. The awliyâ' only see it from the niche of the walî who is the Seal. Even the Messengers only see it to the extent that they see it from the niche of the Seal of the Awliya', for Message and Prophethood - by which I mean the Prophethood of bringing the Sharî'a and its message - ceases, but wilâya never ceases. Thus the Messengers, inasmuch as they are awliya', see what we have mentioned only from the niche of the Seal of the Awliya'. How could it be different for other awliyâ'? Although the Seal of the Awliyâ' is subject to the judgement which the Seal of the Messengers brought through the Sharî'a, that does not diminish his station nor does it detract from what we have said, for something which is lower from one point of view can be higher from another. Confirmation of this occurred in the history of our Sharî'a in the excellence of the judgement of 'Umar regarding the prisoners of Badr (10) and their treatment, and in the story of fertilization of the date-palms. (11) It is not necessary that the perfect have precedence in everything and in every rank. The Rijâl (12) regard precedence as being in the degrees of knowledge of Allah. Here is their goal. As for the things which are in-time, they do not attach their thoughts to them, so realise what we have mentioned!

Al-Khidr said to Musa, "I have knowledge which Allah has taught me, and which you do not know, and you have knowledge which Allah has taught you and which I do not know." (13)

It is like the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, in relation to a brick wall which was complete except for one brick, (14) and the Prophet was that one brick although he himself only saw the place for the single brick. The Seal of the Awliyâ' must also have this sort of vision. He sees the same as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, saw, but he sees a place for two bricks in the wall, and that the bricks are made of gold and silver. He sees that there are two bricks missing in the wall, and he sees that they are a silver brick and a gold brick. He must see himself as being disposed by nature to fill the place of these two bricks. The Seal of the Awliyâ' is these two bricks by which the wall is completed. The necessary reason for which he sees himself as two bricks is that he follows the Shari'a of the Seal of the Messengers outwardly - which is the place of the silver brick. This means the outward Sharî'a with all that pertains to it of ordinances which are taken from Allah by the secret, according to the outward form which conforms to the secret because he sees the matter for what it really is. He must see the matter in this manner, for it is the place of the golden brick in the inwardly hidden. It is taken from the source from which the angel brought it, the same angel who brought the revelation to the Messengers. If you have understood what I have alluded to, then you have indeed acquired useful knowledge!

All the Prophets, from Adam to the last of the Prophets, take their light from the niche of the Seal of the Prophets, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. Even though the existence of his clay was deferred, the last Prophet was nevertheless present in his reality, according to his statement, "I was a Prophet when Adam was between water and clay." (15) Every other Prophet only became a Prophet by being described by divine qualities inasmuch as Allah is described as the Praiseworthy Wali.(16)

The Seal of the Messengers, in respect to his wilâya, is connected to the Seal of the Awliyâ' in the same way in which Prophets and Messengers are connected to it. He is a walî, Messenger, and Prophet. The Seal of the Awliyâ' is a walî and the heir who takes directly from the source, contemplating the ranks. He is the most beautiful of the beauties of the Seal of the Messengers, Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, the overseer of the community, and the master of the sons of Adam by reason of opening the door of intercession. He specified a particular state which is not universal. (17) In this special state, he has precedence over the Divine Names. So the All-Merciful only mediates with the Avenger for the people of affliction through the intercession of the mediators. Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, obtained mastery in this special station. Whoever understands the ranks and the stations does not find this discourse difficult.

As for the gifts of the Names, know that Allah bestows mercy on His creation which is wholly from the names. Either it is a pure mercy, like the excellence of the provision which they have in this world or on the Day of Rising which is bestowed by that name, the Merciful, and so is a gift of mercy, or it is a mixed mercy like the taking of a disagreeable remedy which is followed by relief - it is still a divine gift. Divine gifts can only possibly be given through the intermediary of the guardians of the Names. Sometimes Allah gives it to the slave by means of the All-Merciful, and so the gift is pure from any adulteration which would be contrary to the nature of the moment, otherwise he would not receive the object and what would resemble it. Sometimes He gives by means of the the Boundless, so it is general - or by the Wise, so He looks at what is fitter at the moment, or by the Giving, who gives what is good without those who receive it having to compensate for it by gratitude or deed. He gives by the Compeller, and so He looks at the environment and what is necessary to it. He gives by the Forgiving and so He looks to the environment and what is happening to the individual. If he is in a state which merits punishment, He veils him from it, and if he is in a state which does not merit punishment, He protects him from a state which would merit it. He is "protected from wrong action", "safeguarded", and other descriptions of that sort. The Giver is Allah in the sense that He is the Treasurer of all that is in His treasury, and Allah only brings forth from it according to a predestined decree through the intermediary of a name particular to that matter. So He gives everything its created form (18) according to the name, the Just, and its brothers.

The Names of Allah are endless because they are known by what comes from them, and what comes from them is endless, even though they can be traced back to the limited roots which are the matrices of the Names or the presences of the Names. In reality, there is but one of the Names or the presences of the Names. In reality, there is but One Reality which assumes all these relations and aspects which are designated by the Divine Names. The Reality grants that each of the Names, which manifest themselves without end, has a reality by which it is distinguished from another Name. It is that reality by which it is distinguished which is the Name itself - not that which it shares.

It is the same with the gifts - every gift is distinct from another by personal nature, although they come from a single source. It is evident that this one is not that one. That is because the Names are distinct. Because of its boundlessness, in the Divine Presence there is nothing at all which repeats itself. This is the truth which is determined.

This was the knowledge of Shith, peace be upon him, and its spirit aids every spirit which discusses the like of this, except for the spirit of the Seal who receives replenishing knowledge directly from Allah, not from any spirit. No, rather it is from his spirit that his substance flows to all spirits, although he may not perceive that of himself at the time when his elemental body existed. However, in respect to his reality and his rank, he knows all of that essentially, just as he is ignorant of the composition of the elements (of his body). So he has knowledge and is ignorant, and he is capable of being described by contrary attributes even as the Origin admits of description with opposites such as the Majestic and the Beautiful, the Outward and the Inward, the Last and the First - and they are the same, and not other than Him. Therefore, he knows and does not know, and he perceives and does not perceive, and he sees and does not see. It is by this knowledge that Shith received his name because it means "the gift". In His hand is the key to the gifts in their various types and relationships So Allah gave him to Adam, and he was the first gift, and He only gave it from Himself.

This was the knowledge of Shith, peace be upon him, and its spirit aids every spirit which discusses the like of this, except for the spirit of the Seal who receives replenishing knowledge directly from Allah, not from any spirit. No, rather it is from his spirit that his substance flows to all spirits, although he may not perceive that of himself at the time when his elemental body existed. However, in respect to his reality and his rank, he knows all of that essentially, just as he is ignorant of the composition of the elements (of his body). So he has knowledge and is ignorant, and he is capable of being described by contrary attributes even as the Origin admits of description with opposites such as the Majestic and the Beautiful, the Outer and the Inner, the Last and the First - and they are the same, and not other than Him. Therefore, he knows and does not know, and he perceives and does not perceive, and he sees and does not see. It is by this knowledge that Shith received his name because it means "the gift". In His hand is the key to the gifts in their various types and relationships So Allah gave him to Adam, and he was the first gift, and He only gave it from Himself.

All gifts in phenomenal being are manifested in this fashion - so no one receives anything from Allah and no-one receives anything which does not come from himself. Not everyone recognises this. Only a few of the people of Allah know it. When you see one who recognises that, rely on him, for that one is the source of the purest purity and the elite of the elite of the Men of Allah. Whenever a person of unveiling sees a form which communicates to him gnosis which he did not have and which he had not been able to grasp before, that form is from his own source, no other. From the tree of himself he gathers the fruits of his cultivation, as his outer form opposite the reflected body is nothing other than himself, even though the place of the presence in which he sees the form of himself presents him with an aspect of the reality of that presence through transformation. The large appears small in the small mirror and tall in the tall, and the moving as movement. It can reverse its form from a special presence, and it can reflect things exactly as they appear, so the right side of the viewer is his right side, while the right side can be on the left. This is generally the normal state in mirrors, and it is a break in the norm when the right side is seen as the right and inversion occurs. All this is from the gifts of the reality of the Presence in which it is manifested and which we have compared to the mirror.

Whoever recognises his predisposition, recognises what he will receive. Not everyone who knows what he will receive, knows his predisposition, unless he knows it after receiving it, and this one knows it in a general way. Some people who are weak of intellect think that since it confirmed with them that Allah does what He wills, they deem it admissible that He could contradict wisdom and what the matter is in itself. (19) Because of this, some of them go so far as to deny the possibility and affirm that which is necessary by essence and by other. The man who has achieved realisation, however, admits the possibility and knows its presence and knows what is possible and how it is possible, since in its source it is necessarily existent because of something other-than-it. From where is the name of other, which determines its necessity, valid for it? No one knows this distinction except those with particular knowledge of Allah.

It is in the footsteps of Shith that the last of this human species will be born, and he will carry his secrets. There will none of this species born after him, so he will be the Seal of the Begotten. A sister will be born with him, and she will emerge before him, and he will follow her with his head at her feet. He will be born in China, and he will speak the language of his country. Sterility will spread in men and women, so there will be much cohabitation without conception. He will call people to Allah, but will not be answered. When Allah takes him and the believers of his time, those who remain will be like beasts, not knowing what is lawful (halâl) from what is unlawful (harâm). They will act according to their natural instincts with lust, devoid of reason and law. Upon them the Last Hour will occur.

Notes to to Chapter 2:

1. Nafth, to puff, blow or spit, hence inspiration. Hadith, "He (Jibril) inspired or put (nafatha) into my heart..." Hence poetry is called the nafth of Shaytan.
2. The people of the presence are those who see everything as coming to them from Allah and everything as effected by Allah.
3. Labbayk.
4. Like the Giving, the Provider.
5. Tanzih, making Allah free of any connection to His creation. Names like the Absolutely Pure (al-Quddûs).
6. The people of words - theologians and philosophers. They are unable to enter the realm of reflection and meditation that is the Sufic domain, and thus some of them oppose the Sufic teaching - mistaking the doctrine's meanings since they cannot intellectually identify them with a specific set of physical practices and direct inner experience.
7. A manifestation by which something is made clear and unobscured, as the bride is displayed to the husband or the rust removed from a sword or mirror so that it shines. The tajalli is the unveiling of a spiritual reality in the realm of vision. It is a direct-seeing into the nature of existence, a showing forth of the secrets of the One in the celestial and terrestrial realms.

8. Mithâl, a Qur'anic term which indicates learning not by logical but by analogical method. It is simply the ACCESS to the parable and not the parable or any idea that the "metaphor" equals its interpretation. It has no specificity. Mithal is grasped "on the wing" so to speak. It cannot be explored or analysed or extended. That is to say it must not be approached rationally but emphatically with direct and clear seeing-into.
9. Abu Bakr as-Siddiq.
10. After Badr, Abu Bakr asked the Prophet to either forgive or allow the prisoners to be ransomed. 'Umar said that they should be killed. Eventually, the Muslims reached a consensus that the captives should be ransomed and they were. Later the verse was revealed, "It is not for a Prophet to take captives..." (8:67)
11. When the Prophet had been asked about whether palm-trees should be pollinated and then later said, "You have the best knowledge of these things of your world."
12. Rijal (sing. rajul): The men. Meaning the men of gnosis and illumination. Those who know - that is - who know how-it-is, and not the veiled fantasy experience of so-called ordinary sensory perception which is, as we now know, in direct contradiction to the physical reality of matter according to high-energy physics.
13. cf. Qur'an 18:65.
14. Hadith in al-Bukhari (2815) and Muslim.
15. Hadith in at-Tirmidhi and Musnad Ibn Hanbal.
16. Qur'an 42:28, "It is He who sends down abundant rain after they have lost all hope, and He unfolds His mercy; He is the Praiseworthy, the Wali."
17. He only can open the door of intercession because it is a special gift to him alone.
18. Qur'an 20:50: "Our Lord is He who gives each thing its created form and then guides it."
19. i.e. they permit that He do the impossible, like making existence non-existence or non-existence existence.

3) The Seal of the Wisdom of the Breath of Divine Inspiration (1) In the Word of Nuh (Noah)

Know that disconnection (tanzîh) among the people of realities in respect to Allah is the same as limitation and qualification, so the one who disconnects is either ignorant or ill-mannered if he only applies disconnection to Him and believes that about Him. (2) When the believer who follows the Sharî'a disconnects and stops at that, and does not see anything else, he displays ill manners and slanders Allah and the Messengers - may the blessings of Allah be upon them! - although he is not aware of it. He imagines that he has reached the target and yet he has missed it, so he is like the one who believes in part and rejects part. (3)

One especially knows that when the language of the various Sharî'as speaks about Allah as they do, they speak to the common people in the first sense, and to the elite in every sense which can be understood from the various aspects of that expression in any language in the usage of that language.

Allah manifests Himself in a special way in every creature. He is the Outwardly Manifest in every graspable sense, and He is the Inwardly Hidden from every understanding except the understanding of the one who says that the universe is His form (4) and His He-ness (huwiyya), and it is the name, the Outwardly Manifest. Since He is, by meaning, the spirit of whatever is outwardly manifest, He is also the Inwardly Hidden. His relation to whatever is manifested of the forms of the world is the relation of the governing spirit to the form. The definition of man, for example, includes both his inward and outward; and it is the same with every definable thing. Allah is defined in every definition, yet the forms of the universe are not held back and He is not contained by them. One only knows the limits of each of their forms according to what is attained by each knower of his form. For that reason, one cannot know the definition of Allah, for one would only know His definition by knowing the definition of every form. This is impossible to attain, so the definition of Allah is impossible. Similarly, whoever connects without disconnection has given limits to Allah and does not know Him. Whoever combines connection and disconnection in his gnosis, and describes Allah with both aspects in general - because it is impossible to conceive in detail because we lack the ability to encompass all the forms which the universe contains - has known Him in general and not in particular, as he knows himself generally and not in particular. For that reason, the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, linked knowledge (ma'rifa) of Allah to knowledge of oneself and said, "Whoever knows himself knows his Lord." Allah says, "We will show them Our signs on the horizons (what is outside of you) and in themselves (what is your source) until it is clear to them (the contemplators) that it is the Truth," (41:53) inasmuch as you are His form and He is your spirit. You are to Him as your body-form is to you, and He is to you as the spirit which governs the body.

The definition contains your inwardness and outwardness, for the form remains when the spirit which governs it departs, and it is no longer man, but one can speak of it as resembling the form of man. There is no difference between it and the form made of wood or stone, upon which the name of man is only applied by metaphor and not by reality. Allah cannot vanish from the forms of the universe, as His definition of His divinity is by reality, not metaphor, as the definition of man applies only so long as he is alive. As the exterior of the form of man praises both his spirit, and the self governed by it, with his tongue, similarly Allah made the forms of the universe which glorify His praise, but we do not understand their glorifying. (5) We do not embrace all forms in the universe. All are tongues of Allah uttering the praise of Allah and for that reason He said, "Praise be to Allah, the Lord of all the worlds," (1:1) i.e. all types of praise refer to Him. He is the Praiser and the One praised.

If you speak of disconnection, you limit Him, and if you speak of connection, you define Him.
If you speak of the two together, then you are free of error and you are an Imam and a master in knowledges of gnosis.

He who affirms duality, falls into shirk, and whoever speaks of uniqueness is a unifier. (6)
Take care lest you be a dualist by connection, and take care lest you be a isolator by disconnection.

You are not Him, rather you are Him and you see Him in the source of thing, absolute and limited at the same time.

Allah says, "There is nothing like Him," and so He disconnects, "and He is the Hearing, the Seeing," (42:11) so He connects. Allah says, "There is nothing like Him," so He connects and doubles it, (7) and "He is the Hearing, the Seeing." Then He uses disconnection and makes Himself Unique.

If Nuh had combined these two calls for his people, they would have answered him. He called them openly (71:8), and he called them secretly (71:9). Then he said to them, "Ask forgiveness of your Lord. Truly He is Endlessly Forgiving." (71:10) He said, "I have called my people night and in the day, but my calling has only made them more evasive" (71:5-6) because they knew what they had to do in answering his call.

So the knowledge of those who know Allah is what Nuh indicated in respect to his people by praising them through blame. He knew that they would not answer his call because of the furqân (8) it contained. The command is the Qur'an, not the Furqân. Whoever is established in the Qur'an does not incline to the Furqân. Even if the Furqân is in the Qur'an, the Qur'an contains the Furqân but the Furqân does not contain the Qur'an. For this reason, no one was favoured by the Qur'ân except Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and this community which is the "best community ever to be produced before mankind." (3:110)

So "there is nothing like Him" unified several matters in one single matter. If Nuh had articulated something like of this âyat, his people would have responded to him, because it contains connection and disconnection in a single âyat, rather in half an âyat.

Nuh, peace be upon him, peace be upon him, called on his people at night in respect to their intellects and spirituality (rûhânîyya), which are unseen; and by day he called on them in respect to their outer forms and arrival. In his call, he did not unify with anything, like "there is nothing like Him." So their inward had a distaste for this separation, and it increased them in evasion. Then he said of himself that he called upon them that He might forgive them, not that He be unveiled to them. They understood that from him. That is why "they put their fingers in their ears and wrapped themselves in their clothes," (71:7) and this is the form of veiling to which he called them. So they answered his call by action, not by saying, "At your service."

There is both the confirmation of likeness and its negation in "There is nothing like Him." For this reason, the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said of himself, "I have been given all the words." (9) Muhammad, peace be upon him, did not call on his people by night and day, but rather he called upon them by night in the day and by day in the night. Nuh said in his wisdom to his people, "He will send heaven down on you in abundant rain," (71:11) which is intellectual gnosis in meanings and metaphorical speculation, and "He will reinforce you with wealth," i.e. by what comes to you from Him.

Thus it is your wealth in which you have seen your form. So whoever among you imagines that he has seen Him, does not have gnosis, and whoever of you knows that he has seen himself, he is the gnostic. For this reason people are divided into those who know Allah and those who do not know. "And sons" is what results from their logical speculation while the knowledge of the business (to which Nuh called them) is based upon contemplation which is far from the results of thought. Their trade did not profit them, (10) so what they had in their hands, which they only imagined they possessed, vanished from them.

The kingdom belongs to the people of Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, for Allah says "Give of that to which He has made you successors." (11) (57:7) For the people of Nuh it is, "Do not take anyone besides Me as a guardian." (17:2) The kingdom was confirmed for the people of Muhammad, and the guardianship in it belongs to Allah. The people of Muhammad are the khalifs in it. The kingdom belongs to Allah and He is their guardian, and that is the kingdom of being appointed khalif. For this reason, Allah is the "King of the kingdom" (12) as at-Tirmidhi says. "They have hatched a mighty plotting," (71:22) because calling to Allah is the plotting of the the One called; since He does not lack the beginning, He is called to the end, so they call to Allah. This is the source of devising according to inner sight. Nuh said, "The affair belongs entirely to Him," so they answered Him with plotting as He called them.

The people of Muhammad came and knew what the call to Allah was in respect of its He-ness, rather what it is in respect to His Names. Allah says, "The day those who are godfearing are gathered to the All-Merciful." (13) So He used the "particle of the end" (ilâ - to) and joined it to that Name, and we recognise that the universe is under the care of a Divine Name which requires them to be among the "godfearing". The reality of taqwâ (14) is that man avoids ascribing blessings, perfections and praiseworthy attributes to himself or to others, except for Allah. He fears Allah through His acts and attributes. These things are evils from the spring of possibilities. They said in their plotting, "Do not abandon your gods. Do not abandon Wadd or Suwa' or Yaghuth or Ya'uq or Nasr." (71:22) Then they abandoned them ignorant of the Truth according to what they left of the idols. Allah has an aspect in every worshipped thing. Whoever recognises it, recognises, and whoever is ignorant of it is ignorant among the people of Muhammad. Your Lord decreed that you should worship only Him that is the judgement of your Lord.

The one who possesses knowledge knows who the slave is and in what form he is manifested as far as he is a slave. Separation and multiplicity are like the limbs of the sensory form and like faculties of meaning (15) of the spiritual form. He only worships Allah in every worshipped object. The lowest one is the one who imagines that godness is contained in it. Were it not for this illusion, stones and other things would not have been worshipped. This is why He said, "Say: Name them!" (13:33) If they had named them, they would have named stone, tree, or star. If they had been asked, "Who do you worship?" they would have replied, "God". They would not say "Allah" or "the god".

The highest knower does not use this imagination, (16) but rather he says that this is a divine tajalli which one must exalt, and he does not restrict himself. The lowest one is the one possessed of fantasy: "We only worship them so that they bring us neared to Allah." (39:3) The highest knower says, "Your god is One God, so submit to Him," (22:34) wherever He is manifest, "and give good news to the humble-hearted" who humble the fire of their nature. They spoke to it (the fire), and did not say "nature". "They have misguided many people," (71:24) i.e. they perplexed many in the multiplicity of the One by aspects and relations. "Do not increase not the wrongdoers" because their selves are from the totality of the chosen ones who inherited the Book and they are the first of the three, (17) which precedes the ambivalent and the outdoer, "in anything but misguidance", except in the perplexity of the man of Muhammad who says, "Increase me in perplexity." (18) "Every time it shines on them, they walk in it. When the darkness comes over them, they stop." (2:20) So the perplexed one turns about, and the circular movement is about the axis which he does not leave.

The one who has a stretched-out path is inclined to leave the goal, seeking what the possessor of imagination has in it, and his end is that imagination. He has "from" and "to" and what is between them. The one who has a circular movement has no beginning, "from", which clings to him, and no end, "to", is judged of him. Thus he has the most perfect existence. He "is given all the words" (19) and wisdoms. "And because of their errors" which is that which is recorded for them, "they were drowned" in the seas of the knowledge of Allah which is perplexity among the men of Muhammad. When the seas were heated up, (20) "they were put into a fire" in the source of water, "and they found no one to help them besides Allah." (71:25) Allah is the source of their helpers, and so they were destroyed in it for time without end. If He had brought them out to the shore, the shore of nature, He would have brought them down from this high degree. All belongs to Allah and is by Allah, rather it is Allah.

Nuh said, "My Lord!" and he did not say, "My God," for the Lord has immutability, and "God" differs according to the Names. So "every day He is engaged in some affair." (55:29) By Lord, he meant something with an immutable quality. "Do not leave upon the earth" and he called on them to go into its Muhammadan interior. "If you let down a rope, it would fall on Allah," (21) "to Him belongs what is in the heavens and what is in the earth." When you are buried in it, you are in it and it is your container, and "We will return you into it and We will bring you forth from it again," (20:55) by the difference of existence. "...of the unbelievers" who wrap themselves in their garments and put their fingers in their ears, seeking veiling because he called on them that He might forgive them. Forgiveness is the veiling of wrong actions, "not even one" so that the benefit will become universal like the call. "If You leave any," i.e. if You call them and then leave them, "they will misguide Your slaves," i.e. confuse them and so bring them out of their service to what they have of the secrets of lordship. They will think themselves lords after they were slaves in themselves. Thus they are slaves and lords. "They will spawn nothing" i.e. they will not have any result or manifest anything except their being shameless that is, the manifestation of what veils the unbelievers is that they were veiled from what appeared after their manifestation. They manifested that which veils, so they were veiled after their appearance.

The thinker is confused and does not recognise the goal of the shameless in shamelessness, (22) or the unbeliever in his disbelief, yet the person is but one. "My Lord, forgive me," i.e. veil me and that which concerns me so that my rank and station are unknown, as the rank of Allah are unknown in His statement, "They do measure Allah with His true measure"; (23) "and my parents" of whom I am a result, and they are the intellect and nature; "and all who enter my house," i.e. my heart, "as believers" believing in what it contains of divine reports, and it is what their selves occasioned, "And all the believers, men (the intellects) and women (the selves)."

"Do not increase the wrongdoers (dhâlimîn)" who are from the darkness (dhulumât), the people of the unseen, hiding behind the veils of darkness, "except in ruin" i.e. in destruction. Thus, they do not recognise themselves because they see the Face of Allah outside of them. Among the men of Muhammad, "All things are passing except His Face." (28:88) Ruin is destruction. Whoever wishes to understand the secrets of Nuh must rise into the sphere of Nuh. (24) It is in our book, at-Tanazzulat al-Mawsuliyya.

Notes to Chapter 3:

1. Subbûh, name applied to Allah, the All-Perfect, disconnected from imperfections.
2. If he does not go on to include tashbih, connection.
3. cf. Qur'an 4:149: "Those who reject Allah and His Messengers and desire to make division between Allah and His Messengers, saying, 'We believe in some and reject some.'"
4. By manifesting His attributes and Essence since everything is a proof and indication of Him.
5. Ref. to Qur'an 17:44, "There is nothing which does not glorify Him with praise, but you do not understand their glorification."
6. In this case, ignorant of the multiplicity of His Names and Attributes.
7. "Like Him" = "ka-mithlihi", the word "like" occurs twice: "ka" and "mithl", so like negates like, like a double negative.
8. Furqan: One of the names of the Qur'an, meaning a "discrimination" that which separates or distinguishes. Here presented as an opposite in a dyad: Qur'an/furqan, that is, discrimination/gathering.
9. Hadith in al-Bukhari and Muslim.
10. Reference to Qur'an, 2:16, "Those are the people who have sold guidance for misguidance. Their trade has brought no profit. They are not guided."
11. Khalifs.
12. Since He answers His slave who is the "kingdom". Technical term used by al-Hakim at-Tirmidhi and Abu Madyan, discussed by Ibn al-'Arabi in the Futuhat al-Makkiyya, Chapter 24, vol. I, p. 182.
13. ref. Qur'an 19:85.
14. Fearfulness of Allah which is reflected in one's behaviour.
15. Meaning. Meaning does not carry the ordinary connotative significance that it has in the science of semantics. In the Sufic science meaning is not allied, but inseparable from the experience of the recognition of meaning. In other words, it is not a "thing" which can be apprehended with the qualities of thingness. It is a mode of experiencing which takes place in a zone of awareness that is in itself a realm of the inward reality cognised in the waking state. Meaning/sensory, ma'na/hiss.
16. Khayal: An important term. Khayal means imagination, but in the special technical language of Ibn al-'Arabi the khayal contains an outer and inner meaning. Its outer (not inner) meaning is imagining in the ordinary sense of a "tangible reality" which is experienced mentally yet remains unreal, that is, untouchable and non-physical. Its inner meaning, however, is that faculty by which we solidify the objects - which are according to unveiling basically "not-there" - spatiality itself. There is much resistance to this in "rational" and programmed intellects as there is of the hand to the rock in "common sense" experience. The rock is there, it does not budge. There is, it must not be forgotten, a threshold situation where this is not so, for if the subject were brain-damaged, subjected to a hallucinogen, or hypnotic trance, then the object would experientially melt away. That is still not the same as seeing in which things are seen as-they-as in one unified field without differentiation, while alert within that condition of experiencing. And this state brings with it wisdom beyond the recognition of how-it-is at that moment - in other words a new understanding is established by the experience.

17. Ref to Qur'an 35:32, "...but some of them wrong themselves, some are ambivalent, and some outdo each other in good."

18. Hayra: Bewilderment. A Key term. Hayra is not a negative situation - it is the condition in which the seeker finds every intellectual channel blocked, every pathway of reason clashing against the other in contradiction so that it induces in the seeker a state of intensity. This intensity by virtue of its inner tension creates a condition we call hayra. It is a collapse of separation - a kind of "white hole" - which results in gatheredness. That is, the hayra creates a new condition which is its result and that result is a breakthrough into an illumination of the Real.

19. Meaning the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, who was given all the words.

20. By the oven (from which the water gushed out of the earth in the Flood.)

21. Hadith.

22. The manifestation of lordship.

23. 6:91, 22:84, 39:67.

24. The Sphere of the Sun.

4: The Seal of the Wisdom of Sanctification (Quddûs) in the Word of Idris

Elevation has two references - one of place and one of rank. Elevation of place is "We raised him up to a high place," (19:57) and the highest of places is that upon which the mill of the world of the spheres revolves. It is the sphere of the sun and in it is the station of the spirituality of Idris, peace be upon him! There are seven heavens under it and seven heavens above it, and it is the fifteenth. That which is above it is the red heaven, i.e. Mars, the heaven of Jupiter, Saturn, the heaven of fixed stars, the Starless Heaven and the heaven of the constellations, the heaven of the Kursi and the heaven of the 'Arsh. That which is below it is the heaven of Venus, Mercury, the Moon, the circle of ether, the circle of air, the circle of water, and the circle of earth. It is the axis of the heavens, and it is a "high place".

As for the elevation of rank, it is for us, the people of Muhammad. Allah said, "When you are uppermost and Allah is with you" (47:35) in this height. He exalts Himself above place, not above rank. When the selves of those among us who do deeds are afraid, He follows the mention of "being with" with His words, "He would not cheat you of your deeds." The deed demands place and knowledge demands rank. So He joined the two heights for us - elevation of place by deed and elevation of rank by knowledge. Then to disconnect the association of being with, He said, "Glorify the name of your Lord, the Most High," (87:1) above this association in meaning.

It is one of the most wondrous of matters that man is the highest of existent things - I mean the Perfect Man, and elevation is only attributed to him by subordination either to place or rank which is a degree. So he is not high by his essence, he is high by the height of place and the height of rank, for these possess height. Height of place is like the All-Merciful settling on the throne, (1) and it is the highest of places. Height of rank is "All things are passing except His Face," (28:88) and "the whole affair will be returned to Him," (11:123) and nothing has existence along with Allah.

When Allah said, "We raised him up to a high place," He made high an adjective for place. Since your Lord said to the angels, "I am putting a khalif in the earth," (2:30) this is height of rank. He said about the angels, "Were you overcome by arrogance, or are you one of the exalted?" (38:75) so He gave elevation to the angels. If the angels had possessed that elevation by simple virtue of the fact that they are angels, then all the angels would have been included in this elevation. It was not common to them in the definition of angel. We recognise that this is elevation of rank with Allah. It is the same for the khalifs of the people. If their elevation with the khalifate had been an elevation by essence, every man would have it. It is not general and so we know that that elevation is by rank.

One of His names is the High. Over whom, when there is nothing except Him? So He is the High by His Essence. Is He is High over that which is particular, when there is no He except Him? His elevation is by virtue of Himself, and He, in respect to existence, is the source of existents. Those in-time things which He calls high in themselves are not other than Him. He was the High when there was no height of relativity because the source-forms in non-existence had not smelt the scent of existence. They remain in their state in spite of the multiplicity of forms in existents, but the source is the same from the whole in the whole. The existence of multiplicity lies in the names which are the relationships, and they are non-existent matters. There is only the source which is the Essence. He is High through Himself, not by any ascription to another. From this standpoint, there is no height of relative relation in the universe, but the aspects of existence which are distinct. The height of relativity exists in the one Source in respect of the many aspects. For that reason, you say of Him, Him and not Him, and you and not you.

Al-Kharraz, (2) may Allah have mercy on him, who is one of the aspects of Allah and one of His tongues with which He speaks of Himself, said that one only has gnosis by joining opposites together in respect of Him. "He is the First and the Last, the Outwardly Manifest and the Inwardly Hidden." (57:3) He is the source of what appears and the source of what is hidden in the state of its manifestation. There is none who sees Him other than Him and there is none who is hidden from Him. So He is manifest to Himself and hidden from Himself. He is called Abu Sa'id al-Kharraz and other than that from the names of things in-time.

The Hidden says "No" while the Manifest says, "Me," and the Manifest says, "No" while the Hidden says, "Me". This is found in every opposite, yet the speaker is one, and he is the same as the hearer in the statement of the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, about what their selves say, (3) for they speak and hear what they say, and know what their selves say. The source is but one, even if the judgements are different. There is no way that anyone can be ignorant of this sort of thing. Every man knows from himself, and it is the form of the Real.

So things are mixed and numbers appear by the one in the known ranks. Thus "one" brought number into existence, and number divides the One. The principle of number only appeared through the numbered. Part of the numbered is non-existent, and part is existent. The thing is non-existent in relation to the senses while it is existent in relation to the intellect. There must be number and numbered. That must grow from one and it grows because of it. Every rank of the numbers has one reality like 9, for example, and 10 and down to 2, and upwards without end, and its reality is not a sum.

A name is not perceived by the addition of ones. 2 is one reality, and 3 is one reality, and so on until the end of these ranks. Even though the source [of numbers] is one, the source of one of them is not the source of the others. Addition encompasses them all, and it speaks of them from them and judges them by them. Twenty ranks (4) appeared in this statement, so composition entered into them. You will continue to affirm the source of what you deny in itself. Whoever recognises what we have related of the numbers, and that negation is the same as their affirmation, knows that the Real, who is disconnected by disconnection, is creature by connection, even though the creature is distinct from the Creator. The matter is the creature/Creator and it is the Creator/creature. That is from one source, rather is is the One source and it is many sources. Look at what you see!

Ibrahim's son told him, "My father, do what you are ordered." (37:102) The child is the same as his father, so he only saw himself sacrificing himself, "and He ransomed him with an immense sacrifice." (5) That which was manifested as a ram was manifested in the form of a human, and manifested in the form of a son. Rather, it is by the principle of the son being the same as the father. "He created from (one self) his mate." (4:1) He (6) married his own self, and from him are both his companion and his child. The matter is one in number. It is the same for nature and what is manifested from it. We do not see it diminishing by what appears from it nor increasing by the lack of what other than it manifests. That which is manifested is not other than it, nor is it the same as what is manifested according to the variety of forms in principle. This one is cold and dry, and that one is hot and dry. They are joined by dryness, and distinct by another quality. The common source is nature, and the world of nature is composed of forms in one mirror. Rather, it is one form in different mirrors.

There is only bewilderment (hayra) by the dispersal of perspectives. Whoever knows what we have said is not bewildered. If he increases in knowledge, it is only from the principle of place, and place is the same as the source-form in which the Real varies in the locus of His tajalli. Conditions vary, so He assumes every condition. There is no condition except for the source in which He make tajalli of Himself, and there is nothing except this.

By this aspect, Allah is creature, so interpret!
And by this aspect, He is not creature, so remember!
The inner sight of whoever understands what I have said is not confused, and only the one who perceives it possesses sight.
The source of joining and separating is the same,
and it is multiplicity which never remains or departs.

The One who is High in Himself is the One who possesses the perfection in which all matters of existence are absorbed, as are all non-existent relations, inasmuch as it is not possible that any of these attributes be lacking from Him, be they praiseworthy by custom, logic, or law, or blameworthy by custom, logic or law. That belongs only to the One named Allah. As for what is named other-than-Allah, it is either a locus of His tajalli or a form which is in it. If it is the locus of His tajalli, it contains distinction. Be-cause of that, there must be distinction between the One who makes tajalli and the place of tajalli; if it is a form in it, that form is the source of the essential perfection because it is the same as what is manifested in it. That which belongs to Allah belongs to that form. However, it is not said that it is Him nor that it is other-than-Him.

Abu-l-Qasim ibn Qasi (7) indicated this in his book, The Removal of the Sandals, and he said, "Each Divine Name is qualified by all the Divine Names, and described by their description." It is so. Each Name indicates the Essence and the meaning which is set out for it and which demonstrates it. In respect to its indication of the Essence, it possesses all the names, and in respect to its indication of the meaning which is singular to it, it is distinct from others, such as the Lord, the Creator, the Fashioner, etc. The Name is the same as the Named in respect to the Essence, and the Name is other than the Named in respect to the meaning which is particular to it.

If you have understood that the "high" is as we have mentioned, you know that it is neither place nor height of rank, for height of rank is particular to the administration of authority, like the Sultan and the judge, wazirs and qadis, and all who have rank, be they worthy of that rank or not. Height is by attributes which are not like that. The most knowledgeable of people can be ruled by the person with the position of power, even if that person is the most ignorant of people. This is the height of rank according to the principle of what he has over me in himself. When he retires, his high rank vanishes. The one with knowledge is not like that.

5: The Seal of the Wisdom of Being Lost in Love (1) in the Wisdom of Ibrahim (Abraham)

Ibrahim is called the intimate friend, and he was an intimate friend (khalîl), because he was penetrated (takhallal) and gathered all the qualities of the Divine Essence. The poet says:

You pervaded the course of my spirit, and that is why the intimate friend is called the intimate friend.

It is like the colour which permeates the coloured, so it is a non-essential matter ('arad) in respect to its essential substance (jawhar), and it is not like the place and that which it occupies. Or it means the penetration of the Real into the existence of the form of Ibrahim. Each of these two principles is true as was mentioned, for each points to an aspect which appears without overstepping it.

Do you not see that the Real is manifest in the qualities of beings in-time and He gives news of that from Himself, and He is even manifest in the attributes of imperfection and the attributes of blame? Do you not see that the creature is manifest with the qualities of the Real from first to last, and all of them belong to him as the attributes of in-time things belong to the Real? "Praise belongs to Allah," so the results of praise from every praiser and one praised go back to Him, and "the whole affair will be returned to Him," (11:132) It includes what is blameworthy and praiseworthy, and there is only one or the other.

Know that when something is penetrated by something the first is contained by the second, so the penetrating is the name of the actor veiled by the penetrated, which is the name of the one acted upon, and it is the Outwardly Manifest. The name of the actor is the Veiled, the Inwardly Hidden. It is its food, as water permeates wool and so makes it expand. If the Real is the Outwardly Manifest, then the creature is veiled within Him, and creation is all the Names of the Real, His hearing and seeing, and all His ascriptions and discernments. If the creature is outwardly manifest, then the Real is veiled and hidden in him, and so the Real is the hearing of the creature, and his seeing, hand and foot, and all his faculties as it related in sound hadith. (2)

If the Essence were exempt from these relations, it would not be divinity. These relations are made by our sources, so we make Him god by our dependence on His godness. He is not recognised until we are recognised. The Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Whoever knows himself knows his Lord." Such a person is the creature with the most knowledge of Allah. Some sages, especially Abu Hamid al-Ghazali, claim that one can have gnosis of Allah through disregarding the world. This is false. Indeed, the non-time pre-time is not recognised as god until that which depends on its being God is known. Thus it is a proof of Him. Then after this, in the second state, (3) unveiling accords you that the Real Himself is the source of the proof of Himself and His godness. The universe is but His tajalli in the forms of their source-forms whose existence is impossible without Him. He assumes various forms and modes according to the realities of these sources and their states, and this is after our knowledge of Him that He is our God.

Then the last unveiling comes, so our forms appear to you in Him, and some of us appear to others in the Real, and then some of us recognise each other and some of us are distinct from one another. Among us are those who recognise that our recognition of ourselves occurs in the Real, and some of us are unaware of the presence in which this recognition of ourselves takes place. "I seek refuge with Allah from being one of the ignorant." (2:67)

By the two unveilings together, He only judges us by ourselves, rather we judge ourselves by ourselves, but through Him. That is why He says, "Allah's is the conclusive argument," (6:149) meaning against those who are veiled when they say to the Real, in conformity with their desires, "Why did you do this or that to us?", thinking that it was not in conformity with their desires. "On the Day when the legs are bared," (68:42) means the matter which the gnostics unveil here. They see that the Real did not do to them what they allege that He did, but that it was from themselves. For He only lets them know what they are in themselves. From this their argument will dissolve, and the decisive proof of Allah will remain.

If you say, what is the benefit of His words, "If He had willed, He could have guided every one of you," (6:149; 16:9) we say in If He willed "if (law)" is a particle of impossibility showing impossibility. He only willed the matter as it is. But the source of possibility accepts the thing and its opposite in the principle of logical proof, and it is the same with any two logical principles. That which occurs is that which the possibility implies in the state of its immutability. The meaning of "If We had guided you" is, had He shown you the Truth. Allah does not open the inner eye of every possibility in the universe to the perception of the matter as it is. There are those who know and those who are ignorant. Allah did not so will, so He did not guide all of them, and He will not will it, and it is the same as if He had willed it. How would He will this which is not? His volition is unified in its connections. It is a relationship dependent on the known, and the known is you and your states. Knowledge does not have an effect on the known, rather the known has an effect on knowledge, and so it accords from itself what it is in its source.

Divine discourse relates according to what agrees with the ones addressed and what logical reflection accords it. It does not come according to what unveiling gives. For that reason, there are many believers, but the gnostics who possess unveiling are few. "There is not one of us who does not have a known station," (37:164) and it is what you are in your state of immutability which you manifest in your existence. This is if it is confirmed that you have existence. If existence is confirmed to the Real and not to you, the judgement is yours without a doubt in the existence of the Real. If it is confirmed that you are existent, then the judgement is yours without a doubt, even if the judge is the Real. It is only the overflowing of existence on you.

You only praise yourself and you only blame yourself, and praise is only due to Allah for the overflowing of existence, for that is His, not yours. You are His nourishment by conditions, and He is your nourishment by existence. He is specified by what specifies you. The command comes from Him to you, and from you to Him, even though you are called obligated, a passive name (mukallaf), and He is not called obligated since there is no imposition upon Him.

He praises me, and I praise Him.
He serves me and I serve Him.
In one state I draw near to Him, and in sources I deny Him.
So He knows me and I do not know Him, and I know Him and I witness Him.
Where is independence

when I help Him and assist Him?
That is why the Real brought me into existence.
Then I knew Him and manifested His existence.
Hadith (4) brought us that,
and in me He achieved His goal.

Then the intimate friend, Ibrahim, peace be upon him!, possessed this rank by virtue of which he was called the intimate friend. For that reason, he made hospitality to guests a sunna. Ibn Masarra (5) associates him with the angel Mika'il in respect to provisions. Provision is that which nourishes those provided for: when provision permeates the essence of the one provided for until nothing remains in it except permeation and nourishment flows in all the parts of the one nourished. There are no parts in divinity, so all the divine stations are penetrated which are designated by the Names, and by which His Essence is manifested.

We are His as our proofs confirm, and we are ours.
Only my being belongs to Him,
and we are His as we are ours.
I have two aspects: Him and me,
but He does not have "me" through me.
However, His place of manifestation is in me,
so we are His - like me.
"Allah speaks the truth, and He guides to the Way." (33:4)

Notes to Chapter 5:

1. Huyûm is the intense love and passion which causes bewilderment and distraction.
2. ref. to hadith qudsî via Abu Hurayra, "My slave does not draw near Me with anything I love more than what I have made obligatory for him. My slave continues to draw near me with superogatory actions until I love him. When I love him, I am his hearing with he hears, his sight by which he sees, his hand with which he strikes, and his foot with which he walks." (Sahih al-Bukhari, 81:38:2)
3. The first unveiling was annihilation (fanâ') and the second is going-on (baqâ').
4. "I created existence so that I might be known."

6: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Real in the Word of Ishaq (Isaac)

The ransom of a Prophet by an animal's sacrifice as an offering!
How can the bleating of a ram be equal to the voice of a man?
Allah Almighty magnified the ram out of concern for us or for it, but I do not see by what measure.
There is no doubt that the bodies of cows and camels are larger, but they relinquished the rank of sacrifice to the offering of the ram.
Would that I knew how a ram replaced the khalif of the All-Merciful with its small body!
Do you not see that the command to sacrifice implies correspondence and promises gain and diminishes loss?
There is no creature higher than the mineral, and after it comes the plant according to its ranks and measures.
The animal comes after the plant, and each one had gnosis of its Creator by unveiling and evident proof.
As for the one named Adam, he is limited by intellect, thinking, and the conventions of belief.
It is that which Sahl (at-Tustari) (1) and the realizer said as we do (2) - because we and they are in the degree of Ihsan.
Whoever witnesses the matter I have witnessed will say what I have said, both secretly and openly.
Do not pay any attention to words which contradict our words and do not sow grain in the land of the blind!
They are the "deaf and dumb" in the text of the Qur'an which the one protected from wrong action brought for our ears.

Know, may Allah support us and you! that Ibrahim, the intimate friend, peace be upon him, told his son, "I saw in a dream that I must sacrifice you." (37:102) He did not interpret it although the dream is the presence of the imagination (khayâl). It was a ram which appeared in the form of Ibrahim's son, and Ibrahim confirmed the vision. So his Lord ransomed his son from Ibrahim's illusion with the "mighty sacrifice", which was the interpretation of the vision with Allah, but Ibrahim was not aware of it.

The tajalli of form in the presence of the imagination requires another knowledge by which one can perceive what Allah means by that form. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said to Abu Bakr when he interpreted a dream, "You have guessed part of it rightly, and you have missed part of it." Abu Bakr asked him to inform him of what was right in it and what was wrong, but the Prophet did not do so.

Allah said to Ibrahim when He called him, "Ibrahim, you have discharged your vision." (37:105) He did not say to him, "You have confirmed the vision that it is your son" because he did not interpret it. He took what he dreamt literally, whereas dreams require interpretation. That is why the 'Aziz, the ruler of Egypt, said, "...if you can interpret dreams."

(12:43) The meaning of interpretation is the transposition from the form of what one dreamt to another form. The cattle represented the hard years and the fertile years. If Ibrahim had been faithful to the dream, he would have sacrificed his son, since he believed in the dream that it really was his son, whereas with Allah it meant the "mighty sacrifice" in the form of his son. He ransomed him by what occurred in Ibrahim's mind, but it was not ransomed in actuality with Allah.

There is a common form to the sensory form of the sacrifice and the imaginary form of Ibrahim's son. If he had seen a ram in his imagination, he would have interpreted it as his son or something else. Then Allah said, "This was a most manifest trial," (37:106) i.e. his clear test, meaning his experience in knowledge - whether or not he knew what the perspective of the dream required in the way of interpretation. He knew that the place of the imagination required interpretation, but he neglected it and the condition inherent in it, and for this reason he believed in the vision.

Taqi ibn Mukhallad, the transmitter of traditions, did so too, having heard in a tradition he was sure of, that the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Whoever sees me in a dream, sees me when awake, for Shaytan cannot assume my form." (3) So Taqi ibn Mukhallad saw the Prophet in a dream in which the Prophet gave him milk to drink. Taqi ibn Mukhallad believed his dream, but he made himself vomit and threw up the milk. If he had interpreted the dream, he would have known that milk means knowledge, equal to the quantity that he drank. Do you not see that the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, received a goblet of milk in a dream and he said, "I drank it until satiety came out of my nails, and then I gave the surplus to 'Umar." It was said, "Messenger of Allah, what do you interpret it as?" He replied, "Knowledge." (4) He did not leave it as milk in its dream form since he had knowledge of the state of dreams and how they must be interpreted. It is known that the form of the Prophet, peace be upon him, which the senses see, is buried in Madina, and that the form of his spirit and his subtle form have never been seen by anyone nor by himself. For this reason, the spirit of the Prophet takes on material existence in the form of his body as he died, and nothing is missing from it. So it is Muhammad, peace be upon him, who appears in dreams through his spirit in a bodily form which resembles his buried body, for Shaytan cannot assume the form of his body, (5) may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and Allah protects the one who sees him. For this reason, whoever sees this form takes from it all that it orders or prohibits or gives good news of, even as he takes judgements from him in the life of this world - according to what they indicate from text, immediate or implicit. If he gives him something, that thing is subject to interpretation, unless it is manifest in the senses as it is in the imagination, and so does not require interpretation. It is based on this aspect that Ibrahim, the intimate friend, relied, even as Taqi ibn Mukhallad did. The vision has these two aspects. (6)

Allah taught us adab in what He did with Ibrahim and what He said to him when He gave him the station of prophethood. We know that when we see Allah in a form which logical reason rejects, we must interpret that form according to the Sharf'a, whether it is in the state of the one who sees Him, or in the place in which He is seen, or the two together. If logical reason does not refute it, then we take it as we saw it, just as when we see Allah in the Next World.

So the One, the All-Merciful, has forms in every place from what is hidden and what is manifest.
If you said, "This is the Real!" you spoke truly;

and if you said, "It is something else," you interpreted.
His principle is not in one place rather than another, but it brings the Real to the creatures.
When He manifests Himself to the eyes,
the intellects deny him by insistent proofs.
He is accepted in the tajalli to the intellects, and in that which is called the imagination (khayâl).
That which is sound is the seeing.

Abu Yazid, (7) may Allah be pleased with him, says of this station, (8) "Had the Throne, and all it contains a hundred million times over, been in one of the corners of the heart of the gnostic, he would not have felt it." This is the magnitude of Abu Yazid in the world of bodies, but I say, "If the limitlessness of that which exists could be conceived of as being limited, and had it been contained as an existent source in one of the corners of the heart of the gnostic, he would not have been aware of it in his knowledge." For it is confirmed that the heart contains Allah, although it is not described by satiety. Had it been filled, it would have saturated.

Abu Yazid also said, "We have pointed to this station, saying:
O Creator of things in Yourself,
You encompass all You have created!
You create that whose being has no end in You,
for You are narrow and vast!
Had that which Allah created shone in my heart, this shining dawn would not have shone.
But that which contains Allah does not exclude creation.
How is that, O Hearing?"

Anyone can create by illusion in his imagination that which has no existence save in the imagination. This is a common matter. By aspiration (himma), the gnostic creates that which has an outside existence in his aspiration. However, it continues only as long as the aspiration continues to preserve it without being tired by preserving what it created. (9)

When it happens that the gnostic neglects to preserve what he created by concentration, that creature ceases to exist, unless the gnostic has mastered all the presences and does not neglect anything. Rather, he must witness at least one of these presences. If the gnostic creates something by his aspiration and possesses this encompassment, that creature's form will appear in every presence, and the form will preserve itself. If the gnostic neglects a presence or many presences while seeing one of the presences, and while preserving the form of what he created in the presence he is in, all the forms will be preserved by the preservation of that form in the presence which he does not neglect. For neglect is never universal, either among the common or the elite. I have exposed a secret here which the People of Allah have guarded jealously, for it contains a refutation of their allegation of being the Real. For the Real is never unconscious of anything, and the slave must be unconscious of something in favour of something else. Inasmuch as he preserves that which he has created, he says, "I am the Real," (10) but he does not maintain it the way the Real maintains it that is the difference. Inasmuch as he is unconscious of any form and its presence, the slave is distinguished from the Real. He must be distinct, although all the forms are maintained by his preservation of a single one of these in the presence of which he is conscious. This is preservation by inclusion, and the preservation of the Real of what He created is not like that. Rather, His preservation is of each form in particular. This matter which I have just communicated has never been written about by anyone - neither by me nor by any others - except in this book. It is unique in time. Take care lest you forget it!

The presence which you remain conscious of, with the form which resembles it, is like the Book about which Allah said, "We have not omitted anything from the Book." (6:38) It therefore integrates the tangible and the intangible. None will recognise what we have said except the one who is himself a Qur'an. (11) The one who fears Allah will have a furqân, (12) which is, as we mentioned, this matter in which the slave is distinct from the Lord. This furqân is the highest furqân.

At one moment, the slave is the Lord without a doubt, and at another the slave is most certainly the slave.
If he is the slave, he is vast by Allah, and if he is the Lord, he is in a restricted life.
Insofar as he is the slave,
he sees the source of himself, and without a doubt his hopes expand from him.
Inasmuch as he is a lord, he sees all of creation, from the presence of angels and the kingdom, demanding from him,
And he is unable to answer their demands by his essence.
For this reason, some of the gnostics weep.
Be the slave of a Lord, and do not be the lord of His slave, so you will not be suspended and tested in the fire.

7: The Seal of the Wisdom of Elevation in the Word of Isma'il (Ishmael)

Know that the one called Allah is Unique (Ahad) by Essence and by all His names, and every existent thing is only attached to Allah by its own lord exclusively, for it is impossible for an existent to possess the whole. As for Divine Unity (ahadiyya), no existent possesses any of it because one cannot have one part of it while another has another part. Unity does not admit of divisibility. His Unity integrates all of Him by potentiality.

The happy one is the one who is the one "who was pleasing to his Lord." (19:55) There is no one who is not pleasing to his Lord because it is by him that lordship (rububiyyah) (1) is sustained. He is pleasing to Him, and so he is happy. This is why Sahl at-Tustari said, "Lordship has a secret, and this secret is you." He was addressing every source. "Had the secret been disclosed, lordship would have been invalidated." He used the word "law" (2) which is the particle of impossibility - so it is never manifested, and lordship is never invalidated - for the source has no existence except by its Lord. The source is always existent, therefore lordship is never invalidated.

He who is pleasing is beloved, and all that the beloved does is beloved, so everything is pleasing, because the source could not act unless the act belonged to its Lord. The source is made tranquil by having an act attributed to it, but it is content with what appears in it and from it of the acts of its Lord, and is pleased with these acts, because every doer and producer is pleased with his act and product. He completes his act and product according to its basis. "He gives each thing its created form and then guides it," (20:50) that is, He revealed to it that He gave everything its creation, so it does not admit of decrease.

Isma'il, peace be upon him, by his discovery of what we mentioned "was pleasing to his Lord." In the same way, every existent thing who is pleasing to its Lord is also pleasing to the Lord of another, because lordship is only obtained from each of the names, not from the One of Unity. What is specific to it from the whole is only what is attributed to it. So He is its Lord. None is attached to Him in respect of His Unity. For this reason, the people of Allah are forbidden tajalli in the Unity. If you look at Him by Him, He is the One who is looking at Himself, and He continues to be Himself looking at Himself by Himself. If you look at Him by yourself, unity vanishes because of you. If you look at Him both through Him and through you, Unity also vanishes because the pronoun of the second person implies that there is something else besides that which is regarded. There must be some relationship which necessitates the duality of the regarder and regarded, and so Unity vanishes, even though there only exists the One who sees Himself by Himself. It is known that in this description, He is the Regarder and the Regarded.

It is not possible that the one who is pleasing be totally pleasing, unless all that he manifests comes from the act of the One who is pleased with him. Isma'il was distinguished from other individuals by how Allah described him, namely, that "he was pleasing to his Lord."

It is the same for every "self at peace" to which it is said, "Return to your Lord." He only commanded it to return to its Lord who called it, and so it recognised Him among the totality, "well-pleasing and well-pleased. Enter among My slaves!" (89:28) to the degree that they have this station. The slaves mentioned here refer to every slave who has gnosis of his Lord, who is content with Him, and does not turn to the Lord of another while preserving the unity of the source which is necessary. "Enter My Garden," which is My veil, (3) and My Garden is not other than you, so you veil Me by your essence. There is only gnosis of Me by you and you only exist by Me, so whoever has gnosis of you has gnosis of Me, and there is no gnosis of Me, for there is no gnosis of you. If you enter into the Garden, you enter into yourself, so you will know yourself by a gnosis other than the gnosis by which you had knowledge when you knew your Lord. You will have two sorts of gnosis: gnosis of Him in respect of yourself, and gnosis of yourself and Him in respect of Him, not in respect of you.

You are a slave and you are a lord to whomever you are a slave in respect of.
And you are a lord and you are a slave to whoever possesses the covenant in speech.
Every knot has a person over it who unravels it by one who has another knot.

Allah is pleased with His slaves, and "they are well-pleasing and well-pleased with Him." He is pleasing, so the two presences confront each other and accept likes, and the likes are opposites because the two likes are a single reality which does not unify them since they would not then be distinct. There is only the distinct, so there is no like. There is no like in existence, and so there is no opposite in existence. Existence is one reality, and the thing is not opposite to itself.

Only the Real remains,
no phenomenal being remains.
There is nothing connected, nothing distinct.
For that reason, the proof of the eye-witness came, so I only see His source with my eye when I see!

That is for "the one who fears his Lord" lest He makes distinction by his knowledge. By that distinction, we indicated the ignorance of sources in existence according to what the knower brought, so distinction occurs among the slaves, and distinction occurs among the lords. If distinction had not occurred, one divine name would have been interpreted in all its aspects by that by which another name is interpreted. The explanation of the Exalter is not that of the Abaser, and so on, but from the aspect of unity, as we said, every name indicates the Essence and its reality in respect to what it is. The One Named is but One. The Exalter is the Abaser in respect to the Named. It is not the Abaser in respect to itself and its reality. That which is understood differs in the understanding in respect to each of them.

Do not look at the Real.
Free Him from creation.
Do not look at creation, and garb it in other than the Real.
Disconnect Him and connect Him, and stand in a seat of honour. (4)
Stay in the state of gatheredness (jam') if you wish, and, if you wish, in the forms in separateness (farq).
You will win all,
even if all set out to carry the day.
You will not be annihilated and you will not have going-on and the forms will not be annihilated and will not have going-on.

Revelation will not be given to you in respect to another, and you will not receive it.

Praise is by the truth of the promise, not the truth of the threat. The Divine Presence demands praise which is praiseworthy in itself. So one extols the Divine Presence by the truth of the promise, not the truth of the threat, for one goes beyond it, "and do not imagine that Allah break His promise to His Messengers." (14:47) He did not say, "and his threat", rather He said that He will pass over their wrong actions even though he threatens not to. He praised Isma'il because "he was true to his promise." (19:54) Possibility vanishes in respect to the Real, since in it is that which demands the probable.

Nothing remains except the One who is true to His promise alone, and an eye does not remain
seeing the threat of the Real.
If they enter the abode of misery, in it they are in possession of delight, and a different bliss.
Than the bliss of the gardens of endless-time, but the matter is the same.
The difference between them occurs in the tajalli.
It is called punishment ('adhab) from the sweetness ('udhuba) of its food, that is like the husk of it, and the husk protects it.

Notes to Chapter 7:

1. Rububiyah: Lordship, the quality of being a lord. A term derived from the Qur'anic descriptions of Allah's lordship over creation. One might say the ecology of natural existence. It is an essential element in Sufic cosmology and is a most sophisticated concept which surpasses the crude specificity and mechanistic views of evolutionist biology. It is an energy system of relationships in constant change and altering dynamics. It functions through the different realms, the atomic, the mineral, the plant, and so on. It relates the levels of living organisms from the uni-cellular up to man, and the interpenetrations of organism and environment. It re-defines "event" from crude historicity to a picture of organism/event in a unified field. It is the underlying concept which allows us to abandon the dead mind/body split of the dying culture. It permits us to utilise and develop the energy concepts of Islamic/Chinese medicine - which hold a common energy concept at base. Rububiyya permits us to observe ONE PROCESS at work throughout every level of the creational realities.
2. "Law" (if, but probably not) expresses an unlikely condition, while "in" (if, but probably yes) expresses a probable condition.
3. Garden, Janna, also carries the connotation of veiling, concealing.
4. Qur'an 54:53-55, "The fearfully aware will be amid Gardens and Rivers on seats of honour in the presence of an All-Powerful King."

8: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Spirit (Rûh) in the Word of Ya'qub (Jacob)

The Din (1) is two Dins: the Din with Allah and with the one whom the Real knows, and who has recognition of the fact that the Real knows him; and the Din with creation; and Allah takes account of it since its goal is conformity with what Allah has willed of the Shari'a set down with Him. Allah said, "Ibrahim directed his sons to this, as did also Ya'qub, 'My sons! Allah has chosen this Din for you, so do not die except as Muslims'" (2:132) that is obeying Him. The Din brought the alif and the lam (2) of definition and acquaintance. It is the recognised Din. It is His words, "The Din with Allah is Islam," (3:19) and it is submission. So the Din is an expression of your obedience. That which is from Allah is the road which leads you to Him. Din is submission and the law (namus) is the road which Allah has set down.

Anyone who is described by submission to what Allah has prescribed for him is the one who has based himself on the Din, and it raises him up and establishes him as does the prayer. The slave is the product of the Din. Allah sets down judgements, and thus submission is the source of your action, and so Din is from your action. You will only achieve happiness by what comes from you. As happiness is established for you by your actions, so the Divine Names are only established by His actions, which are you and which are in-time. As He is called god by His effects, so you are called happy by your effects.

Allah bestowed His rank upon you since you established the Din and obeyed what He prescribed for you. I will enlarge on that, if Allah wills, in a useful manner, after we have clarified the Din which creation has which Allah takes account of when He says, "The Din is Allah's alone," (8:39) and all of it is from you, and not from Him except in respect to origin. Allah says, "They invented monasticism," (57:27) and monasticism consists of arbitrary esoteric rules (an-nawâmis al-hikmiya) which the known Messenger did not bring to the people from Allah by the traditional Prophetic method. When wisdom and clear benefit corresponded to these rules regarding the divine decision about the goal of the Shari'a of Allah, (3) Allah took it into account according to what He Himself prescribed. Allah did not prescribe it for them. Then Allah opened between Himself and their hearts the door of divine concern and mercy while they were not aware of it, and in their hearts He made them esteem their rules by which they seek "the pleasure of Allah" beyond the Prophetic method known by Divine definition. Allah says, "They did not observe it" those people who devised these rules and what was prescribed for them "as it should have been observed" - "unless it was purely out of the desire to gain the good pleasure of Allah." That was what they believed about it.

"To those of them who believed We gave their reward, but many of them are deviators." (57:27) "Many of them," i.e. those who have this worship prescribed for them, "are deviators," that is, do not submit to it and observe it properly. Allah does not accord to the one who does not obey it, a law which pleases Him, but the command requires submission. Its proof is that the one who is obligated either obeys with agreement or opposes it. The one who agrees and is obedient has no need of any discourse on it to prove it. The one who opposes it is seeking one of two matters from Allah to be judged regarding him: either overlooking of wrong actions and forgiveness, or being taken to task for that. One of the two is necessary because the command is true in itself. In any state, it is true that Allah guides His slave by his actions whatever state he is in, and so the state is the influencing factor.

Thus the Din is a reward, that is, the exchange for what is easy and for what for is not easy. "Allah is pleased with them, and they are pleased with Him" (97:8, 58:22) is the easy reward, and "As for any one of you who has done wrong, We will make him suffer great punishment" (25:19) is the reward of what is not easy. He passes over their wrong actions and this is their reward. It is proven that the Din is the reward. As the Din is Islam, and Islam is the same as being led, it leads to what is easy (the reward) and what is not easy (the punishment), and so it is the repayment. This is the language of the people of outwardness.

As for its secret and inwardness, it manifests itself in the mirror of the existence of Allah, so it does not refer to possibilities from Allah other than what their essences in their states accord. They have a form in every state, and their forms differ according to the difference of their states. The tajalli differs according to the difference of the state. The effect occurs in the slave according to what he is. None gives him good except himself, and none gives him the opposite of good except himself. Thus he gives bliss to his essence, and he also punishes it. He only blames himself and only praises himself. "Allah's is the conclusive argument" (6:149) in His knowledge of them since knowledge depends on the known.

The secret which is above this in this sort of question is that possibilities are based on their origin from non-existence. The existence of the created reality is only by the forms of the states on which the possibilities are based in themselves and their sources. Thus you know who has pleasure and who has pain, and from each of these states you know what follows ('aqaba); and since it follows, you derive punishment ('uquba) and penalty ('iqab) from it. It permits good and evil as two opposites which custom calls the good reward, and the evil punishment.

For this reason, He designates and elucidates the Din by custom because He relates to it what is necessary and what his state demands. Din is custom or habit, and the poet said, "Like your habit (Din) with the mother of little Harith...", that is, like your custom. What is understood by custom or habit is that the matter itself recurs. This is not the case in Din. Custom is repetition, but custom is only one intelligible thing while resemblance in forms exists. We know that Zayd is the same as 'Amr in respect to humanness, but humanness does not recur since, had it done so, it would have multiplied. It is but one reality, and the one does not multiply itself. We know that Zayd is not the same as 'Amr in respect to personality. The person of Zayd is not the person of 'Amr in spite of the realisation that personality is common to both. In the sensory, we say that humanness recurs because of this resemblance, and we say in sound judgement that it does not. From one aspect, there is no habit in reward, and from another aspect, there is habit even as there is reward by one aspect and no reward by another aspect. Thus reward is also a state in the possible. This is a question about which those who know this matter are unaware, and it is part of the secret of the Decree which governs creatures. Know that it is as if it were said of the doctor that he is the servant of nature - in the same way, it is said of the Messengers and heirs 4 that they are the servants of the Divine Command among people. In the heart of the matter, they serve the states of possible things, and their service derives from the sum of their own states on which they are based in the state of the immutability of their sources. See how wondrous this is!

Is not the the desired servant here the one who performs what is commanded by the one who is served, either by state or by word? So it is valid that the doctor be called the servant of nature if he acts according to the principle of assisting it. Nature produces in the body of the one who is ill a special state of being by which he is called "ill". If the doctor were to assist nature by service, he would also increase the magnitude of the illness by it when he wants to repel the illness, seeking health. Health is also a part of nature by the growth of another state of being which differs from this state of being. Then the doctor is not the servant of nature, and yet he serves it inasmuch as he only heals the body of the one who is ill and changes that aspect, not the general one, for generalities are not valid in this sort of question. Thus the doctor is both a servant and is not a servant of nature.

In the same way, the Messengers and their heirs are in the service of the Real, and the Real has two aspects of judgement in respect to the states of the obligated. The matter proceeds from the slave according to what the will of Allah demands of it, and the will of Allah is attached to it according to what the knowledge of Allah demands of it. The knowledge of Allah is attached to it according to what the known accords it of its essence. The known only appears in its form. The Messenger and the heir serve the divine command by will, and yet they do not serve the will. The Messenger answered it seeking the happiness of the one who is under obligation. Had he served the Divine Will, he would not have given counsel, and yet he only gave counsel by it, i.e. the will. The Messenger and the heir are the doctors of the selves for Next life, obedient to the command of Allah when He commands them. So he looks at Allah's command, and sees that He has commanded him to do that which opposes His will. The command is only what He wills, and for this reason, it is the command.

He wills the command and it occurs, and He did not will the occurrence of what He commanded the commanded one to do, and so it did not occur from the commanded one therefore it is called opposition and rebellion. The Messenger conveys the news, and this is why he said, "The Sura of Hud (and its like) made me white-haired," when they came to him from His words, "Go straight as you have been commanded." (11:112) He did not know whether he was commanded to what complies with the will, so that it occurs, or to what does not comply with the will, so that it does not occur.

No one recognises the judgement of the will except after what is willed takes place, unless he is one whose inner eye has been unveiled by Allah. If he is, he will perceive the source-forms of the possibilities in their fixed state for what they really are. Then he judges according to what he sees. This belongs to certain people at certain moments, but they do not have it all the time. The Messenger said, "I do not know what He will do with me or with you." (5) So he made the veil clear, and he only meant that it emerges in a particular command, and no more.

Notes to Chapter 8:

1. Din: The life transaction, literally the debt or exchange situation between two parties, in this usage the Creator and the created, or as some say between the conditioned and the unconditioned, the limited and the limitless, or the many and the One.
2. The definite article.
3. Which is the achievement of human perfection through knowledge and actions.
4. Hadith, "The people of knowledge are the heirs of the Prophets."

9: The Seal of the Wisdom of Light in the Word of Yusuf (Joseph)

This luminous wisdom spreads its light on the presence of the imagination (khayal), and it is the first of the beginnings of divine revelation in the people of divine concern. 'A'isha, may Allah be pleased with her, said, "The first of what the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had of revelation was the true dream. Then he only saw dreams which came like the breaking of dawn, and there was nothing hidden in it," (1) and her knowledge only extended to this. This lasted for six months, and then the angel came to him. She did not know that the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had said, "People are asleep, and when they die, they waken up." Everything seen in the state of wakefulness is of that sort, although states differ. She spoke of six months, but all his life in this world was like that, as a dream in a dream.

Everything reported of this nature is called the world of the imagination (khayal), and for this reason, there must be interpretation: the matter which has a form in itself appears in a form other than it. The interpreter passes from these forms which the sleeper sees to the form upon which the matter is based. If he is correct, as in knowledge appearing in the form of milk, then he interprets the source of the form of knowledge from the form of milk, He discovers the source and says, "This form of milk refers to the form of knowledge."

When the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, received revelation, he was taken from the ordinary sensory world. He was covered and withdrew from those who were present with him. When that left him, he returned, and he only received revelation in the "presence of the imagination", although it could not be said of him that he had been asleep.

It was the same when the angel appeared to him as a man. That was also from the presence of the imagination, for it was not a man, but rather an angel who had entered into the form of a man. The gnostic onlooker interpreted it until he reached its form in reality. Then he said, "This is Jibril who came to teach you your deen." (2) He told them, "Answer the greeting of the man," so he called him a man in respect to the form in which he appeared to them. Then he said, "This is Jibril," and he looked at the form to which this imaginary man would return. He spoke the truth both times, with the truth of the vision of the physical eye, and the truth in that this was Jibril without a doubt.

Yusuf, peace be upon him, said, "I saw eleven stars and the sun and the moon prostrate themselves in front of me." (12:4) He saw his brothers in the form of the stars and his father and mother in the form of the sun and moon. This is from the point of view of Yusuf. Had it been from the point of view of what was seen, the appearance of his brothers in the form of stars and the appearance of his father and mother in the form of the sun and moon would have been from their volition. Since they had no knowledge of what he saw, that which Yusuf perceived was in the repository of his imagination.

Ya'qub knew that when he related it to him, so he said, "O my son, do not tell your vision to your brothers in case they should devise some scheme to injure you." (12:5) Then he absolved his sons of deceit and ascribed it to Shaytan, who is the source of deceit. He said, "In truth, Shaytan is a clear-cut enemy to man," i.e. he manifests enmity. Then Yusuf said at the end of the affair, "This is now the interpretation of the dream that I had. My Lord has made it all come true," (12:100) that is, that He manifested it in the world of senses after it was in the form of the imagination.

The Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said about it, "People are asleep". Yusuf spoke of what his Lord had rendered true in the status of one who dreams that he has awakened from his dream and interprets it, and does not know that he is still asleep. Then later when he wakes up, he says, "I dreamt such-and-such a thing, and then I dreamt that I woke up and interpreted in such-and-such a way." This is similar to that. Look at how great the difference of perception is between Muhammad, peace be upon him, and Yusuf, peace be upon him, at the end of the affair when Yusuf said, "This is the interpretation of my dream of long ago which my Lord has rendered true," that is, made sensory or sensed. It was always sensed, since the imagination only gives out sensed things, and it has nothing other than that. See how noble is the knowledge of the heirs of Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace!

I would say more on this presence on the Muhammadan tongue of Yusuf, as you will soon understand, if Allah wills. Know that that which is referred to as other-than-Allah, or the universe, is related to Allah as the shadow is related to the person. The universe is the shadow of Allah. It is the same as the relation of existence to the universe, since the shadow exists in the senses without a doubt. But there must be something by which that shadow appears. If one were to remove that by which the shadow appears, the shadow would be intelligible but would not exist in the senses. Rather, it would be a potential in the essence of the person on whom it depends. The locus of the manifestation of this divine shadow called the "universe" is the sources of the possibilities by which this shadow extends itself. This shadow is perceived according to what it projects itself on from the existence of this essence, but perception occurs through His name, the Light. This shadow is projected on the sources of possibilities in the form of the unknown unseen.

Do you not see that shadows incline to the darkness, indicating the hiddenness they contain because of the distance of the relationship between them and the persons who project them? Even if the person is white, his shadow is like this. Do you not see that when mountains are distant from the eye of the onlooker, they appear black? In their actual sources they are other than the colour the senses perceive. This is only due to the effect of distance. It is like the blue of the sky. This is the effect distance has on the senses with non-luminous bodies. It is the same for the sources of possibilities which are non-luminous because they are non-existent. Even if they are described as unchanging, they are not described by existence since existence is light. Distance makes luminous bodies appear small in the senses, so this is another effect of distance. The senses perceive them as small in size, whereas in their sources they are large according to that degree and greater in magnitude. One knows by proof that the sun is larger than the earth, but it appears to be the size of a shield. That is also an effect of distance.

You only know the universe according to the amount you know the shadows, and you are ignorant of the Real according to what you do not know of the person on which that shadow depends. Inasmuch as He has a shadow, He is known, and inasmuch as one is ignorant of what is in the essence of the shadow of the form which projects the shadow, he is ignorant of Allah. For that reason, we say that Allah is known to us from one aspect and not known to us from another aspect. "Do you not see how your Lord stretches out shadows? If He had wished, He could have made them stationary," (25:45) i.e. it still would be a potential in Himself. It is as He said, that Allah would not give a tajalli of Himself to possibilities until He manifests the shadow. The shadow is as if it remains outside of the possibilities which do not have a source manifested for them in existence.

"Then We appoint the sun to be a pointer to them," that is to His name, the Light of which we spoke, and the senses witness it, for shadows have no source in the absence of light. "Then We draw them back to Ourselves, in gradual steps," so Allah draws it back to Himself because it is His shadow which appeared from Him, and it is not other-than-Him. All that you perceive is the existence of Allah in the sources of possibilities. Inasmuch as the He-ness of Allah is He, it is His existence. Inasmuch as forms differ in it, it is the sources of possibilities. As the name of the shadow does not leave it by the difference of forms, in the same way the name of the universe or the name other-than-Allah does not leave it by the difference of forms. In regard to the Divine Unity of His being, the shadow is Allah, because He is the One, the Unique; and in respect to the multiplicity of forms, it is the world, so understand and realise what I have explained to you! Since the matter is as I mentioned, the universe is illusory, and it does not have a real existence. This is the meaning of the imagination, that is, you imagine that the universe is an autonomous extra thing outside of Allah. It is not like that in itself. Do you not see that in the senses, the shadow is connected to the person who projects it, and it is impossible that it be detached from that connection since it is impossible for something to be detached from its own essence? Recognise your source ('ayn), and who you are, what is your he-ness and what your relation to Allah is, and by what You are the Truth and by what you are the universe, "other", and whatever resembles these expressions. In this, those that know vie in excellence, so there is the one who knows and the one who is more knowing.

The Real is, in relation to a particular shadow, small or large, pure or more pure, as light is in relation to what veils it from the onlooker through coloured glass which tints it. At the same time, it has no colour, and so you see it as making a mirror-image of your reality to your Lord. If you say that the light is green by the greenness of the glass, you will have spoken the truth as your sensory vision testifies. If you say that it is not green and has no colour as evidence accords you, you will have spoken the truth as sound logical consideration testifies. This is light projected across the shadow, and it is the same as the glass which is a luminous shadow because of its purity. It is the same for one of us who has realised the Real. His form manifests itself in him more than it manifests itself in another. Among us there is the one for whom Allah is his hearing, seeing, and all his faculties and limbs, (3) according to the signs which the Shari'a gives in a transmission from Allah. In spite of this, the source of the shadow exists, so the pronoun of "his hearing" refers to him. Other slaves are not like this. The relation of this slave is nearer to the existence of Allah than the relation of other slaves.

Then the matter is as we have confirmed. So know that you are imagination and that which you perceive and of which you say, "It is not me" is also imagination. All of existence is imagination within imagination. True existence is Allah, the Real, in particular in respect to essence and source, not in respect to His Names, because the Names have two meanings. One meaning is His source which is the same as the "Named", and the other meaning is what it indicates and that by which the Name is separate from this other Name, and so distinct. The Ever-Forgiving is separate from the Manifest and the Hidden, and the First is distinct from the Last. Thus it is clear to you that each Name is the same as the other Name, and yet it is not the other Name. Inasmuch as the Name is the same, it is the Real, and inasmuch as it is not it, it is the imaginary Real which we discussed.

Glory be to the One who is only proven by Himself and Whose being is only confirmed by His source! The Hidden is pure non-existence, so whoever holds to multiplicity, holds to the universe and the Divine Names and the names of the world. Whoever holds to Divine Unity holds to Allah in respect to His Essence which is independent of the universe, not in respect to its divinity and form. If the Essence is independent of the universe, then He is the source of its independence from the ascriptions of the Names, because it has the Names, and they indicated it as they indicate other named things in which their effect is realised. "Say: He is Allah, Absolute Oneness" (112:1) in respect of his source, "Allah, the Everlasting Sustainer of all" in respect to our dependence on Him. "He has not given birth" in respect to His He-ness and us, "and was born born" the same way, "and no one is comparable to Him" in the same way.

This is His description so He singled out His Essence in His statement, "Allah is Unique (Ahad)". Multiplicity appears by His attributes which are known with us. We beget and are begotten, we depend on Him, and we are equals to one another. This is the One who is pure above these attributes. He is independent of them as He is independent of us. There is no description of Allah except for this sura, the Sura al-Ikhlās (112), and it was revealed in that. The Divine Unity (ahadiyya) of Allah is in respect to the Divine Names which demand the unity of multiplicity on our part, and the Divine Unity of Allah, in respect to His independence from us and from the names, is the Divine Unity of the source. Both of them are included in the name, the Unique One (al-Ahad).

Know that Allah has not manifested the shadows and made them prostrate themselves, casting themselves to the left and the right, (4) except as indications for you of yourself and Him. In this way you are able to recognise who you are and what your relationship to Him is, and what His relationship to you is, until you know from where and by which divine reality that which is other-than-Allah is described, through its complete poverty to Him as well as the relative poverty of some to others. In this way also, you are able to know from where and by what reality it is that Allah is described by independence from people and the universe, and the universe is described by independence, i.e. the independence of some from others in an aspect which is the source of its need of some. For the universe is in need of causes without a doubt by essential need. The greatest of its causes is the causality of Allah, and there is no causality of Allah by which the universe is in need except for the Divine Names. The universe is in need of each of the Divine Names, whether from the universe like it or, from Allah Himself. Thus it is Allah, and not other-than-Him.

This is why Allah said, "Mankind! you are the poor in need of Allah whereas Allah is the Rich Beyond Need, the Praiseworthy." (35:15) It is known that we depend on each other. Our names are the Names of Allah since everything is, without a doubt, in need of Him. At the same time, our sources are His shadow, and not other-than-Him. So He is our he-ness, and He is not our he-ness. We have prepared the way for you, so look!

10: The Seal of the Wisdom of Divine Unity (Ahadiyya) in the Word of Hud

Allah has the straight path which is manifest and unhidden among the common people.
Its source exists in great and small, in those who are ignorant of matters and those who know.

For this reason, 'His mercy encompasses everything,' (1) great and small. "There is no creature He does not hold by the forelock. My Lord is on a Straight Path." (11:56) So all that walks on the Straight Path of the Lord, and is not of those "against whom Allah is wrathful" from this aspect, nor is he "astray". (2) As being astray is a non-essential quality, so divine wrath is also a non-essential quality. The source to which they return is the "mercy which extends to all things", and which preceded wrath. Everything which is other-than-Allah is a creature which crawls and which has a spirit. There is nothing which crawls by itself, rather it crawls by other than it. It crawls by the principle of following the One who is on a Straight Path. It is only a path by virtue of the fact that it is walked on.

If creation draws near you, Allah draws near you.
If Allah draws near you, creation does not follow.
So realise what we say on it, and everything I have said to you is true.
There is no existent thing in phenomenal being that you see which does not have articulation.
The eye only sees of creation that its source is Allah.
But He is stored in it, and for this reason, its forms are true.

Know that divine knowledges of taste (dhawq) which are acquired by the people of Allah differ according to the different faculties acquired from them, even though they derive from a single source. Allah said, "I am his hearing by which he hears and his sight by which he sees and his hand by which he strikes and his foot by which he walks." (3) So He mentioned that His He-ness is the source of the limbs which are the same as the slave. Thus He-ness is one, but the limbs are different, and every limb has one of the knowledges of taste which are specified from a single source, and differ according to the different limbs. It is like water which is but a single reality, yet differs in taste according to the different locations. The water of the Euphrates is sweet, and brackish water is salty, yet it is water in all its states and its reality does not change, even though the taste differs.

This wisdom is from the wisdom of the feet. It is the words of Allah, that whoever establishes His Books will eat "from beneath their feet" (5:66). The path which is the Straight Path is travelling on it, and walking and running on it. It is only by the feet. So this witnessing of the taking by the forelock by the hand of the One who is one the Straight Path only results in this special art from the knowledges of taste. "We will drive the evildoers" (19:86), (4) who are those who deserve the station to which they are sent, and destroy them by the west wind. (5) The wind takes them by the forelocks and carries them on, and it is the source of the passions which take them to Jahannam. It is the distance (6) which they imagined. When it carried them to that abode, they reached the source of nearness, and so distance vanished. What is called Jahannam vanished in respect to them. They win the bliss of nearness in respect to merit since they were wrong-doers.

This pleasurable station of taste was not given to them as a favour. They received it by what they realities merited from the acts which they were doing. They were running with their actions on the Straight Path of the Lord because their forelocks were in the hand of the One who has this attribute. They did not walk by themselves, but by the principle of compulsion to reach the source of nearness. "We are nearer to him than you, but you cannot see." (56:85) Rather it is seen, and so the covering is stripped away, and "his sight is sharp." (7) What is specified as dead is from the dead, i.e. what distinguishes the happy from the wretched in usage. "We are nearer to him than his jugular vein." (50:16) What is specified as man is from man, so divine nearness is from distance as is not hidden in divine transmissions. There is no nearness nearer than that His He-ness be the source of the limbs of the slave and his faculties. The slave is not other than these limbs and faculties, so he is Allah witnessed in illusory creation. Creation is intelligible and Allah is felt and witnessed with the believers and the people of unveiling. Allah is intelligible with other classes, and creation is witnessed. So they are in the station of the salty, brackish water. The first group is the station of the sweet water which is pleasant to drink.

People are of two classes those who walk on the path recognising it and its end, for it is a straight path in respect to him; and those who walk on the path being ignorant of it and not knowing its end. It is the same path which the other class knows. The gnostic calls to Allah by inner sight, and the non-gnostic calls to Allah by limitation and ignorance. This is a special knowledge which comes from the lowest of the low (8) because the feet are the lower part of the person, and what is lower than them is none other than the path. Whoever recognises that Allah is the same as the Path, recognises the matter for what it is. Then Allah is travelling on it since there is no known except Him, and He is the source of the wayfarer and the traveller. There is no knower except Him. He is you, so know your reality and your Path (tariqa). The matter has been made clear to you on the tongue of the interpreter, (9) if you but understand. It is the true tongue, so the only one who will understand is the one whose understanding is Real.

Allah has many ascriptions and their existence varies. See how 'Ad, the people of Hud, said, "This is a storm cloud which will give us rain." (46:24) They thought good of Allah, and He is with the opinion of His slave. (10) Allah turned this word away from them. He informed them of what was more perfect and higher in nearness. When it rained upon them, that was the earth's portion and the seed was watered. He told them, "No, rather it is what you desired to hasten a wind containing painful punishment." He made the wind (rîh) an indication of what rest (râha) it contained for them. By this wind, He gladdens their spirits (arwah), delivering them from dark forms, difficult paths and black veils. There is punishment ('adhab) in this wind, i.e. a matter which they find sweet (ista'dhaba) when they taste it. It only pains them by the separation from familiar things. Thus punishment gives them good news. And the command is nearer to them than they imagine.

"Destroying everything at its Lord's command ! When morning came you could see nothing but their dwellings." (46:25) That is, their corpses, in which their true spirits lived, so the trueness of this special relation vanished from them; and a special life in their forms remains to them from Allah of which their skins, hands, and feet speak, (11) so does the punishment of the blows and thighs. (12) All that is related in a divine text.

Allah described himself by jealousy (ghayra). Out of jealousy He forbade actions unrestrained by limits (fawahish). The unrestrained act is only what is evident. As for the unrestrained which is hidden, it belongs to the one who manifests it. When He made the unrestrained haram, that it, forbade that the reality of what we mentioned be known, and that is the source of things, He hid it by other (ghayr). So other says: hearing is Zayd's hearing. The gnostic says that hearing is Allah. Thus nothing remains of the faculties and limbs. Therefore not everyone recognises Allah. People vie in excellence and ranks are differentiated, and the exceeding and exceeded are clear.

Know that Allah revealed to me and caused me to witness in a vision, which I received in Cordoba in 586, the sources of His Messengers and all His Prophets, from Adam to Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. None of this group spoke to me except for Hud, peace be upon him. He told me why they were gathered together. I saw that he was a very large man of good appearance, subtle in reply, gnostic in matters of unveiling. My proof of his unveiling is His words, "There is no creature He does not hold by the forelock. My Lord is on a Straight Path." (11:56) What gift to creatures is greater than this? Then it is from the bestowal of favours on us by Allah that this speech reached us from Him in the Qur'an.

Then Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant us peace, completed its gathering for everyone by what he was told by Allah, for He is the source of "hearing, sight, the hand, the foot and tongue the source of the senses. The spiritual faculties are nearer than the senses. He is content with the defined and distant more than with the defined unknown which is nearer. Allah translated the speech of Hud to his people to inform us, and the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, translated the speech of Allah in turn to give us good news. Knowledge is perfected in the breasts of those who are given knowledge, "and none denies Our signs but the unbelievers," (29:47) for they cover up the signs when they recognise them through envy, meanness and injustice. We only see from Allah in respect of Himself disconnection (tanzih) or non-disconnection by definition in any ayat which He has sent down or in transmissions which have reached us from Him. Otherwise He has the Great Mist (al-'Ama') (13) which has no air above it and no air beneath it. Allah was in it before He created creation. Then He mentioned that He "established Himself firmly on the Throne." (57:4) This is also definition. Then He mentioned that "He descends to the nearest heaven." (14) This is also definition. Then He said that "He is in the heaven and in the earth," (15) and "He is with us wherever we are." (16) and He tells us that He is our source. We are limited, so He only describes Himself by limitation.

His statement, "There is nothing like Him," (42:11) is also limitation if we take the kaf ("like") as an appendage to other than the attribute. Whoever is distinct from the defined is defined by his phenomenal being which is not the source of what is defined. Freedom from limitation is limitation, and the absolute is limited by absoluteness for whoever has understanding. If we attach the kaf of ka-mithli (like) to the attribute, we define it. If we take "There is nothing like Him" as the negation of "like (mithl)", we realise the given and the sound transmissions that He is the source of things, and that things are defined. If their definitions differ, He is defined by the definition of everything with a definition. Nothing is defined unless it is a definition of Allah's. He moves in the designation of creatures and creation. Had the matter not been like that, existence would not have been valid, for He is the source of existence. He preserves everything by His Essence, and the preserving of something does not oppress Him. (17) His preserving of all things is His preserving of His form in that the thing is other than His form. Only this is valid. He is the witness in the witness and the witnessed in the witnessed. (18) He is the spirit of the universe which is managed by Him, and it is the Macrocosmic or Great man (al-insan al-kabir).

He is all phenomenal being and He is the One (al-Wahid) who establishes my phenomenal being by His being,
For that reason, I said that He is nourished.
So my existence is His food, and we imitate Him in Him from Him, if you look by the aspect of my taking refuge.

For his sorrow breathed, so the breath is related to the All-Merciful because He is Merciful by it. Divine ascriptions demand it from the bringing into existence of the form of the universe which we have said is what is manifest by Allah since He is the Manifest. It is His inward since He is the Hidden; and He is the First since He was when they were not. He is the Last since their source is in their manifestation. The Last is the source of the Manifest, and the Hidden is the source of the First. He has knowledge of all things since he knows Himself. When He brought forms into existence in the Breath, and the power of the ascriptions designated by the names appeared, the divine ascriptions then became valid for the universe. They depend on Allah. He said, "Today, I set down your ascriptions and raise up My ascriptions," i.e. I take from you your dependence on yourselves and return to you your dependence on Me. Where are those who are fearful of Allah? (19) they those who take Allah as a safeguard. Allah is their manifest part, i.e. the source of their manifest forms. They are the greatest of people, the most pure and the strongest among all. The one who has taqwa is the one who makes himself a safeguard for Allah by His form since the He-ness of Allah is the faculties of the slave. The one called the slave makes a safeguard for the One called Allah based on witnessing, so that the knower is distinct from the one who does not know. "Say: 'Are they the same those who know and those who do not know?' It is only people of intelligence who pay heed," (39:9) and they see into the core of the thing (20) which is sought from that thing. The negligent one does not precede the diligent, and similarly the hireling does not resemble the slave, Since Allah is a safeguard for the slave by one aspect, the slave is a safeguard for Allah by another aspect. Say what you like about phenomenal being. If you like, say that it is creation. If you like, say that is the Real. If you like, say that it is both the Real and creation. If you like, say that it is not Real from every point of view and not creation from every point of view. If you wish, say it is bewilderment in that. The goals are made clear by your specification of ranks. If it had not been for definition, the Messengers would not have reported the changing of the Real in forms, nor would they have described Him by the dropping of forms from Himself.

The eye only looks to Him, and authority only rests with Him.

We are His, and by Him, in His hand, in every state, so we are with Him. For that reason, He is denied and recognised, disconnected and described. The one who sees Allah from Him in Him by His eye is a gnostic. The one who sees Allah from Him in Him by his own eye is not a gnostic. The one who does not see Allah from Him nor in Him, and waits to see Him by his own eye is veiled and ignorant.

On the whole, each person must have some doctrine of his Lord by which he refers to Him and in which he seeks Him. So when Allah manifests Himself to him in it, he knows Him and goes near Him. If He manifests Himself to him in other than it, he denies Him and takes refuge from Him and has bad adab in that matter while claiming he shows adab with Him. (21) He only believes in a divinity according to the [subjective] form he gives that in himself. The divinity of creeds is based on subjective positing. People only see themselves and what they formulate in themselves.

Look at the ranks of people in knowledge of Allah. That is the source of their ranks in vision on the Day of Rising; and I have taught you the necessary cause of it. Take care lest you be limited by a particular creed and deny what is other than it, so that a great blessing may pass you by. Indeed, knowledge of what the matter is based on may pass you by.

Make yourself a vessel for all the forms of belief. Surely Allah is vaster and greater than being contained by one creed rather than another. So Allah says, "Wherever you turn, the face of Allah is there." (2:115) He did not mention one "where" less than another. He said there is the face of Allah. The face of the thing is its reality. By this He spoke to the hearts of the gnostics, that they might not occupy themselves with non-essentials in this life through seeking the like of this. The slave does not know in which breath he will be taken. He may be taken at the time of his negligence, and then he will not be equal to the one taken in a state of presence.

Then the slave who is perfect knows that this is linked to exterior form and to the state limited by turning the prayer toward the Masjid al-Haram. He believes that Allah is in his qibla when he prays. Those are some of the ranks of Allah from "Wherever you turn, the face of Allah is there." The direction of the Masjid al-Haram is one of them. In it is the face of Allah, but do not say "He is here", rather stop with what you perceive and cling to adab in turning towards the Masjid al-Haram, and cling to adab in the non-encompassment of the face in this particular whereness. Rather whereness is part of the sum of directions to which one turns. So Allah makes it clear to you that He is in the "where-ness" of every direction.

There are only creeds, so all directions are correct. Every correct thing has a reward. Every rewarded thing is happy. Every happy one is approved. If he is wretched at one time in the Next Abode, the people of preservation experience illness and pain in this life in spite of our knowledge that they are happy and the people of Allah. Among the slaves of Allah are those who are overtaken by these pains in the other life in an abode called Jahannam. Even so, none of the people of knowledge to whom the matter is unveiled for what it is declares that they do not possess a bliss particular to them in this abode. As for the loss of pain, they denied it, and so it was lifted from them. Their bliss is their rest from feeling that pain, or else bliss is particular and extra as is the bliss of the people of the Garden in the Garden. Allah knows best.

11: The Seal of the Wisdom of Revelation (Futuh) (1) in the Word of Salih

Among the signs are the signs of the mounts. (2)
That is due to the difference in destinations.
Among those with mounts are those who make their mounts stand by the command of Allah, and among them are those who cross the deserts with their mounts.
As for those who stand,
they are the people of the source, (3)
and those who cross the deserts are the aliens.
Each of these has the revelation (futuh) of the Unseen worlds brought to him from Allah on every side.

Know, may Allah grant you success, that the business (of bringing into existence) is based on uniqueness (fardiyya), and uniqueness has triplicity which is from three and upwards. Three is the first singular. The universe exists from this Divine Presence. Allah, may He be exalted!, says, "Our Word to a thing when We desire it is just to say to it, 'Be' and it is." (16:40) This is an essence which has volition and speech. (4) Had it not been for this essence and its volition, which is connecting attention to something particular in order to bring anything into being (and when He turns to that thing, He says, "Be"), that thing would not have been. Then tripartite uniqueness also appeared in that thing, and it is by this uniqueness in respect to the thing that it is valid that it take and that it be described by existence. Its triplicity is its thingness, its hearing, and obeying the command of the One who gives it form by bringing it into existence. It accepted three by the threeness of its fixed essence when it was in the state of its non-existence in counterbalance to the essence of the One who brought it into existence. Its hearing is in counterbalance to the volition of the One who brought it into existence. Its agreeing to comply with the command to take form is in counterbalance to His word "'Be!' and it is." Taking form is thus related to the thing. If it not had the capacity to take form from within itself when this is said, it would not have been. Allah only brought the thing into existence after it was not in the command of taking form, by the thing itself.

Allah confirmed that taking-form (takwin) belongs to the thing itself, not to Allah; and that that which belongs to Allah is His command. Similarly, He told us about Himself when He said, "Our Word to a thing when We desire it is just to say to it, "Be!" and it is." He ascribed taking-form to the thing itself from the command of Allah. Allah speaks the truth, so this is understood in the command itself. Someone who is feared and not disobeyed commands His slave: "Stand!" and the slave stands in obedience to his master's command. When this slave stands, the master only has the command to the slave to stand. Standing is the slave's action, not the master's action.

Thus taking-form is based on triplicity, i.e. from three, on both sides the side of Allah and the side of creation. That applies to bringing meanings into existence by proofs. The proof must be compounded of three in a special structure and special condition. There must be a result from it. The result is that the thinker constructs his proof from two propositions. Each one proposition contains two singulars, and so it four. One of the four is repeated in the two propositions in order to link one to the other as is marriage. It is three and no more because of one is repeated in both of them. That is how it is the goal exists. Then this compound occurs in a special aspect which is that the two propositions are connected to each other by the repetition of that one singular, by which triplicity, and the special condition that the principle be more general by cause or equal to it, is valid. Then the principle is true. If it is not like that, then it will give a result which is not true. This existent thing in the universe is like the ascription of actions to the slave, removed from their ascription to Allah, or the ascribing of taking form, the object of our discussion, to Allah absolutely. But Allah only ascribed it to the thing which was told, "Be!" A representation of that is if we wish to prove that the universe exists from a cause, (5) we say that every thing which is in-time has a cause. (6) Thus we have the in-time and the cause. Then in the other proposition we say that the universe is in time. The "in-time" is repeated in the two propositions. The third singular is "the universe". From this it follows that the universe has a cause and the conclusion appears in what was mentioned in the first proposition - that is the cause.

The special aspect is the repetition of the "in-time", and the special condition is the generality of the cause ('illa) because the cause is what effects the existence of the in-time. The principle is general in the in-timeness of the universe in relation to Allah.

We therefore make the judgement that every being which is "in-time" has a cause, i.e. in the greater proposition, unless that cause is equal to the principle or the principle is more general than the cause. So the universe would thus fall under the principle of the cause [in both cases]. The result is true.

The principle of triplicity also appears in bringing meanings into existence, which makes use of proofs. The root of phenomenal being is triplicity. For this reason, the wisdom of Salih, peace be upon him, is what Allah manifested in the delay of three days when He promised to punish the people of Salih, and the promise was kept. The truth was the result, and it was the Cry by which Allah destroyed them, and "morning found them lying flattened in their homes." (11:67) On the first of the three days, the faces of the people became yellow, and on the second day red, and on the third day black. When the three days had passed, their predisposition was proved and corruption appeared in them. That manifestation was called "destruction".

The yellowing of the faces of the wretched is in counterbalance to the shining of the faces of the happy in the words of Allah, "Some faces on that day will be radiant (musfira)" (80:38) which comes from sufur, when the dawn becomes white. This is a manifestation as the yellowing of the faces on the first day was the manifestation of the sign of the wretchedness of Salih's people. Then came the counterbalance offered to His word about the happy, "laughing".(80:39) Laughter is one of the causes which produces redness in the face. Among the happy, it is the cheeks which are red.

Then He made the complexion of the wretched turn black as a counterbalance to His word, "joyous (mustabshira)". (7) That is the effect that joy has on their skins as black effected the skins of the wretched. For this reason, He spoke of the two groups with good news (bushra). He spoke a word to them which affected their skin (bashara) which turned a colour by which skin had not been described before this event. Allah said in regarding the happy, "Their Lord gives them the good news of His mercy and good pleasure," (9:21) and He said about the wretched, "Give them the news of a painful punishment." (9:34) There was an effect on the skin of each group because of the effect of the discourse on them. It only appeared in them outwardly by virtue of the understanding which was fixed inside them. So it is them who have that effect on themselves just as taking form only comes from them. "Allah's is the conclusive argument." (6:149) Whoever understands this wisdom and confirms it in himself and witnesses it, gives his self rest from connection to other. He knows that good and evil only come from him. By good, I mean what agrees with his goal and suits his nature and temperament. By evil, I mean what does not agree with his goal or suit his nature and temperament. The one who possesses this witnessing makes out excuses for all existent beings, even if they do not make excuses. He knows that all he has for himself is from himself, as we mentioned at the beginning, since knowledge follows the known. When something which does not agree with his goal comes to him, he tells himself , "Clench your fists and puff out your cheeks!" "Allah speaks the truth and He guides to the Way." (33:4)

Notes to Chapter 11:

1. Opening. Salih has this in view of the fact that the mountain split open to reveal the she-camel, he opened belief to those who believed in him. The camel is a mount.
2. Mounts which are miracles proving the truthfulness of the Prophets - like the Buraq of Muhammad and the she-camel of Salih.
3. Eyewitnessing.
4. i.e. a triplicity: Essence, volition, and speech (qawl).
5. Here he uses sabab, something by which something is brought about, rather than 'illa, which is something which alters or effects something, as in cause and effect. 'Illa is the reason behind judicial reasoning.
6. First proposition.
7. Comes from a root meaning skin (bashara), the root of bashshara, to give good news, is to announce something which produces a change in the complexion.

12: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Heart in the Word of Shu'ayb (Jethro)

Know that the heart of the gnostic of Allah is from the mercy of Allah, and it is vaster than mercy. The heart encompasses Allah, but His Mercy does not encompass Him. (1) This is the language of the general public from the door of indication (ishara). Allah is merciful (rahim) and is not the one to whom mercy is shown (marhum). Mercy has no power over Him. As for the indication from the tongue of the elite, Allah describes Himself by the breath which is from breathing. The Divine Names are the same as the Named, and the breath is none other than Him. They require what they give the breath of realities, so the realities which the Names demand are not other than the universe. Thus divinity (ulûhîya) demands the object of worship (ma'luh) and sovereignty (rubûbiya) demands the object of lordship (marbub). (2) They have no source except by the universe in existence and determination (taqdir). Allah, in respect to His essence, is independent of the universe, but sovereignty does not possess this principle. The matter remains between what the sovereignty demands and what the essence deserves of independence from the universe. Sovereignty is based on reality and the description is only the same as this essence.

Then the matter changes according to the relationships. It is reported that Allah only describes Himself with compassion for His slaves. The first of what was breathed from sovereignty by Himself is related to the Merciful by His bringing into being the universe, which sovereignty demands by its reality and all the Divine Names. By this aspect it is confirmed that "His mercy encompasses everything." (3) It encompasses Allah. It is wider than the heart or equal to it in capacity.

Know that Allah, as it is confirmed in sound tradition, changes in the forms of the tajalli. When the heart contains Allah, it does not contain other-than-Him of creatures along with Him. It is as if He filled it, and the meaning of this is, that when it looks to Allah in His tajalli to it, it is not possible to look at another with Him.

The heart of the gnostic in respect to vastness is as Abu Yazid al-Bistami said, "If the Throne and what surrounds it a million times over were in one of the corners of the heart of the gnostic, he still would not feel it." Al-Junayd said about this meaning, "If the in-time were compared to the out-of-time, not a trace of it would remain." The heart encompasses the out-of-time, so how can it sense the in-time as existent? If Allah varies His tajalli in forms, then by necessity, the heart is expanded and contracted according to the form in which the divine tajalli occurs. There is nothing left in the heart apart from the form in which the tajalli occurs. So in relation to the seal, the heart of the gnostic or the Perfect Man, is at the stage of the place that is the face of the seal. It does not exceed it, rather it is its size and shape in respect to roundness. The face is round, square, hexagonal, octagonal, etc. in form. If the face is square, hexagonal, octagonal or whatever form, its place in relation to the seal is like it and it is not like other than it.

This is the opposite of what one group alluded to, saying that Allah gives a tajalli according to the predisposition of the slave. This is not how it is. The slave is manifest to Allah according to the form in which Allah gives him a tajalli of Himself.

The exact clarification of this question is that Allah has two tajalli: an unseen tajalli and a visible tajalli. From the unseen tajalli He accords the predisposition on which the heart is based, and it is the tajalli of the Essence of which the Unseen is the reality. It is the He-ness which merits it by His word from Himself: "He". His He-ness is always He. If this predisposition comes to the heart, then the visible tajalli is manifested to it in the Visible world, so the heart sees it. He is manifest by the form of whatever tajalli he has, as we mentioned. Allah gives it the predisposition by His word, "He gave everything its creation, then guided it." (20:50) Then He lifted the veil between Him and His slave, so He sees Him in the form of his belief in Allah. Allah, who is in the belief, is He whose form the heart contains. He is the One who gives it a tajalli, and so it knows Him. The eye only sees by belief, not hidden in the varieties of belief.

Whoever limits Allah, denies Allah in other than what he limits Allah to, and confirms Allah in what he limits Him by, when Allah gives him a tajalli. Whoever frees Allah from limitation does not deny Allah, and so confirms Allah in every form in which Him changes. He is given from himself according to the form in which the tajalli infinitely occurs. The forms of the tajalli are without end. Similarly knowledge of Allah has no limit in the gnostic who understands the forms. Rather, he is a gnostic at every moment, seeking increase of knowledge by "Lord, increase me in knowledge! Lord, increase me in knowledge! Lord, increase me in knowledge!" (4)

The business is endless from both sides. This is as if you said: Allah and creation. If you looked at His words, "I am his foot by which he runs, and his hand with which he strikes and his tongue by which he speaks," and so on of the faculties whose location are the limbs which are not separate, then you said that the matter is all Allah or the matter is all creation. It is creation by one ascription and it is Allah by another ascription, yet the source is one. The source of the form is what gives the tajalli of the source of the form which did not exist before the tajalli. It is the one giving the tajalli and the one receiving it. See how wondrous is the command of Allah in respect to His He-ness and in respect to His relationship to the universe in the realities of His most Beautiful Names!

Who is He and what is He and what is His source?

He is He!

Whoever is of His commonality is of His elite, and whoever is of His elite is of His commonality.

There is no source except source,
so the light of His source is His darkness.

Whoever is ignorant of this experiences grief in himself

And none recognises what we have said except for the slave who has aspiration (himma).

He said, "There is a reminder in that for anyone who has a heart," (50:37) because the heart (qalb) is transformed (taqallaba) in the various forms and attributes. He did not say, "to him who has an intellect" because the intellect limits. (5) It confines the matter to a single description, but reality refuses to be contained. It is also a reminder for those who have intellect, and they are those who have creeds by which some deny others, and some curse others, and they do not have helpers. (6) The god of the one with a creed does not have jurisdiction over the god of someone with another creed. The one who has a creed defends it; he defends the matter which he believes of his god, and supports it. He does not support that which is not in his creed. For this reason, he has no effect on the creeds of his dissenters, and similarly his dissenters have no help from the god who is in his creed; so they have no helpers. Allah excluded help from the divinity of creed based on the isolation of one creed to the exclusion of others. The helped is gathered and the helper is gathered.

For the gnostic, Allah is the Recognised Who is not denied. The people of recognition in this world are the people of recognition in the Next World. This is why Allah said, "anyone who has a heart (qalb)" (50:37) since he knows the transformation (taqlib) of Allah in forms by the transformation in shape. He recognises himself from himself. His self is not other than the He-ness of Allah. There is nothing in phenomenal being from what is, or what will be, which is other than the He-ness of Allah. Rather, He is the source of He-ness. So He is the gnostic and the knower and the acknowledger in this form. He is the one who is neither gnostic nor knower. He is also the one who denies Him in the other form. This is the portion of the one who knows Allah from the tajalli and the witnessing in the source of gatheredness (jam'). It is His word, "anyone who has a heart" which transforms the shapes by His transforming.

As for the people of belief (iman), they are the ones who imitate those who imitated the Prophets and Messengers in what they transmitted from Allah. They are not those who imitate the people of concepts and those who interpret the transmissions received by basing them on their logical proofs. These are the ones who imitate the Messengers, may Allah bless them and grant them peace. They are the ones who are meant by His words, "or listens well" (50:37) to what divine transmissions relate of the sunna of the Prophets. He means this is the one who "will listen well, having seen the evidence" (50:37) with awareness of the presence of the imagination and its use.

That is what the Prophet said about ihsan, "Worship Allah as if you saw Him," (7 and "Allah is in the qibla of the one who prays." (8) For that reason, he is a witness. Anyone who imitates the people of logical speculation and is limited by them is not the one who will listen well. The one who will listen well must witness what we have mentioned. When he does not witness what we have mentioned, he is not the one meant by this ayat. These are those of whom Allah has said, "When those who were followed disown those who followed them." (2:166) The Messengers do not disown their followers who follow them.

Realise, my friend, what I have mentioned to you in this wisdom of the heart. As for its specification with Shu'ayb, there is some branching off (tash'ib). Its branches are not numbered because every creed has a branch, and so they are all branches or creeds. If the covering is removed, it is removed for everyone in accordance with his creed. The covering might be removed in a manner contrary to his creed in principle. It is His words, "What confronts them from Allah will be something they did not reckon with." (39:47) Most of them in principle are like the Mu'tazilites, believing that Allah will execute the threat on the rebel should he die without repentance. If he dies and is given mercy from Allah, then concern preceded it, for He did not punish him. Thus he found Allah Ever-Forgiving, All-Merciful, and there appeared to him from Allah something he did not reckoned with.

As for He-ness (huwiya), some people are firm in their belief that Allah is such-and-such. When the covering is removed, they see the form of their belief, and it is true. They believe in it. Then the knot is unravelled and the creed vanishes and becomes knowledge through contemplation (mushahada). After vision is sharpened, weak vision does not return. It appeared to some people by the variety of the tajalli in forms through vision, since the tajalli is not repeated. He verifies it in he-ness; and there appeared to them from Allah in Allah's He-ness what they never reckoned with before the covering was removed. (9)

We mentioned the form of the ascent in divine recognitions after death in our Book of the Tajalliyat, in which we mentioned what we gathered from the group regarding unveiling, and the benefits we derived from them in the question that they did not know about. One of the most wondrous of matters is that man is always in ascent, but is not aware of that due to the fineness of the veil and its delicateness. It is like His words, "They were only given a simulation of it." (2:25)

He, the One, is not the same as the Last. Therefore the two semblances with the gnostic are similar dissimilars. The one possessed of realisation sees multiplicity in One, as he knows what the Divine Names indicate. Although their realities differ and are numerous, it is yet One Source. It is an intelligible multiplicity in the source of One. In the tajalli, it is multiplicity witnessed in the one source even as it matter which you obtain in the definition of each form. It and the multiplicity of forms and their variety derive, in fact, from one substance (jawhar). It is its own matter (hayula). Whoever recognises himself with this recognition recognises his Lord. Allah is in His creation due to His form, rather He is the source of its he-ness and its reality.

For this reason, the only ones among the 'ulama' who tumble on the recognition of the self (nafs) and its reality are the divinely inspired messengers and the great among the Sufis. As for the philosophers and masters of thought among the ancients and the mutakallimun in their discourse on the self and its whatness, none of them stumbled on its reality, and logical speculation can never provide it. (10) He who seeks knowledge of it by means of logical speculation, swells himself up and boasts without vigour or substance. "They are those whose efforts in the life of this world are misguided while they suppose that they are doing good." (18:104) He who seeks the matter by other than its path will not achieve its realization.

How excellent is what Allah said about the universe - He changes it with the breaths into a new creation in one source. He said in respect to some, rather to most of the world, "Yet they are dubious about the new creation." (50:15) This means that they do not know the renewal of the command in breaths. However, the Ash'arites stumbled on it in some existent things, and these are non-essentials (a'râd). The Hisbaniya (11) stumbled on it regarding the entire universe. The logical philosophers consider them ignorant of it. However, the two groups erred. As for the error of the Hisbaniya, in spite of what they said regarding change in the entire universe, they did not stumble on the oneness of the source of the intelligible substance (jawhar) which underlies the form. The universe only exists by the oneness, as the oneness is only intelligible by the universe. If they had said that, they would have obtained the degree of realisation in the matter.

As for the Ash'arites, they do not know that the entire universe consists of a collection of non-essentials (a'râd). It changes in every moment since accidents do not last for two moments. That appears in their definition of things. So when they defined the thing, its phenomenal being is clear in the definition of non-essential matters. These non-essentials mentioned in its definition are actually the source of this independent substance and its reality. Inasmuch as it is a non-essential, it is not independent, but by the sum of what is not independent, comes what is independent. It is like occupation of space in the definition of the independent essential substance, and its acceptance is non-essential in its essential definition. There is no doubt that that the containing-of-form is an accident since it is only in the container, and that is not independent it is in the essential nature of the substance. Occupation of space is a non-essential, and it only occurs in the thing occupying space, and so it is not independent. Occupation of space and containing-of-form are not based on the source of the defined substance by an extra matter, since essential definitions are the source of the defined and its he-ness.

That which does not last two moments becomes that which lasted two moments or indeed several moments! What was not independent became independent in their view! They do not understand the basis of this, and these people "are dubious about the new creation."

As for the people of unveiling, they see Allah in a tajalli of Himself in every breath, and there is no repetition of the tajalli. They also see by witnessing that every tajalli grants a new creation and takes away a creation. Thus its departure is annihilation in the presence of the tajalli, and it is going-on by what the other tajalli grants. So understand!

What confronts them from Allah will be something they did not reckon with. them from Allah that they never reckoned with."

13: The Seal of the Wisdom of Power (Malk) in the Word of Lut (Lot)

Malk is power and force, and the strong man with power says, "I have power over the kneading, since I am forceful in kneading it." When the poet, Qays ibn al-Hatim, described his attack with a spear in verse, he said:

I have power over it and so I made its rupture wide, and you see standing under it what was behind it.

That is to say that he used enough force in the thrust. It was what Allah said regarding Lut, peace be upon him, "If only I had the power to combat you, or could take refuge in some powerful support!" (11:80) The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Allah showed mercy to my brother Lut, and he took refuge in a powerful support." So the Prophet said that Lut was with Allah who is strong. It was Allah whom Lut, peace be upon him, meant by the strong pillar, and resistance when he said, "If only I had the power". Here it is aspiration (himma) in relation to man in particular.

The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "From that time, the time in which Lut, peace be upon him, said, 'or could take refuge in some powerful support,' after that, Prophets have only been sent with some power from their people." His tribe protected him as Abu Talib protected the Messenger of Allah. His words, "If only I had the power to combat you" is because he heard Allah say, "It is Allah who created you from a weak beginning," (30:54) by origin, "and then after weakness, gave you strength." Strength is by appointing, and it is non-essential strength. "Then after strength ordained weakness and grey hair." Appointing is connected to grey hair. As for weakness, it returns to the basis of its creation as He said, "He created you from a weak beginning." Allah returns him to that from which He created him, as He says, "then some of you revert to the lowest form of life that, so after having knowledge, they may know nothing at all." (16:70) Allah mentions that he returns to the first weakness. The old man is judged to be as weak as the child is. A Prophet is only sent after he has reached the age of forty. It is the time which is the beginning of decrease and weakness. For this reason, Lut said, "If only I had the power to combat you," although that demands effective aspiration (himma). If you were to ask: "What prevents him from using effective aspiration while it is present in the wayfarers (sâlikûn) among the followers when the Messengers are more entitled to that?" you spoke the truth. However, you lack another knowledge, which is that gnosis does not leave the aspiration freedom of action. Whenever gnosis is great, then its freedom of action with the aspiration is weak. That has two reasons one is his realisation of the station of slavery and his regarding the root of his natural creation; (1) and the other reason is the oneness of the actor and the acted upon. The aspiration of a Messenger does not appear, since the latter aspect prevents it.

In this witnessing, he sees that his opponent does not turn from the reality on which he is based in the state of his source-form and the state of his non-existence. He only appears in existence through what he had in the state of non-existence by his source-form. He does not overstep his reality nor does he abandon his path. That is called dissent; yet it is a non-essential matter manifested by the veil which is over the eyes of the people, as Allah says, "but most people do not know." They know what is manifest and outward of the life of this world, but they are ignorant of the Next life. It is the other way round, so it is from their words, "our hearts are veiled," (2) that is, in coverings. It is a covering which veils them from perceiving the matter for what it is. This and its like prevent the gnostic from acting freely in the world.

Shaykh Abu 'Abdullah ibn al-Qa'id said to Shaykh Abu's-Su'ud ibn ash-Shibli, "Why do you not act freely?" Abu's-Su'ud replied, "I have left Allah to act for me as He wishes." He meant the command of Allah, "so take Him as your Guardian." (73:9) The Guardian is the one with freedom of action, especially as He heard Allah saying, "Give of that to which He has made you successors (khalifs)." (57:7) Abu's-Su'ud knew, and the gnostics know that the command which he has is not his, and he is only a successor to it. Allah told him, "this command is the deen to which I have you successors and over which I have given you power, so take Me for a guardian in it," Abu's-Su'ud obeyed the command of Allah and took Him for a Guardian.

How can there remain any aspiration for the one who witnesses the like of this command? Aspiration (himmah) only acts by the property of concentration that which its possessor does not have, and acts on other than his concentration. This gnosis separates him from that property of concentration. The complete gnosis manifests gnosis at the end of incapacity and weakness. One of the Abdal (3) said to Shaykh 'Abdu'r-Razzaq, (4) "After you greet Shaykh Abu Madyan, (5) tell him, 'O Abu Madyan! Why is nothing difficult for us, yet things are difficult for you, and we long for your station and you do not long for ours?'" Similarly, although Abu Madyan had that station as well as the other, we are more complete than him in the station of weakness and incapacity. His badl said this to him; he did not say it.

The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said that this station is from the command of Allah to him: "I do not know what He will do to me or you. I only follow what is revealed to me." The Messenger acts according to what is revealed to him. He does not have anything else. If He reveals to him that he should act by ordinance, he acts. If he is prevented from acting, he does not act. The best part of choice is to abandon freedom of action unless the person is deficient in gnosis.

Abu's-Su'ud ash-Shibli said to his believing companions, "Allah gave us freedom of action fifteen years ago, and we abandoned it through politeness." This is the language of conceit. As for us, we did not abandon it through politeness, for abandoning would imply preference. Rather, we abandoned it by the perfection of gnosis. Gnosis does not oblige it on the strength of choice. When the gnostic acts by aspiration in the world, it is from divine command and compulsion, not by choice.

There is no doubt that the station of the Messenger demands freedom of action for the acceptance of the Message which he brings. Allah informs him of what will be accepted in his community and among his people in order to manifest the deen of Allah. The wali is not like that. Nevertheless, the Messenger does not seek Him in the manifest, because the Messenger has compassion for his people. He does not want them to exceed by having the proof appear against them because that would entail their destruction. He spares them.

The Messenger also knew that when something inimitable (6) is manifested to the community, some of them believe in it, and some recognise it but deny it out of injustice, arrogance or envy. Some of them attribute it to magic and deception. The Messenger sees that, and he also sees that no one will believe unless Allah illuminates his heart by the light of belief. When the person does not look by that light called belief, the inimitable miracle has no benefit for him. Their aspiration does not seek inimitable matters, since the effect is not uniform among those who see it, nor is it in their hearts as He said in respect to the most perfect of Messengers and the most knowing of creation and the most truthful in state, "You cannot guide those you would like to but Allah guides those He wills." (28:56)

If aspiration did have an effect, no one would be more perfect than the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, nor have a higher nor stronger aspiration than him, yet even so his aspiration did not bring about Abu Talib, his uncle, becoming Muslim, and it was to the Prophet that the ayat which we mentioned was revealed. Similarly, Allah said of the Messenger, "It is only his to deliver the message." (7) And He said, "You are not responsible for their guidance, but Allah guides whoever He wills," (2:272) and He added in Surat al-Qasas, "He has best knowledge of the guided," (28:56) those to whom knowledge of their guidance was given in the state of their non-existence in their source-forms. It is established that knowledge follows the known. Whoever is a believer in his source-form and in the state of his non-existence, appears in that form in the state of his existence. Allah knew that of him, so that is what he is like. For that reason, Allah said, "He has best knowledge of the guided."

When Allah said the like of that, He also said, "My Word, once given, is not subject to change," (50:29) because My Word is based on My knowledge of My creation. "and I do not wrong My slaves," that is, I do not decree that disbelief (kufr) on them which makes them wretched and then I demand of them what is not in their capacity to do. Rather, We only deal with them according to what We gave them knowledge of, and We only gave them knowledge of what they gave Us from themselves by that on which they are based. So if they do wrong, they are the ones who are unjust. For this reason, He said, "but they wronged themselves. Allah did not wronged them." (8) Finally, We only said to them what Our essence accorded that We say to them. Our Essence is known to Us by what it is based on; so, if We say this, and do not say that, then We only spoke by what We knew to say. We spoke the word from Us, and obedience or lack of obedience is up to those who hear.

So all is from Us and from them, (9) and acceptance is from Us and from them.
If they are not from Us,
We, without a doubt, are from them.

So,. my friend, realise this wisdom of power in the word of Lut. It is a gate which belongs to gnosis. The secret (10) has been made clear for you, and the command is clear. It is included in the even which is called the odd.

Notes to Chapter 13:

1. Which is weakness, and the slave obeying the command of the Master, as in Qur'an 30:54, "It is Allah who created you from a weak beginning."
2. Two places: 2:88; 4:155.
3. Abdal, plural of badl, a substitute. Shaykh al-Akbar says, "They are seven. Whoever travels from one place and leaves his body in its form so that no one recognises that he has gone, that one is only a badl. He is modelled on the heart of Ibrahim, peace be upon him."
4. A jurist and one of Abu Madyan's disciples.

6. Mu'jiza, a miracle performed by a Prophet to prove his truthfulness and which others are unable to do.

10. The secret of the Decree.

14: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Decree (Qadar) in the Word of 'Uzayr (Ezra)

Know that fate (qada') is the judgement of Allah on things, and Allah's judgement on things is according to His knowledge in them and of them. The knowledge of Allah in things is based on that which known things accord Him of what they are in themselves. The decree (qadar) is the timing of how things are in their source without increase. (1) Fate is only decreed for things by themselves. This is the source of the secret of the Decree for the one who has a heart or gives ear. He is a witness "Allah's is the conclusive argument." (6:149)

Properly speaking, the judge (hâkim) studies the source of the question which he judges according to what its essence demands. The one sentenced to what is due him is, in fact, a judge over the judge when he sentences him to that. Every "judge" is sentenced to what he sentences, and in it he is the judge, whoever he is. Grasp this question! The decree is only unknown by the force of its appearance. It is not recognised, so there is much seeking and earnest request in it.

Know that the Messengers, may Allah bless them and grant them peace, inasmuch as they are Messengers not inasmuch as they are awliya' and gnostics are in ranks according to that on which their communities are based. They only have the knowledge with which they were sent, according to what the community of that Messenger needs, no more and no less. Communities differ, some have more need than others, so Messengers differ in the knowledge of the message just as their communities differ. It is what Allah said: "Those Messengers: We favoured some of them over others." (2:253)

In the same way, they also differ in what springs from their essences, peace be upon them, in the varieties of knowledges and judgements they have according to their predispositions. This is what Allah said: "We have preferred some of the Prophets over others." (17:55) And Allah said in respect of creation, "Allah has favoured some of you over others in provision." (16:71) Provision from Allah can be spiritual like knowledges and sensory like food. Allah "only sent it down in a known measure." (15:21) It is the due which creation seeks. Allah "gives everything its created form." (20:50) He sends down according to what He wills. (2) He only wills what He knows, and so He commands it. What He knows is as we have stated. It is only by what the known accords.

Timing basically belongs to the known. Fate, knowledge, will and volition follow the Decree. So Allah only gives the understanding of the secret of the decree in respect to knowledges to the one who has been given complete gnosis. Knowledge gives complete rest to the knower, and it gives painful punishment to the knower as well. It gives two opposites. By knowledge, Allah describes Himself with both wrath and pleasure, and by knowledge the Divine Names are opposite one another. A reality (3) governs the absolute existent and the limited existent. It is not possible that there be something more complete than it or stronger or greater than it, because of the universality of its jurisdiction, both limited and unlimited.

The Prophets, may Allah bless them and grant them peace, only take their own knowledges from a particular divine revelation. Their hearts are free of logical speculation because they know the limitations of the intellect in respect to its cognitive perception. The intellect is unable to perceive matters for what they really are. Simple communication is also unable to perceive that which is only accorded by taste (dhawq). Perfect knowledge remains only in the divine tajalli and in what Allah removes of veils from the springs of the inner sight and the eyes. They perceive matters - their non-time and in-time, their non-existence and existence, their impossibility, necessity and possibility - for what they truly are in their realities and sources.

Since the request of 'Uzayr, peace be upon him, occurred on the elite path, censure fell on him as is related in tradition. (4) Had he sought the unveiling which we mentioned, perhaps censure in that would not have fallen on him. The proof of the simplicity of his heart is in his statement, "How can Allah restore this to life when it has died?" (2:259) His form, peace be upon him, is in this statement of his, as the form of Ibrahim is in His words, "Show me how You bring the dead to life." (2:260) That necessitates the response by the action which Allah manifested when He said, "Allah caused him to die a hundred years, then He brought him back to life," and He said, "Look at the bones how We raise them up and clothe them in flesh." So he saw how bodies grow with the witnessing of realisation. He showed him how it was. He asked about the decree which is only perceived by unveiling to things in the state of their permanence in their non-existence. That was not granted. That is one of the properties of divine cognisance, so it is impossible that any except Allah know it. They are the keys of the First (5) the keys of the unseen which only He knows. Allah informs only those slaves whom He wills on such matters.

Know that they are only called keys in the state of opening. (6) The state of opening is the state of connecting taking-form to things, or rather the state of connecting the decree to the decreed. None has any taste in that except Allah. Neither tajalli nor unveiling occur in it since only Allah has power and action in view of the fact that He has absolute existence which is unlimited.

When we saw that Allah censured 'Uzayr, peace be upon him, when he asked about the Decree, we knew that 'Uzayr was seeking this cognisance. Thus he was seeking to possess the power (qudra) which is connected to the decreed (maqdur). That is only claimed by the One Who has absolute existence. Thus he sought the impossible. How-things-are is only perceived by taste.

As for what we relate of what Allah revealed to him, "If you do not desist, I will efface your name from the register of prophethood," it means I will remove the path of transmission from you and give you matters based on tajalli. Tajalli only occurs according to what you have of the predisposition by which the perception of taste occurs. You know that you only perceive according to your predisposition. You look at this matter which you are seeking. If you do not see it, you know that you do not have the predisposition which it requires. That is one of the properties of the Divine Essence. You have learned that Allah "gives everything its created form." (20:50) So if He did not give you this particular predisposition, then it is not your creation. If it had been your creation, then Allah, who informed you that "He gives everything its created for," would have given it to you. It is you who desist from this sort of question in yourself. There is no need for any other prohibition. This is a mark of concern Allah showed to 'Uzayr, peace be upon him. He knew that from his own knowledge and was ignorant of that from his own ignorance.

Know that wilaya (7) is the universal encompassing sphere. This why it is not intersected, and so it is informed about things. As for the prophethood of law-giving and the Message, it is intersected, and it was cut off in Muhammad, peace be upon him. There will be no Prophet after him, either giving law or bound by law. There is no Messenger after him, and he is the lawgiver. This hadith (8) is a fragment of the manifestation of the awliya' of Allah, because it contains the cutting off of the taste of complete perfect slavery, so the name of slavery, which is particular to it, was not used. The slave does not want to share with his Lord, who is Allah, in the same name. Allah is not called "prophet" or "messenger." However, He is called Wali and is described by that name. (9) Allah says, "Allah is the Wali of those who believe," (2:257) and He says, "He is the Wali, the Praiseworthy." (42:28) This name, "wali", continues to be applied to the slaves of Allah both in this world and the Next. A name which is particular to the slave and not to Allah no longer remains since prophethood and the message have been cut off.

"Allah is gentle to His slaves," (42:19) so they still have the general prophethood in which there is no law (shari'a), and they still have the law in striving in the confirmed ordinances. They still have heirs in the laws. The Prophet said, "The 'ulama' (men of knowledge) are the heirs of the Prophets." (10) The only inheritance here is that they strive with the ordinances, and so they legislate them.

If you see a Prophet speaking a language outside the simple ordinances of the Shari'a, that is due to the fact that he is a wali and a gnostic. For this reason, his station in respect to his being a man of knowledge and a wali is more perfect and complete than it is due to the fact that he is a Messenger or someone who legislates and has a Shari'a. If you hear one of the People of Allah speaking, or it is related to you that he said, "Wilaya is higher than prophethood," that speaker only means what we mentioned. Or if he says that the wali is above the Prophet or the Messenger, he means in the same person. He is the Messenger, and inasmuch as he is a wali, he is more complete than he is by simply being a Prophet. It does not mean that the wali who follows him is higher than him. The follower never overtakes the followed in that in which he follows him. If he had overtaken him, then he would not be his follower. So understand that!

The starting point of the Messenger or Prophet who brings a Shari'a is wilaya and knowledge. Do you not see that Allah commanded him to seek increase of knowledge, not increase of anything other than it? Allah commanded him, "Say: 'Lord, increase me in knowledge!'" ((20:114) This means: you know that the Shari'a consists of making certain deeds obligatory and prohibiting certain actions. These actions take place in this world, so they come to an end. Wilaya is not like that. If it had been cut off, it would have been cut off in respect to itself just as the message is cut off in respect to itself. If it had been cut off, it would not still have a name. Wali is a name which Allah will continue to have. (11) This belongs to the slaves by following a model, realisation and attachment. (12)

He told 'Uzayr, "If you do not desist from asking about how the decree is, I will efface your name from the register of prophethood. The business will come to through unveiling by tajalli and the name "prophet" and "messenger" will vanish from you." Allah will still have his wilaya. The context of the state indicated that this speech came as a threat. Whoever has this state when he is addressed in this fashion, knows that he is threatened with the cutting off of some of the special ranks of wilaya in this abode, since prophethood and the message are a special rank in wilaya based on some of the ranks which wilaya contains. He knows that he is higher than the wali who has neither law-giving prophethood nor the message.

If someone has another state which necessitates that the rank of prophethood be confirmed for him, that then is the promise and not the threat. 'Uzayr's question was accepted because the Prophet is the elite wali. Because of the context, he knows that since the prophet has this prerogative in wilaya, he cannot engage in what he knows that Allah will dislike him doing. He cannot engage in what he knows it is impossible for him to attain. When these circumstances exist for the one who has them and they are affirmed, then this divine statement, "I will efface your name for the register of prophethood" becomes a promise. Thus it becomes a transmission indicating a lasting rank. It is a lasting rank for the Prophets and Messengers in the Next Abode, which is not a place where a Shari'a is prescribed for any of Allah's creatures after they have entered the Garden or the Fire.

We define that as an entry into the two abodes of the Garden and the Fire. When the Day of Rising begins for the people who lived in the times of the gaps between the Prophets, (13) young children, and madmen, all of them will be gathered on one plain for the establishment of justice, recompense for wrong actions and the rewards for works which are due to the people of the Garden. Then they will be gathered separate from other people on one plain, (14) and a Prophet from the best of them will be sent among them. The Fire will be shown to them. This Messenger sent to these people will bring it, and he will say to them, "I am the Messenger of Allah to you." Some will affirm him and others will deny him. Then he will say to them, "Plunge into this fire. Whoever obeys me will be saved and will enter the Garden. Whoever disobeys me and opposes my command will be destroyed and he will be one of the people of the Fire." Whoever obeys his command and casts himself into this fire will be happy and receive his reward. He will find this fire to be "coolness and peace".(15) Whoever disobeys him deserves the punishment and will enter the Fire and descend into it because of his deed of opposition so that that justice from Allah might be set up among His slaves.

That is like the words of Allah, "Upon the day when legs are bared," (68:42) (16) i.e. for one of the immense matters of the Next World, "and they are called on to prostrate." This is obligation and Shari'a. Some will be able to prostrate and some will not be able to do so. (17) These are the one about whom Allah says, "They are called on to prostrate, but they will not be able to do so," just as some of the slaves cannot obey the command of Allah in this world like Abu Jahl (18) and others. This is according to what remains of the Shari'a in the Next Abode on the Day of Rising before people enter the Garden and the Fire. This is why we have written it down, and praise belongs to Allah, the Wali.

Notes to Chapter 14:

1. Qadar has a specific time and qada' does not. So qadar refers to the particular instances of qada'.
2. Ref. Qur'an, "Were Allah to expand the provision of His slaves, they would act as tyrants on the earth. But He sends down whatever He wills in a measured way." (42:27)
3. The secret of the decree.
4. Qur'an 2:259 "Or the one who passed by a town which had fallen into ruin. He asked, 'How can Allah restore this to life when it has died?' Allah caused him to die a hundred years then brought him back to life. Then He asked, 'How long have you been here?' He replied, 'I have been here a day or part of a day.' He said, 'Not so! You have been here a hundred years. Look at your food and drink it has not gone bad and look at your donkey so We can make you a Sign for all mankind. Look at the bones how We raise them up and clothe them in flesh.'" According to 'Ali, Ibn Jarir, Ibn 'Abbas, al-Hasan and Qatada, that is 'Uzayr.
5. The realities of sources.
6. Miftah, key, comes from the root, fath, opening.
7. According to the commentator, wilaya is annihilation in Allah, and Allah encompassed all, and "All things are passing except His face." (28:88).

8. "I am the Seal of the Messengers."
9. Wali means the friend of Allah, and refers to the gnostic. It is also one of the Divine Names which means the Guardian or the One who manages people's affairs.
10. Al-Bukhari.
11. As Yusuf said about Allah, "...You are my Wali in this world and the Next." (12:101).
12. According to al-Qashani, it is acquired and realised through annihilation in the Divine Attributes and Essence and attached by the going-on (baqa') after annihilation in the station of drawing near.
13. i.e. those who did not have a Prophet to follow.
14. According to the commentator, al-Qashani, the plain on which they are gathered may be as-Sahira, as in the Qur'an (79:14), "But it shall be but a single scare, and behold they are at as-Sahira!" As-Sahira which, according to some, is the earth Allah will create anew on the Day of Rising.
15. As was the case with Ibrahim, Qur'an 21:69.
16. The expression means to get ready for something difficult.
17. This is also reflected in a hadith in al-Bukhari in which the Prophet said, "Our Lord will unveil what is hidden, and every believer, man and woman, will prostrate to Him. Those who prostrated out of eyeservice and reputation in this world will go to prostrate and find their backs rigid."
18. The Prophet's uncle who was a violent opponent of Islam.

15: The Seal of the Wisdom of Prophethood in the Word of 'Isa (Jesus)

He was manifested from the water of Maryam and the breath of Jibril in the form of man existing from clay.
The spirit was in an essence purified of nature which it called prison.

For that reason, the spirit stayed in it for more a thousand years in the designation of time. (1)

A spirit from Allah, no other.

For that reason, he revived the dead and formed the bird from clay.

Since his relation with his Lord is proven, by it he has effective action in both the higher and lower worlds.
Allah purified his body, and made his spirit pure, and He made him a model of taking-form.

Know that among the special qualities of the spirits (arwah) is whenever they touch anything life flows into it. This is why the Samiri (2) seized a handful of dust from the track of the messenger, who was Jibril, and he is the Spirit. The Samiri had knowledge of this matter. When he recognised that it was Jibril, he knew that life would flow into whatever he had walked on, so he took a handful of dust (3) from the track of the messenger or he filled his hand or the ends of his fingers, (4) and threw it into the Calf. The Calf made a noise like the sound of a cow mooing. If it had been in another form, the name of that form's sound would have been ascribed to it - as grumbling to the camel, baa-ing to rams, bleating to sheep, and voice or articulation and speech to man. That power from the life which flows in things is called lâhût. The nâsût is the locus on which the spirit is based. The nâsût may be called a spirit by what is based on it.

When the Trusty Ruh, who is Jibril, presented himself to Maryam, peace be upon her, in the form of a "handsome, well-built man", (5) she imagined that he was a man wishing to have intercourse with her. She took refuge with Allah from him with all her being, with the whole of her existence, that Allah might save her from him since she knew that that was among the things which are not permitted. She was given a complete presence with Allah, and it is the meaning-without-form spirit. If Jibril had breathed into her at that moment in this state, 'Isa would have been born in such a manner that no one could tolerate him due to the harshness of his nature which was the state of his mother.

When he said to her, "I am only your Lord's messenger of your Lord so that He can give you a pure boy," she relaxed from that contraction (qabd) and her breast expanded. It was at that time that Jibril breathed 'Isa into her. Jibril conveyed the word of Allah to Maryam as the Messenger conveyed the word of Allah to his community. 'Isa was "His word that He cast into Maryam, and a Spirit from Him." (6) Then appetite filled Maryam. The body of 'Isa was created from the actual water of Maryam and from the imaginary water of Jibril which was infused in the moisture of that breath, since the breath of the living is moist because of the water content in it. So the body of 'Isa is from imaginary water and real water. He emerged in the form of a man in respect to his mother and inasmuch as Jibril had appeared in the form of a man, since taking-form only occurs in the human species according to the normal principle.

'Isa brought the dead to life because he is the Divine Spirit, and bringing to life belongs to Allah. The breath which 'Isa has is like the breath which Jibril has. The word belongs to Allah. The bringing the dead to life by 'Isa is an actual revival inasmuch as it was manifested from his breath as he was manifested from the form of his mother. His bringing to life is also imagined to be from him, but it actually belongs to Allah. He joined the two by the reality on which he is based even as we said that he is created from imaginary water and actual water. Bringing-to-life is ascribed to him by means of actualisation in one aspect, and by imagination in another aspect. In respect to actualisation, it is said of him that he brings the dead to life. In respect to imagination (tawahhum), it is said that he breathes into it and it becomes a bird by the leave of Allah. (7) The agent is in the prepositional phrase "by Allah's permission", even though He did not breathe into it. It is also possible that the agent is the one who breathes into it. It became a bird as regards physical form. In the same way, 'Isa healed the blind and the lepers.

All was ascribed to 'Isa as being "by Allah's permission." (8) "Permission" (idhn) is an indirect expression, as in His words, "By My permission" (9) and "by the permission of Allah". If the prepositional phrase is connected to breathing, the breather has leave in the breathing, and so it is a bird by the leave of Allah. If the breather breathed not by leave, then the taking form of the bird as a bird is not by the leave of Allah. The agent in that is then the verb "it becomes (yakûn)." If there had not been something real and something imaginary in the matter, then these forms would not have accepted these two aspects. Rather, it has these two aspects because the constitution of 'Isa accords that. 'Isa showed humility to the extent that he prescribed that his community "pay the jizya (10) tax with their hands in a state of willing submission," (11) and that if one of them were slapped on the cheek, he should offer the other cheek to the one who slapped him, and not rise up against him nor seek revenge. This came from his mother's side. Since the woman is lower, she has humility because she is subject to the man legally and physically. The power to bring to life and heal that he had came to him the side of the breath of Jibril in the form of a man. 'Isa brought the dead to life by the form of man. If Jibril had not come in the form of man, but in another of the elemental forms of phenomenal beings from the animals, plants or minerals, 'Isa would not have been able to bring the dead to life without taking on that form for that moment and appearing in it. If Jibril had come in a luminous form beyond the elements and natural humours, since luminosity is part of his nature, 'Isa would not have been able to bring the dead to life unless he appeared in that form of non-elemental light, while still maintaining the human form in respect of his mother.

When he brought the dead to life, it was said that it was him and not him. The onlookers fell into bewilderment (hayra) just as the man of intellect becomes bewildered in his logical reflection when he sees an individual human being bringing the dead to life, as that is one of the divine qualities - bringing to life with speech, not mere bringing with animation. (12) The beholder is bewildered because he sees the form of a man who possesses a divine effect. That led some of them to speak of that as "incarnation" and say that 'Isa was Allah since it was by Him that 'Isa brought the dead to life. Thus they are charged with disbelief (kufr) which is the veil because they veil Allah, who brings the dead to life, by the human form of 'Isa. Allah said, "They are unbelievers who say, 'Allah is the Messiah, the son of Maryam.'" (13) They fell into both error and disbelief at the end of all they said, not because they say that he is Allah nor by calling him the son of Maryam. But they made the attribution that Allah, insofar as He brought the dead to life, was contained in the human form of the nasut which is called the son of Maryam. There is no doubt that 'Isa was the son of Maryam. The hearer imagines that they have attributed divinity to the form, and so they make divinity the same as the form. That is not what they do. Rather, they make divine He-ness the subject in the human form which is the son of Maryam. They should differentiate between the form of 'Isa and the divine principle because they have made the form the same as the principle. Jibril was in the form of man who did not breathe and then he breathed. One differentiates between the form and the breath, and the breath from the form. The form existed without the breath - thus the breath is not part of its essential definition. For that reason, differences occurred among the people of different [Christian] parties regarding 'Isa and what he was. Whoever looks at him in respect to his mortal human form, says that he is the son of Maryam. Whoever looks at him in respect to his mortal representational form relates him to Jibril. Whoever looks at him in respect to what was manifested from him of bringing the dead to life, relates him to Allah by the quality of the spirit, and says that he is the Spirit of Allah, (14) that is, by Him life was manifested in whomever received his breath. Sometimes Allah is imagined to be the passive principle in 'Isa, and sometimes the angel is imagined in him, and sometimes mortal humanity is imagined in him. So the conception of everyone is based on what predominates that person. 'Isa is the Word of Allah, (15) the Spirit of Allah, (16) and the slave of Allah. (17) That is something which no one else has in the sensory form. Indeed, each person is attached to his father of form, not to the One who breathed his spirit into the human form. When Allah fashioned the human body as He said, "When I have shaped him," (15:29;38:72) then He breathed into Him, that was from His spirit. Thus in its being and source, the spirit is ascribed to Allah. That is not the case with 'Isa. The shaping of his body and mortal form is implied in the breath of the spirit. Others, as we mentioned, are not like that.

All existent things are the words of Allah which are inexhaustible (18) because they are from "kun" and "kun" is the word of Allah. Is the word ascribed to Him according to what He really is? His what-ness is not known. Or is it that Allah descends to the form of the one who says, "kun", and so the word "kun" is the reality of that form to which he descended or in which He is manifest? Some of the gnostics take one side and some take the other side, and some of them are bewildered in the business and do not know. This is a question which can only be recognised by taste (dhawq), as was the case with Abu Yazid al-Bistami when he breathed into the ant which he had killed and it returned to life. He knew in that action by Whom he had breathed, and that was an 'Isawian witnessing. As for the revival of meaning by knowledge, that is the divine life, essential, eternal, sublime, and luminous, about which Allah said, "Is someone who was dead and whom We brought to life, supplying him with a light by which to walk among the people..." (6:123) Whoever gives life to a dead soul by the life of knowledge in a particular problem connected to knowledge of Allah, has brought him to life by it, and it is "a light for him by which he walks among the people, i.e. among his likes in form.

Were it not for Him and not for us, that which is would not have been.
I worship Him in truth,
and Allah is our Master.
I am his source so know!
If you said, "man,"
Then do not be veiled by "man".
He has given you a proof.
So be Allah and be creation, and you will be merciful by Allah.
Feed His creation through Him, and you will be spirit and sweet scent.
We give Him what appeared by Him in us, and He gave to us.

The command is apportioned between Him and us.
My heart was given life by the One who knew it when He gave us sensory life.
At that time (before time),
we were beings, sources and times in Him.
That did not endure in us, but that gave us life.

Part of what proves what we mentioned concerning the breath (nafkh) of the spirit with the elemental form is that Allah has described Himself by the "breath of the All-Merciful". Everyone described by an attribute must follow the attribute and all that attribute demands of him. You realise that breath is necessary for the one who breathes. For that reason, the divine breath accepts the forms of the universe. It is like the primordial substance, (19) which is not other than the source of nature.

The elements are one of the forms of nature, and what is above the elements and what issues from them are also part of the forms of nature. They are sublime spirits going right up to the seven heavens. As for the spirits of the seven heavens and their sources, they are elemental, so they issue from the vapour of the elements. The angels from every heaven are from the elements, so they are made from the elements, and there are no beings of nature above them. For this reason, Allah described them with dispute, (20) i.e. the Highest Assembly, because nature has polarisation. Polarisation is that which is in the Divine Names, and they are ascriptions given by the "breath of the All-Merciful." Do you not see how the Essence is not subject to this principle, and that it is independent of the worlds? This is why the world appeared in the form of the One who brought it into being, and it is not other than the divine breath.

The divine breath ascends by what it has of heat, and descends by what it has of humidity and cold, and fixes itself and solidifies by what it has of dryness. Thus precipitation comes from cold and humidity. Do you not see that when the doctor wants to give someone a remedy, he looks at his water (urine) in a long-necked bottle? If he sees precipitation, he knows that the digestion is complete. He gives the remedy to speed progress. The precipitation is produced by his natural coldness and humidity.

Then Allah kneaded the clay of this human person with "His two hands." These are opposite to each other. Even though each of these two hands may be a right hand, the distinction between them is not hidden. They are only two in themselves - two hands because He only causes effects in nature according to what is in conformity with it. Nature consists of opposites, so He said "two hands". Then He brought man into existence with two hands, and called him man (bashar). (21) This refers to the direct contact (mubashara) of the two hands as befits the Divine Presence. That arises from His concern for this human species. Then Allah said to the one who refused to prostrate himself before Adam, "What prevented you prostrating to what I created with My Own Hands? Were you overcome with arrogance (towards the one who is your like, made of the elements) or are you one of the exalted?" (38:75) meaning those who are above the elements. "You are not like that."

By the exalted, (22) He means those who, by their essence, are above being elemental by their luminous constitution, even though they are part of nature. Man is only better than the other species by virtue of his being made of clay (bashar). He is the best species of all that was created from the elements by direct contact with the two hands. So in rank, man is above the terrestrial and celestial angels, although the lofty angels are better than the human species according to a divine text. (23)

If anyone wishes to recognise the divine breath (nafas), let him recognise the universe, because "whoever knows himself knows his Lord" (24) who is manifest in him. The universe was manifested in the breath of the Merciful which Allah breathed from the Divine Names. They brought the manifestation of their effects into existence from the non-manifestation of their effects. He was generous to Himself by what He brought into existence in Himself. The first effect of the breath took place in that Presence. Then the command continued to descend (25) by breathing out from the universal to the last of what Allah brought into existence.

All is contained in the source of the breath, like light is contained in the essence of darkness at the end of the night before daylight.
Knowledge comes by proof at the end of the day for the one who is sleepy.
He sees what I have said as a dream which indicates the breath,
And it gives him relief from every grief.
In the recitation of the Qur'an, it is, "He frowned." (26)
He has given a tajalli of Himself to the one who came to fetch a firebrand. (27)
So Musa saw Him as a fire, while He is a light for kings and seekers.
If you have recognise what I said, then know that you are in a state of grief. (28)
If Musa had sought something else
(other than the brand), he still would have seen Him in that,
and not the opposite.

When Allah establishes this 'Isawian word in the Station (29) so that we would know and he would be known, 'Isa will be asked about what was ascribed to him and whether or not it was true, even though Allah already knew whether or not that matter had taken place. Allah will say to him, "Did you say to people: 'Take me and my mother as gods, besides Allah?'" (30)

Adab demands a response to the one asking the question because when He gave him a tajalli in this station and form, wisdom necessitated the response in separation by the source of gatheredness. So he put disconnection first and said, "Glory be to You!" using the kaf (pronoun of the second person singular) which defines who is indicated by encounter and speech. "It is not mine," inasmuch as I belong to myself rather than You, (31) "to say what I have no right to," that is, what my he-ness rather than my essence necessitates. "If indeed I said it, You know it," because You are the Speaker, and whoever says something knows what he has said. You are the tongue by which I speak, as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, reported to us in a divine transmission in which Allah said, "I am his tongue by which he speaks." He made His He-ness the same as the tongue of the speaker, but ascribed the speech to His slave.

Then the man of right action completed his response by saying, "You know what is in my self," and the speaker is Allah, "and I do not know what is in it," so this is in knowledge of the he-ness of 'Isa in respect of His He-ness, not in respect of the fact that 'Isa speaks and has an effect. "It is You", so He brought distinction and support to confirm the proof and dependence on Him, since Allah only knows the Unseen. So He separated and gathered, unified and made many, made wide and narrow.

To end his reply, 'Isa said, "I said to them nothing but what You ordered me to say." He negated to begin with, (32) alluding to the fact the he has no existence. The statement required adab with the questioner. If he had not acted thus, he would have been described as lacking knowledge of the realities, but he certainly was not like that! Thus he said, "only what You ordered me," and it is You are the One who speaks on my tongue, and You are my tongue. Observe this divine polarity of the spirit! What is finer and more subtle than this!

'Isa said that he said, "Worship Allah." So he used the name of Allah because slaves differ in forms of worship and Shari'a. So he did not specify one name rather than another name. Instead he used the name which joins all of them. Then he went on, "my Lord and your Lord." It is known that His relationship to one existent being by lordship (rubûbiya) is not the same as His relationship with another existent being. That is why he made a distinction when he said, "my Lord and your Lord," by two references one to the speaker and one to the one addressed. He said, "nothing but what You ordered me," and thus he affirmed that he is one who is commanded. The quality of being commanded is not other than slavery, since one is only commanded when obedience is expected of one, even if one does not comply.

Since the command descends according to ranks, all that appears in a certain rank is coloured with what the reality of that rank gives it. The rank of the one commanded has a principle which appears in everyone who is commanded. The rank of the commander has a principle which appears in every command. Allah said, "Establish the prayer." He is the commander and the one who is subject to the obligation is the commanded. The slave says, "Forgive me!" so he commands and Allah is the commanded. What Allah demands of His slave by His command is the same as what the slave demands of Allah by his command. This is why every supplication is answered, and it must be answered, even if the answer is delayed, just as some who are under obligation delay the prayer. Whoever who is obligated to perform the prayer and does not pray it at its proper time, delays obedience and prays it at another time when he is able to perform it. There must be an answer, if only by intention.

Then he said, "I was a witness against them (and he did not say over himself with them as when he said, 'my Lord and your Lord') as long as I remained among them" because the Prophets are witnesses over their communities as long as they are in them. "But when You took me (i.e. raised me) back to You," and You veiled them from me and me from them, "You were the One Watching over them," no longer in my substance, but in their substance, since You are their eye which necessitates observation.

He wanted to make a distinction between him and his Lord so that it would be known that he was a slave and that Allah is Allah and He is his Lord. He referred to himself as a witness (shahid) and he referred to Allah as the Watcher (raqib). He mentioned "them" before himself when he said, "I was a witness against them as long as I remained among them," (33) preferring them in priority and with adab. He put "them" after Allah in relationship to Him when he said, "You were the One Watching over them" because of what the Lord merits in priority of rank.

Then know that Allah has the name the Watcher (Ra'iqib) which 'Isa applied to Him, and He is the Witness in His words, "a witness against them," and "You are Witness of all things."

(5:117) He referred to all things and "thing" is the most indefinite of things. He used the name, "The Witness," and Allah is the Witness over every witnessed thing according to what the reality of that witnessed things demands. He indicated that Allah was the Witness over the people of 'Isa when he said, "I was a witness against them as long as I remained among them." This is the witnessing of Allah in the substance of 'Isa, as it is confirmed that Allah is his tongue, hearing and sight.

Then he said something which is both 'Isawian and Muhammadan. As for its being 'Isawian, that is the speech of 'Isa by the transmission of Allah from him in His Book. As for its being Muhammadan, it happened that Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, stood in one place for an entire night reciting it without turning to anything else until dawn broke. It is, "If You punish them, they are Your slaves. If You forgive them, You are the Almighty, the All-Wise." (34) "They" is the pronoun of those who are absent as "he" is the pronoun of someone who is absent. as He said, "they are those who disbelieve," with the pronoun of those who are not present. Absence is their veil to what is meant by the witnessed one who is present. He said, "If you punish them," with the pronoun of the absent, and that absence is the source of the veil which hides them from the Real.

The Prophet mentioned them to Allah before the time when they are present (35) so that when the actual time came when they were present, the heaven would already have acted on the dough, and the dough might have had time to become equal to the heaven. (36)

Then by "they are Your slaves," he singled out the unity (tawhid) on which they are based. There is no submissiveness greater than the submissiveness of slaves because they have no freedom of action with themselves. They act according to what their master wishes of them when he has no partner in them. He said, "Your slaves," and singled out what was meant of the punishment which is their humiliation. There are none more lowly than them since they are slaves. Thus their essence necessitates that they be lowly, so You do not degrade them, for You do not degrade them with anything more lowly than the fact that they are slaves.

"If You forgive them," if You veil them from the punishment which they deserve because of their opposition if You put forgiveness on them, You veil them from the punishment and protect them from it, "You are the Almighty," the Protector, the Guardian. When Allah gives this name ('aziz) to one of His slaves, then Allah is called the Exalter (Mu'izz). This name is given to him by the 'Aziz, so he has strong protection from the revenge and punishment which the Avenger and Punisher desire for him. He also used distinction and dependence to confirm the proof, and so the ayat is the same sort of His words, "You are the Knower of the Unseen Worlds," and "You are the Watcher over them," and "You are the Almighty, the All-Wise." (37)

The question from the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, and his supplication to his Lord in which he repeated the phrase for the entire night until dawn was a request for the answer. If he had heard the answer in the first questioning, he would not have repeated it. Allah showed him the judgements in detail by which they deserved punishment. As each instance was presented to him and specified, the Prophet said to Him, "If You punish them, they are Your slaves, and if You forgive them, You are the Almighty, the All-Wise." If he had seen in what was presented to him anything which would make it necessary that Allah had already decided and that His presence must be preferred, he would have invoked Allah against them rather than for them. So what they deserved is changed by what this ayat accords of submission to Allah and exposing themselves to His pardon.

The Prophet related that when Allah loves the voice of His slave when he makes supplication to Him, He delays the answer to his supplication so that the slave will repeat the supplication. This comes from His love for the slave, not because He has turned away from him. For that reason, the Prophet mentioned the name of the Wise, and the Wise is the one who puts everything in its proper place, and who does not turn away from the qualities which their realities necessitate and demand; so the Wise is the One who knows the order of things. When the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, kept repeating this ayat, he was in possession of a great knowledge from Allah. If anyone recites it, let him recite it in that manner. (38) Otherwise, it is better that he remain silent. When Allah lets the slave articulate any request, He does so when He wants to answer it and grant his need. Let no one be slow in whatever has been guaranteed to him, but let him persevere as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, persevered with this ayat in all his states, so that he either hears with His ear, or with hearing, whichever you like. How else will Allah make you hear the answer? If He permits the question on your tongue, He will let you hear the answer with your ear. If He permits the meaning to you, He will let you hear the answer by your hearing.

16: The Seal of the Wisdom of Mercy in the Word of Sulayman (Solomon)

Bilqis said, (1) "It (the letter) is from Sulayman and it says 'In the Name of Allah, the All-Merciful, Most Merciful.'" Some people criticise the fact that the name of Sulayman comes before the name of Allah. That is not the case, and in saying this they say something that does not befit the gnosis which Sulayman, peace be upon him, had of his Lord. How could what they say be connected to him when Bilqis said of it, "a noble letter had been delivered to me," that is, a letter which honoured her. In this they were influenced by the story of how Chosroes tore up the letter of the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. (2) He did not tear it up until he had read all of it and knew what it contained. It was the same with Bilqis. Had she not accepted what was established, respect for its author would not have prevented her from tearing up the letter, whether his name, peace be upon him, had been mentioned before or after the name of Allah.

Sulayman mentioned the two mercies: the mercy of graciousness and the mercy of obligation, and they are ar-Rahman ar-Rahim. So Allah freely dispenses His bounty by the Rahman, and it is incumbent on Him by the Rahim. This obligation comes from graciousness, so Rahim is contained in Rahman. Allah "has prescribed mercy for Himself," glory be to Him! in order that the slave might have what Allah spoke about of the deeds which this slave brings, expecting his due from Allah who has required Himself to have this mercy for them, the mercy of obligation. When one of the slaves is like this, he knows that He is the author of the deed.

The deed is divided according to the eight organs of man. Allah informed us that He is the He-ness of each organ. So the author of the action is none other than Allah while the form is that of the slave. He-ness is embodied in him, i.e. only in his name because Allah is the source of what is manifested and which is called "creation". Because of this, the names of the Manifest and the Last belong to the slave since he was not and then was. By the fact that his manifestation depends on Him and action issues from Him, there is the name the Hidden and the First. Thus, when you see creation, you see the First and the Last, the Manifest and the Hidden.

This recognition was not hidden from Sulayman, peace be upon him. Indeed, it is a part of a kingdom which "belonged to no one after him," (3) in terms of its manifestation in the visible world. Muhammad, peace be upon him, was given what Sulayman was given, but he did not manifest it. Allah gave him the power to vanquish the 'ifrit (4) who came in the night to attack him. (5) When the Prophet wanted to take the 'ifrit and tie him to the one of the columns of the mosque until morning so that the children of Madina could play with him, he remembered the prayer of Sulayman, and so Allah made him drive the 'ifrit off in disgrace. The Prophet did not manifest his power as Sulayman had done. He spoke of "a kingdom" which is not universal, and we know that he meant a particular kingdom. We see that the Prophet shared in every part of the Kingdom which Allah had given him and so we know by this that he is privileged with the whole kingdom. In the story of the 'ifrit, he was only given the manifestation while Sulayman might have been given the whole and the manifestation. If the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had not said in the story of the 'ifrit, "and Allah gave me power over him," we would have said that when he wanted to seize the 'ifrit, Allah reminded him of Sulayman's prayer so that the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, would know that Allah had not given him power to seize him.

He then made him send off the 'ifrit off in disgrace.

When he said, "Allah gave me power over him," we knew that Allah had given him freedom of action in that. Then Allah reminded him and he remembered Sulayman's prayer and showed adab towards him. We know from this that that no creature after Sulayman had the general manifestation of that kingdom.

Our goal in this question is only discussion and instruction about the two mercies which Sulayman mentioned in the two names which are expressed in Arabic as ar-Rahman ar-Rahim. (6) Allah stipulated the mercy of obligation (7) and made the application of the mercy of graciousness universal when He said, "My mercy extends to all things," (7:156) even the Divine Names, which are the realities of ascriptions. He was gracious to us in them. We are the result of the mercy of graciousness by the Divine Names and divine ascriptions of lordship. Then He prescribed mercy for Himself by our own manifestation. He informed us that He is our He-ness, that we might know that He obliged mercy on Himself only for Himself. Mercy never departs from Him. Who could be gracious to you when there is only Him?

There must be a principle for clarifying differences in merit this is in relation to what is manifested of the differences in merit that creatures have in knowledge, so that it might be said that this person knows more than that person, even though the source is but one. This means the shortcoming connected to the will (irada), apart from the connection of knowledge. This difference in merit exists in the divine attributes. (8) The connection and merit of will and its increase is connected to power. In the same way, hearing, sight and all the divine names are arranged in ranks, some having more merit than others. Similarly what is manifested in creation differs in ranks of merit, so that it can be said that this person knows more than that person even though the source is the same.

As each Divine Name which I have set forth is implied by all the Names and described by them, similarly that which creation manifests accepts all of that which is subject to differences of merit. Each part of the universe is from all the universe, i.e. it is a vessel for all the separate realities of the universe. Our statement that Zayd is inferior to 'Amr in knowledge does not contradict the fact that the He-ness of Allah is the source of both Zayd and 'Amr, but it is more perfect and knowing in 'Amr than in Zayd, even as the Names differ in merit. They are not other-than-Allah. Allah, inasmuch as He is Knowing, has a more encompassing connection than Allah as the Transformer, the All-Powerful. But He is still He and not other-than-Him.

O my friend! do not then know Him in one aspect and be ignorant of Him in another! Do not negate Him here and affirm Him there, unless You affirm Him by an aspect through which He affirms Himself and negate Him by an aspect through which He negates Himself, as in the ayat which combines affirmation and negation in respect to Him when He said, "Nothing is like Him," negating, "and He is the All-Hearing, the All-Seeing," (42:11) and so He affirmed an attribute which is general to every hearing and seeing living being. Nothing exists but that it is alive, although this is hidden in the world from the perception of some people. It will appear to all people in the Next World, for it is the Abode of the Living (ad-Dar al-Hayawan). Similarly, the life of this world is only veiled from some of the slaves so that election and difference of merit might be manifested among the slaves of Allah according to what they perceive of Him from the realities of the universe.

In one whose attainment is more comprehensive, Allah is in principle more manifest in him than in someone who does not have this comprehensiveness. So do not be veiled by the difference in merit and say that it is not correct to say that creation is the He-ness of Allah after we have shown you the difference in merit in the Divine Names. You have no doubt about them being Allah, and what is designated by them is not other than Allah.

How then could Sulayman place his name before the name of Allah as they allege? He is part of the whole which the mercy of graciousness brought into existence. The name, ar-Rahman ar-Rahim, must come first for the dependence of the one receiving this mercy to be valid. Advancing the one who should come afterwards and delaying the one who should come before in the place he merits is contrary to the realities.

Part of the wisdom of Bilqis and the sublimity of her knowledge lies in the fact that she did not mention who cast the letter to her. She only did that so that her companions would know that she had communications on matters whose means they did not know. This is part of divine management in ruling because when the means of communication reaching the ruler are unknown, the people of the government fear for themselves in their actions. Therefore they only act with prudence in a matter because that will reach their ruler, and they are guarding themselves from the potential danger of that action. If they knew precisely by whom information reached their ruler, they would have tried to flatter him and bribe him so that they could do whatever they wanted without their ruler hearing about it. Therefore the Queen said, "a noble letter has been delivered to me," without naming the one who cast it. That was an act of policy on her part would insure respect for her among the people of her kingdom and the nobles under her rule. By this, she merited her superiority over them.

As regards the superiority of the human man of knowledge over the man of knowledge of the jinn in the secrets of the disposal of things and the special properties of thing, that is known by the amount of time, for the movement of the eye in perceiving what it perceives is quicker than the movement of the body when it moves. (9) The moment in which the eye moves is the same moment which it connects to the object, in spite of the distance between the viewer and the object. The moment that the eyes open is the moment in which they are connected to the heaven of the fixed stars. The moment when its glance returns is the same moment that its perception is absent.

Rising from one's place is not like that. It does not possess this speed. Asaf ibn Barkhiya (10) was more perfect in the deed than the jinn was. What Asaf ibn Barkhiya said is the same as the action in the same moment. Sulayman, peace be upon him, at the same moment saw Bilqis' throne "settled before him" so one must not imagine that he perceived it while it was in its original place without being moved. We do not think that the displacement takes place in one and the same moment, but that it involves going into non-existence and returning to existence inasmuch as the only one who is aware of that is the one who has recognition of it. This is what Allah said, "Yet they are dubious about the new creation." (50:15) Not a moment passes them but that they see what they saw. Since it is like this, the time of its non-existence (the absence of the throne from its place) is the same as the time of its existence with Sulayman because of the renewal of creation with the "breaths". No one knows this power, or rather, man is not aware with regard to himself that he ceases to exist in each breath and then is again.

Do not think that "this" (thumma) implies a delay. That is not true. However, it demands a high rank of knowledge in Arabic, as when the poet says:

As he brandished the straight Rudayni, (11) it quivered.

There is no doubt that the moment of brandishing the spear is without a doubt the same as the moment of quivering of the thing which is brandished. It happened without delay. It is the same with the renewal of creation with breaths. The time of non-existence coincides with the time of the existence of its like. It is similar to the renewal of accidents in the theory of the Ash'arites [tajrîd al-a'râd].

The question involving the moving of Bilqis' throne is one of the most difficult problems, except for someone who has recognition of what we have mentioned in its story. Asaf did not have any merit except for acquiring renewal in the assembly of Sulayman, peace be upon him. The throne was not moved across place nor did it rise above the earth nor break the laws of space for the one who understands what we mentioned. That was done by one of the companions of Sulayman in order to elevate Sulayman's honour in the selves of those who were present with Bilqis and her suite. The reason for that was that Sulayman was Allah's gift to Da'ud as He said, "We gave Sulayman to Da'ud," (38:30) so the gift is the giving of the donor by providing a blessing, not by means of fitting recompense or merit. So he is the abundant blessing, the decisive word and the cutting sword.

As for the knowledge of Sulayman, Allah said of him, "We gave Sulayman understanding of it (in spite of his opposite judgement to that of Da'ud), and Allah "gave each of them judgement and knowledge." (21:79) Da'ud's knowledge was knowledge given by Allah, and Sulayman's knowledge was the knowledge of Allah in the matter inasmuch as He is the Judge without intermediary. So Sulayman is the interpreter of Allah in the seat of sincerity.(12) It is like the man who is striving to hit on the judgement of Allah by which Allah would judge the question. If he were to find it by himself or by what was revealed to His Messenger, then he would have two rewards. The one who errs in this particular judgement has one reward as well as its being knowledge and judgement. The community of Muhammad was given the rank of Sulayman in judgement (13) and the rank of Da'ud in wisdom, (14) so there is no better community than it.

When Bilqis saw her throne, and she knew how great the distance was and the impossibility of moving it in that space of time, she said, "It seems the same." (28:42, lit. "it is as if it were.") She spoke the truth according to what we mentioned regarding the renewal of creation by similarity. It was it. The matter is true, as you are the same at the time of renewal as you were in past time. Part of the perfection of Sulayman's knowledge was in the instruction he gave regarding the pavilion when he told Bilqis, "Enter the courtyard." (15) The courtyard was very smooth without any curvature in its glass. When Bilqis saw it, she thought that it was water and had depth, so she bared her legs so as not to let the water dampen her clothes. By that, Sulayman informed her that the throne which she saw was of this sort. This is the utmost fairness. He informed her that she had hit the mark when she said, "It seems the same." At that point, she said, "My Lord, I have wronged myself but I have submitted with Sulayman to the Lord of all the worlds."

So she did not submit to Sulayman, but to the Lord of the worlds, and Sulayman was part of the worlds. She did not restrict her submission as the Messengers do not restrict their belief in Allah, contrary to Pharaoh who said, "to the Lord of Musa and Harun." (26:48) Although this submission is related to Bilqis' submission in a certain respect, it does not have the same force. She had more discernment than Pharaoh in submission to Allah. Furthermore, Pharaoh was governed by the principle of the moment when he said, "I believe in the One in whom the Children of Israel believe." (10:90) He specified, but he also specified when she saw the sorcerers articulate their belief in the "Lord of Musa and Harun." The Islam of Bilqis was the Islam of Sulayman since she said, "with Sulayman." She followed him in all that he adhered to in the way of beliefs.

This is how we are on the straight path which the Lord is on, for our forelocks are in His hand, (16) and it is impossible for us to separate from Him. We are with Him implicitly, and He is with us by open declaration. Allah said, "He is with you wherever you are," (57:4) and we are with Him as He takes us by our forelocks. He, may He be exalted! is with Himself wherever He goes with us on His path. So everyone in the world is on a straight path, and it is the path of the Lord. It is this that Bilqis learned from Sulayman, so she said, "To Allah, the Lord of all the worlds," without referring to a particular world.

As for the subjection which was the privilege of Sulayman, peace be upon him, and by which he was distinguished from others, and the kingdom which Allah gave him which none after him would have, it is from his command when He said, "We gave him the fiercely blowing wind, speeding at his command." (21:81) It was not subjection in itself, for Allah said in respect of each of us without exception, "He has made everything in the heavens and everything on the earth subservient to you." (45:13) He also mentioned the subjection of the winds, stars and other things, (17) but that is not by our command. It is from the command of Allah. If you reflect with your intellect, Sulayman was privileged by this command neither by mental concentration nor by aspiration (himma) rather, it was by nothing more than the command itself. We said that because we recognise that the physical bodies of the world can be affected by the himma of the self when someone is in the station of concentration. We have seen such things happen in this Path. Sulayman only had to articulate the command in whatever he wished to subject without either concentration or himma.

Know, may Allah support us and you by a spirit from Him, that when any slave receives a gift like this, that does not detract from his portion of the kingdom of the Next World, nor is he called to account for it. That was true of Sulayman. Although he sought it from his Lord, the tasting (dhawq) of the Path (18) demands that it was advanced to him from what was stored up for others, and He will call him to account for it when he wants it in the Next World. Allah told him. "This is Our gift (and He did not say "to you: or to anyone else); bestow or withhold without reckoning." (38:39) We knew by the tasting of the Path that his request was from the command of his Lord. Thus the request was from the divine command, and the one who requested it received full recompense for his request.

If the Creator wishes, He grants his need in what he seeks from Him, and if He wishes, He withholds it. The slave has fulfilled what Allah demanded of him to obey His command in what he asked of his Lord. If he had asked that from himself without his Lord commanding him to do that, then he would be held to account for it.

That is true in all that Allah is asked for, as He said to His Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, "Say: 'O Lord, increase me in knowledge!'" He obeyed his Lord's command and sought increase in knowledge to such an extent that each time he was given milk, he interpreted it to be knowledge even as he interpreted it as knowledge in a dream in which he received a glass of milk. In the dream, he drank the milk, and gave the rest of it to 'Umar ibn al-Khattab. The people asked, "What is its interpretation?" He replied, "Knowledge." Similarly, when Allah took him on his Night Journey, the angel gave him a vessel which contained milk and a vessel which contained wine. The Prophet drank the milk, and the angel said, "You have chosen the true nature (fitra). Allah has bestowed you on your community!" When milk appeared, it was the form of knowledge. Therefore it is knowledge taking on the form as milk, just as Jibril came to Maryam in the form of "a handsome, well-built man." (19:16)

When the Prophet said, "People are asleep and when they die, they wake up," he meant that everything that man sees in the life of this world is in the rank of the dreams of someone who is asleep, so it must be interpreted. Phenomenal being is imagination (khayal), but it is Allah in reality. (19) Whoever understands this has received the secrets of the Path. When the Prophet was offered milk, he would say, "O Allah, bless us in it and increase us in it" because he saw it as the form of knowledge, and he had been commanded to seek increase in knowledge. When he was offered something other than milk, he would say, "O Allah, bless us in it and give us better than it."

When Allah gives something to someone, and He gives it to him by a request which arises from a divine command, He does not take him to account for it in the Next Abode. When Allah gives something to someone, and He gives it by a request which is not by a divine command, the business in it is up to Allah. If He wishes, He will take him to account for it, and if He wishes, He will not take him to account for it. I hope for knowledge from Allah in particular for which He will not call one to account, for He commanded the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, to seek increase of knowledge, and it is the same command which is addressed to the Prophet's community. Allah said, "You have an excellent model in the Messenger of Allah," (33:21) and what greater model is there than this model who is a source of solace (20) to the one who possesses understanding from Allah?

Had we discussed the station of Sulayman in its entirety, you would have seen a matter whose revelation would have struck you with terror. Most of the men of knowledge of this Path have no knowledge of the state and rank of Sulayman. The business is not as they claim. (21)

2. When the Prophet sent Chosroes or Khosrau a letter inviting him to Islam, he tore it up after it was read to him.

I wanted to tie him to one of the pillars of the mosque so that all of you could look at him, but then I remembered the supplication of my brother Sulayman, 'O Lord, forgive me and give me a kingdom the like of which will never be granted to anyone after me.' (38:35) Allah turned him away in humiliation." via Abu Hurayra in al-Bukhari and Muslim.

9. Sulayman asked his council, "'O Council, who among you will bring me her throne before they come to me in submission?' An 'ifrit of the jinn said, 'I will bring it to you before you get up from your seat...' He who possessed knowledge of the Book said, 'I will bring it to you before your glance returns to you.'" (27:38-40)

20. Uswa is model, or a person to be imitated and through whose emulation one gains consolation. The source of solace is the verbal noun from Form V of this verb, ta'assa, which means to become consoled by the example of another who had suffered in a similar fashion and been patient in it.

21. His kingdom does not decrease what he has in the Next world.

17: The Seal of the Wisdom of Existence (Wujud) in the Word of Da'ud (David)

"We subjected the mountains to glorify with him in the evening and sunrise, and also the birds, flocking together, all of them turned to him." Then Allah combined the kingdom and speech and prophethood in Da'ud when He says, "We made his kingdom strong, and gave him wisdom and decisive speech." (1) Allah clearly and openly appointed Da'ud Khalif. This was Da'ud, peace be upon him. His freedom of action in the kingdom with this subjection was by a mighty command which was not completed in him alone. Allah also gave it to Sulayman who shared in it as He says, "And We gave knowledge to Da'ud and Sulayman who said, 'Praise be to Allah who has favoured us.'" (27:15) He says, "We gave Sulayman understanding of it. We gave each of them judgement and knowledge." (21:79)

Know that since prophethood and the message are a divine privilege, and cannot be acquired. This is the prophethood which lays down a Shari'a. It is Allah's gift to them. Gifts of this sort are not recompense, nor is recompense demanded from them for these gifts. Allah bestows it on them as pure blessing and favour. So He says, "We gave him (i.e. Ibrahim) Ishaq and Ya'qub." (2) He says of Ayyub, "We gave him his family, and the same again with them." (38:43) He says of Musa, "We endowed him with Our mercy, making his brother Harun a Prophet," (19:53). There are more instances like that. What they received first of all is what they will receive at the last in the totality of their states, or most of them. It is only His name, the Giver.

Allah says in respect of Da'ud, "We gave Da'ud great favour from Us." (34:10) He did not accompany that with a demand for recompense from Da'ud, nor did He say that He gave him what He mentioned as a reward. When He demanded gratitude for that by action, He demanded it of the people of Da'ud, and did not mention Da'ud himself, asking Da'ud's people to thank Him for the blessing which He gave to Da'ud. For Da'ud himself, it is a gift of pure blessing and favour. It is not like that for his people, but rather like the demands of barter. So Allah said, "Work, family of Da'ud, in thankfulness! But very few of My slaves are thankful." (3)

If the Prophets, peace be upon him, thanked Allah for what He had bestowed on them and given to them, that was not from the command of Allah. They undertook that freely from themselves, as the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, stood thanking Allah until his feet were swollen, when Allah had forgiven Him his wrong actions, past and present. When people commented what he did, he said, "Am I not a thankful slave?" Allah said that Nuh was a thankful slave. (4) So the thankful among the slaves are few.

The first blessing which Allah bestowed on Da'ud was that He gave him a name which does not have any connected letters in it:

D W D

By this, He cut him off from the world and He told us this by the name itself which is dâl, alif, and wâw. Allah named Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, with both connected and separated letters:

So in this Allah both joined him and separated him from the world. He combined the two states for him in his name as He combined the two states for Da'ud through meaning (ma'na) (5) although He did not put that in his name. That was a privilege which Muhammad had above Da'ud, i.e. calling him by this name. The matter was thus completed for Muhammad in all its aspects. It is the same in his name Ahmad.

AHMAD

That is from the wisdom of Allah.

Then He spoke about the blessing He gave Da'ud in the mountains' echoing of glorification with him. (6) So they glorified with his glorification that the deed might be his. It was the same with the birds. He gave him power and described him by it, (7) and He gave him wisdom and decisive speech.(8)

Then the greatest blessing and nearest rank which Allah appointed for him was that his khalifate was mentioned in the divine text. He did not do that with any of his kind, and there were khalifs among them. Allah said, "Da'ud, We have made you a khalif on the earth, so judge between people with truth and do follow your own desires," i.e. whatever comes to your mind in judgement without revelation from Me, "letting them misguide you from the Way of Allah," (38:26) from the path which I revealed to My Messengers. Then Allah showed adab with him and said, "Those who are misguided from the Way of Allah will receive a harsh punishment since they forgot the Day of Reckoning." He did not say to him, "If you go astray from My Path, there is a terrible punishment for you." If you said that Adam is mentioned as the Khalif in divine text, we will say that it is not the same as in the text regarding Da'ud, for Allah said to the angels, "I am putting a khalif on the earth." (2:30) He did not say, "I am making Adam a khalif." Even if He had said that, it still would not be the same as His words, "We have made you a khalif," in respect of Da'ud. One is implied and the other is explicit. Mentioning Adam in the story after that did not indicate that he is the same as the khalif of whom Allah spoke. Occupy your mind with the transmissions of Allah on His slaves when He transmits them. It is the same in respect to Ibrahim the friend, "I will make you an Imam for the people." (2:124) He did not say "a khalif". We know that the imamate here means the khalifate, but it is not the same because He did not mention it by the most specific of its names which is the khalifate.

Then part of bestowing the khalifate on Da'ud is that He made him a khalif of judgement. That is only from Allah. He told him, "Judge between people with the truth." (5:42) The khalifate of Adam was not of this rank. Da'ud's khalifate was that he follow what was in it previously, not that he delegated with the divine judgement of Allah in His creation. If that had been the case, it would have occurred. However, our discourse is only regarding the khalifs on the earth from Allah, and they are Messengers. As for the khalifate today, it is from the Messengers, not from Allah, so they only judge by what the Messengers prescribed for them. They do not go beyond that except when there is a small point which is only known by those like us. That is in taking what they judge by, from what is in the Shari'a of the Messenger, peace be upon him.

The khalifate is from the Messenger. He takes the judgement from him, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, by transmission or by ijtiḥad, whose basis is also transmitted from him. Some of us think that the one who takes the judgement takes it from Allah, for he is a khalif from Allah by the source of that judgement. The substance is his inasmuch as it was the Messenger's - the source of his judgement is that of the Messenger's. Outwardly he follows, not disputing his judgement, as will be the case with 'Isa when he descends and judges. It is the same when the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Those are the ones whom Allah has guided, so be guided by their guidance." (9) This relates to what he recognises as one who is singled out and one who conforms. It is in him by the degree of what the Prophet established of the Shari'a which from the previous Messengers since he confirmed it. We follow him in relation to its confirmation, not because it is a Shari'a of someone else before him. In the same way, the Khalif takes from Allah the same thing that he takes from the Messenger.

In the language of unveiling, we call him "the khalif of Allah", and with outward knowledge, we say "the khalif of the Messenger of Allah". For this reason, the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, died and did not transmit the khalifate from himself to anyone else for he knew that among the slaves of Allah are those who will take the khalifate from their Lord. Thus the khalif from Allah is in conformity with the judgements of the Shari'a. Since the Prophet knew that, he did not hinder the matter. Allah has khalifs in His creation who take from the mine of the Messenger and the Messengers that which the Messengers took. They recognise the virtue of their predecessor there because the Messenger is a vessel for increase. The khalif is not a container for the increase which, had he been the Messenger, he would have received. He only gives knowledge and judgement in what he legislates through the specific legislation of the Messenger. Outwardly he follows the Messenger without opposition.

Do you not see that in the case of 'Isa, peace be upon him, when the Jews imagined that he did not add to Musa, as is the case with what we said about the Khalifate today with the Messenger, they accepted him and confirmed him? When he added judgement and abrogated judgement, Musa confirmed it, for 'Isa was a Messenger. They did not accept that because he differed from their creed, and the Jews did not know the matter for what it was - this is why they sought to kill him. His story is what Allah relates to us about them and him in His Mighty Book. He was a Messenger before increase. As for decrease of the judgement or its increase, it is confirmed since decrease is increase of judgement without a doubt.

The khalifate today does not have this rank, but it decreases or increases based on the Shari'a which is confirmed by itjihad, not on the Shari'a which Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, articulated. The khalif might do something which is counter to a hadith in a certain judgement, and so he imagines that that comes from ijthihad. That is not the case, but rather this Imam has not confirmed that the transmission with respect to unveiling is from the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. If it had been confirmed, he would have judged by it. If the path in it is fairness in justice, he is not protected from illusion. It is not by transmission in meaning.

Something like this occurs in the khalif today. Similarly, it also applies to 'Isa for, when he descends, he will remove much of the Shari'a established by itjihad. By removing that, he will clarify the form of the legislated truth which he had, especially when the judgements of the Imams differ in the same event. We know absolutely that when revelation descended, it descended in a certain way. That is the divine judgement and none other! Allah confirmed it and it is the Shari'a of confirmation by the removal of interdiction from this community and the vastness of its judgements in it.

As for the statement of the Prophet, "If there are two khalifs, then slay one of them," this is the outward khalifate which has the sword. If they are in agreement, then one of them must be killed by the conflict of the khalifate of meaning. There is no actual killing in it, but killing comes with the outward khalifate. If the khalif does not possess this station, being the khalif of the Messenger of Allah - it is just being from the principle of the basis by which the existence of two gods could be imagined: "If there had been any gods besides Allah in heaven or earth, they would both be ruined," (21:22) even if they are in agreement. We know that if they differ implicitly, the judgement of one of the two will be valid. The one with the operative judgement is the god properly speaking. The one whose judgement is not operative is not god.

From this, we know that every valid judgement in the world today is the judgement of Allah even if it differs from the established judgement in its outward manifestation called the Shari'a. The only judgement which is valid belongs to Allah in the heart of the matter, because the matter which occurs in the world is based on the judgement of the Divine Will, not on the judgement of the established Shari'a, (10) whose establishment itself comes from the Will. For that reason, He put His determination into effect. Therefore, Will only has determination in the matter, not in the act which it brings.

The power of the Will (mashi'a) is immense. (11) This is why Abu Talib (12) considered it to be the Throne of the Essence, since the will itself necessitates judgement. Nothing occurs in existence nor disappears from it without the Will. When there is opposition to the divine command here, it is called "rebellion". It is only commanding the means, not the command which brings things into being. None opposes Allah at all in what He does in respect to the command of the Will. Opposition only occurs in respect of the command of means. So understand that!

Properly speaking, the command of the Will is directed to bringing the action itself into existence, not to the one at whose hands the action manifests itself. It is impossible that the action should not be. However it takes place in a particular locus, and so, at one moment, it is called opposition to the command of Allah, and at another moment it is called agreement and obedience to the command of Allah. The language of praise and blame follow the action accordingly.

Since the matter itself is based on what we have stated about it, creation of all sorts therefore hopes for happiness. He designated this station as "mercy which encompasses everything." (13) It preceded divine wrath, and the predecessor comes before as is its right. That which the latter judges is what the former judged. Mercy obtained it since nothing preceded it, so this is one meaning of "His mercy preceded His wrath" that mercy judges the one who reaches it. It stands at the end. Therefore the end must be reached, and thus mercy and parting from wrath must be reached. It has jurisdiction over everything which reaches it according to what is given to it by the state of the one who arrives.

Whoever possesses understanding witnesses what we have said.
If they do not understand,
they should take it from us.
There is only what we mentioned in this matter, so rely on it and be in it now as we were.
What we recited to you came from it to us, and from us to you is what we gave you from us.

As for the softening of iron, (14) hard hearts are softened by reprimand and threat as fire softens iron. The hardness of hearts is a stronger hardness than that of stone. Fire breaks stone, calcifies it and does not soften it. Iron was only softened for him so that protective coats of mail could be fashioned. This is an instruction from Allah that the thing is only protected by itself.¹ Mail protects against the spearhead, the sword, the knife and the arrowhead - protection against iron is by iron. The Muhammadan Shari'a brings, "I take refuge with You from You." Understand this! This is the spirit of the softening of iron. He is the Avenger, the Merciful, and Allah grants success.

18: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Breath (Nafas) in the Word of Yunus (Jonah)

Know that this human organism in its perfection consists of spirit (ruh), body and self (nafs). Allah created it in His form. The disintegration of its structure is only undertaken by the One who created it either by His hand - and it is only that - or by His command. Whoever undertakes to do that without the command of Allah has wronged himself and exceeded the limits of Allah in it and rushed to the ruin of the one whom Allah has commanded to thrive. Know that compassion to the slaves of Allah is more proper through preservation than jealousy in Allah.

Da'ud, peace be upon him, wanted to build the Bayt al-Muqaddas, (1) and built it many times. Whenever he finished it, it was destroyed. He complained about that to Allah. Allah revealed to him, "This House of Mine will not be built by the hands of one who has shed blood." Da'ud said, "O Lord, was that not for Your sake?" Allah said, "Yes, but are they not My slaves?" Da'ud said, "O Lord, let it be built at the hands of someone who is from me!" Allah revealed to him, "Your son Sulayman will build it."

What is meant in this story is that the preservation and maintenance of this human organism is better than its destruction. Do you not see that Allah has prescribed jizya (2) and research of peace with those who had opposed the Din in order to spare them. He said, "If they incline to peace, you too incline to it, and put your trust in Allah." (8:61)

Do you not see that for the one who has responsibility for retaliation, accepting blood-money or pardoning is prescribed for the next-of-kin who is the responsible guardian? If he refuses to accept either, then the killer can be slain in retaliation. Do you not see how when the next-of-kin consists of a group of people, and one of them accepts the blood-money or pardons the person while the rest of the group want him killed, Allah observes the one who pardoned and prefers him to the one who did not pardon. Do you not see that the Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Whoever is in a position to retaliate and slays the person is like him"? Allah says, "The repayment of a bad action is one equivalent to it," (42:40) so He made retaliation an evil deed, i.e. that deed is evil even though it is part of the Shari'a. Whoever pardons and makes amends has a reward due from Allah because he is based on His form. Whoever pardons and does not slay, his reward is due to the One on whose form he is based, because the One who fashioned is more entitled to it, and his existence only appeared by the name the Manifest.

Whoever preserves the person, preserves Allah. Man is not blameable by his source, but by his action, and his action is not the same as him. We are discussing his action, and action belongs only to Allah, even though some actions are blamed and some are praised. The language of blame in respect to purpose which is reprehensible with Allah, and the only thing reprehensible is what is made to be so by the Shari'a. The Shari'a makes something reprehensible because of what Allah made known or which He made known through someone He has instructed. So Allah prescribed retaliation by necessity for the preservation of the human race and to prevent people exceeding the limits of Allah. Allah says, "There is life for you in retaliation, O you who possess intelligence (lit. cores)!" (3) (2:179) They are the people of the core who stumble onto the secret of divine laws and wisdoms.

Since you know that Allah preserves this organism and preserves its continuance, you should also preserve it since you have that happiness. While man is still alive, he hopes that he will obtain the attribute of perfection for which he was created. Whoever strives to destroy it, strives to prevent the acquisition of that for which he was created. How excellent is what the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, "Shall I tell you what is better and more excellent for you when you meet your enemies, smite their necks and they smite yours? Remembering Allah."

That is because the only one who knows the value of this human organism is the one who remembers Allah with the invocation (dhikr) demanded of him. (4) Allah sits with the one who remembers Him, (5) and the sitter is witnessed by the one doing the invocation. When the one doing the invocation does not witness Allah who sits with him, then he is not doing invocation. When Allah is mentioned, He flows in all parts of the slave, not just in his invocation with the tongue. Allah, at that moment, is only the Companion of the tongue in particular. The tongue sees Him, inasmuch as the man, (6) in respect of his sight does not see Him. (7)

Understand this secret in the invocation of those who are heedless! The heedless person who does invocation is present without a doubt, and the One mentioned sits with him and so he witnesses Him. In respect of his heedlessness, this person does not do invocation and Allah does not sit with the heedless. Man is many but with a single source. Allah is one source but has many Divine Names, just as man has many parts. What is required of the invocation of one part is not the invocation of another part. Allah sits with the part which is invoking Him, and the other part is described as heedless. There must be some part of man doing invocation, so Allah sits with that part, and He preserves the rest of the parts by His concern.

When Allah undertakes the destruction of this organism by what is called "death", that is not negation (i'dam) , but rather separation. He takes man to Him, and what is meant is only Allah's taking man to Him, "and to Him the whole affair will be returned." (11:123) When He takes him to Him, He fashions him a different composition than this composition. The new composition is from the genus of the abode to which he has moved, that is, the Abode of Going-on, because equilibrium exists. The creature thus will never die, i.e. his parts will never be separated.

As for the people of the Fire, they will return to bliss, but it will be in the Fire since after the end of the duration of punishment, it must become cold and peace according to the mercy which preceded it. This is their bliss. The bliss of the people of the Fire, after claims are settled, is the bliss of the friend of Allah, Ibrahim, when he was thrown into the Fire.⁸ He was punished by the sight of it since his knowledge told him that it is a form which causes pain to any living being which is near it. He did not know what Allah intended by it and from it in respect to him.

So after the existence of these pains, he will find cold and peace in spite of the fact that he still witnesses the phenomenal form which is fire in the eyes of the people. The single thing has various modes in the eyes of the onlookers. The divine tajalli is also like that. If you wish, you could say that the tajalli of Allah resembles this, and if you wish, you could say that the world is in the eye of the beholder which contains the parable of Allah in the tajalli, and so it takes on various modes in the eye of the onlooker according to the onlooker's disposition. The onlooker's disposition varies with the modalities of the tajalli. All of this is permissible in the realities.

Had a slain person or one who had died not returned to Allah when he died or was slain,

Allah would not have decreed their deaths nor prescribed their slaying. All is in His hand, and there is no loss in respect to Him. He prescribes slaying and decrees death by His knowledge that His slave will not pass from Him, for he returns to Him as Allah says, "and to Him the whole affair will be returned." So freedom of action occurs in it, and He is the One with freedom of action. Nothing is outside of Him of which He is not the source. Rather, His He-ness is the source of that thing, and He is the One who gives it its unveiling when He says, "and to Him the whole affair will be returned."

19: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Unseen in the Word of Ayyub (Job)

Know that the secret of life flows in water, for it is the basis of the components and the basic elements. For this reason, Allah made every living thing of water. (1) There is nothing which is not alive, so there is nothing which does not proclaim His praise, but their extolling is only understood by divine unveiling. (2) Nothing extols unless it is alive. So the basis of everything is water. Do you not see how the Throne is on the water because it was formed from it? (3) It oppresses the water while the water underneath it maintains it. In the same way, Allah created man a slave. Then he was haughty towards his Lord and put himself above Him. In spite of this, Allah preserves him from underneath in respect of the height of this slave who is ignorant of himself. This is what the Prophet said, "If you let a rope fall, it would fall on Allah." So he indicated that "below" is related to Him as "above" is related to Him when He said, "They fear their Lord above them," (16:50) and "He is the Absolute Master over His slaves." (6:18; 6:61) So He has "above" and "below" For this reason, the six directions only appeared in respect of man, who is on the form of the All-Merciful.

There is no nourisher except Allah. He said of one group, "If they had implemented the Torah and the Gospel," using the indefinite and being general, "and what was sent down to them from their Lord," and this includes every judgement sent down on the tongue of a Messenger or someone inspired, "they would have been fed from above their heads," and He is the Nourisher in respect of the aboveness which is ascribed to Him, "and beneath their feet," (5:66) as He is the Nourisher in respect of the belowness which He ascribes to Himself on the tongue of His Messenger, who translates from Him. If the Throne had not been on the water, its existence would not have been maintained. The existence of the living sustains life. Do you not see that when the living dies the customary death, the parts of his structure disintegrate and his faculties are eliminated from that particular structure? Allah said to Ayyub, "Stamp your foot! Here is a cool bath," (38:42) meaning that since he had an excess of the heat of pain, He would alleviate it by the coolness of the water. For this reason, the medicine was decrease from excess and excess in decreasing. What is meant is the demand of balance, and the only way to it is by approaching it.

However, we said that there is no way achieve equilibrium because realities and witnessing constantly accord taking-form with every single breath. (4) Taking-form (takwin) only comes from an inclination which is called deviation or decomposition in nature. In Allah it is the will, and it is inclination to one particular goal rather than another. Equilibrium denotes sameness in all, but this does not occur. For this reason, we are deprived of the principle of equilibrium. Allah's description with pleasure and anger and the attributes is related in prophetic divine knowledge. Pleasure obliterates anger, and anger obliterates pleasure from the pleasing. Perfect equilibrium would mean that anger and pleasure are the same. The Wrathful would not be wrathful towards the one he is angry with, but would be pleased with him. He is described by one of the two principles in respect to him that is, inclination. And Allah would not be pleased with the one He is pleased with and would be angry with him, and so He is described by one of the two principles in respect to him - that is, inclination.

We said this, however, in respect of the one who thinks that Allah's wrath will continue against the people of the Fire forever, as he claims. So they do not have the principle of pleasure from Allah. What is meant is true. It is as we have said, so the hopes of the people of the Fire lies in the removal of pains. Even if they still dwell in the Fire, that is pleasure, so wrath is removed when the pains are removed since the source of pain is the source of wrath if you understand! Whoever is wrathful has suffered hurt. He only strives to avenge the object of his wrath by causing him suffering so that the wrathful might find relief by that. He transfers the pain which he has to the object of his wrath. If you separate Allah from the universe, then High indeed is He exalted above this attribute! If Allah is the He-ness of the universe, then all principles appear only in Him and from Him. It is His word, "to Him the entire affair will be returned" in reality and unveiling, "so worship Him and put your trust in Him" (11:123) in veil and covering. There is nothing in the realm of possibility more original than this universe because it is based on the form of the Merciful which Allah brought into existence - He manifested His existence by the existence of the universe as man manifests the existence of the natural form. We are His manifest form, and His He-ness is the spirit of this form which governs it. There is no management except in Him as it is only from Him. He is the First by meaning and the Last by form, and the Manifest by the changing of judgements and states, and the Inner by management. "He has knowledge of all things." "He witnesses everything" (5) so He knows by direct witnessing, not by thought. It is the same with the knowledge of tasting (dhawq) which does not derive from thought. Tasting is sound knowledge. Other things are only conjecture and surmise, and that is not knowledge at all.

Then Ayyub had that water to drink to remove the pain of thirst which was from the weariness and punishment with which shaytan (6) had touched him, (7) that is, distance from the realities which he perceived for what they were. Ayyub perceived them for what they were, and by his perception, he was in the place of nearness. Every witnessed one is close to the eye ('ayn=source), even if it is far away by the interval of distance. Vision reaches it, since it is witnessing. If it had not been for that, he would not witness it, nor would what is witnessed be reached by vision, however you want to put it. The witnessed is near between the sight and the seer. This is why Ayyub alluded to touch and ascribed it to Shaytan in spite of the nearness of touch. He said, "The one distant from me is near because of his power over me."

You know that distance and nearness are two relative matters, for they are two ascriptions. They have no existence in the source in spite of the fact that there judgements are established in the far and near. Know that the secret of Allah in Ayyub (whom He made an example for us in a written existing book which this Muhammadan community reads in order to learn what is in it, and they attach honor to the one who possesses it), is that Allah praised him for his patience in his supplication to remove affliction from him. We know that when the slave calls on Allah to remove affliction from him without that lessening his patience, then he is patient and the best of the slaves, as Allah said, "What an excellent slave! He truly turned to his Lord." (8) (38:44) This means he goes back to Allah, not back to the cause.

Allah affects by the cause because the slave depends on it since the causes which will remove any one matter are many, but the Causer is but one. It is more fitting that the slave return to the One Source in order to remove that pain by the cause of that than to the particular cause. It may be that it will not conform to Allah's knowledge in it, and then some will say, "Allah did not answer me." Yet he did not call on him, but he inclined to a particular cause which neither the time nor the moment requires. Ayyub acted by the wisdom of Allah since he was a Prophet. He knew that with one group, patience is what holds the self back from complaint. That is not our definition of patience (sabr). Its definition is to hold the self back from complaint to other-than-Allah, not to Allah. The first group is veiled in their view that the complainer is lessened in contentment (rida) with the decree by complaint. That is not the case.

Contentment with the decree is not lessened by complaint to Allah or to others, but contentment with the decreed is lessened. We are not speaking about contentment with the decreed. Affliction is what is decreed and not the same as the Decree. Ayyub knew that holding the self back from complaint to Allah for the removal of affliction is to oppose divine force. It is ignorance if, when Allah afflicts someone by what gives him pain, he does not call on Allah to remove that painful matter from him. The one who has realization must supplicate and ask Allah to remove that from him. For that gnostic who possesses unveiling, that removal comes from the presence of Allah. Allah describes Himself as "hurt", so He said, "those who hurt Allah and His Messenger." (33:57) What hurt is greater than that Allah test you with affliction in your heedlessness of Him or a divine station which you do not know so that you return to Him with your complaint so that He can remove it from you? Thus the need which is your reality will be proven. The hurt is removed from Allah by your asking Him to repel it from you, since you are His manifest form.

One of the gnostics was hungry and wept. Someone who had no tasting (dhawq) in that area censured him for that. The gnostic said, "But Allah makes me hungry so that I might weep. He tests me by affliction so that I might ask Him to remove it from me. This does not lessen my being patient." We know that patience is holding the self back from complaint to other-than-Allah.

By "other" I mean a particular aspect of Allah. Allah specified a particular one of Allah's aspects, and it is called the aspect of He-ness, so he calls on Him from that aspect to remove affliction from him, not from the other aspects called causes. They are only Him in respect to elaboration of the matter in itself. The gnostic's request does not veil him from the He-ness of Allah in removing affliction from him and the fact that all the causes are Him from a particular point of view. This path is only obliged on the people of adab among the slaves of Allah who are entrusted with the secrets of Allah. Allah has guardians whom only Allah recognizes, and some of them recognize each other. We have counselled you, so strive, and ask of Allah!

20: The Seal of the Wisdom of Majesty in the Word of Yahya (John the Baptist)

This is the wisdom of firstness in the names. Allah called him Yahya, i.e. the dhikr of Zakariyya was Yahya brought to life by him, and "a name We have given to no one else before." (19:7) He joined the attainment of the attribute, which is in the one who has passed on but left a son to revive his memory and his name through him. He called him "Yahya". His name Yahya is like knowledge by tasting. The memory of Adam, peace be upon him, was revived by Shith and that of Nuh by Sam. It is the same with the Prophets, peace be upon them; but Allah did not combine the name of knowledge from Him and the attribute for anyone before Yahya. It was an act of concern for Zakariyya from Allah, since Zakariyya said, "Give me an heir from You." (19:5) He mentioned Allah before the mention he mentioned his son, as Asiya (1) mentioned the neighbor before the abode when she said, "Build a house in the Garden for me in Your presence." (66:11) Allah was generous to Zakariyya, for He granted his need and named him by His attribute. Yahya's name was a remembrance for what His Prophet Zakariyya asked of Him; because he preferred the going-on of dhikr-Ullah after his death, since the son is the secret of his father.

He said, "to be my inheritor and the inheritor of the family of Ya'qub." (19:6) Nothing is inherited in respect of these except for the station of dhikr-Ullah and calling to Him. Then Allah gave him the good news of what He appointed for him from His words, "Peace be upon him the day he was born, and the day he dies, and the day he is raised up again alive." (19:15) He brought the attribute of life, which is his name, and He informed him of His peace upon him. His words are true. He completed it, even if it is the word of the spirit, "Peace be upon me the day I was born, the day I die, and the day I am raised up again alive," (19:33) and this is more sublime and more perfect in oneness and belief in the interpretation. That in which the order of nature (2) was broken in respect to 'Isa was articulation. His intellect was given mastery and perfected at that time when Allah made him speak. In any case, mastery of articulation is not necessary.

'Isa spoke the truth in what he articulated but this is different than the one who was testified to, as in the case of Yahya. (3) Allah's greeting on Yahya was higher than the greeting of 'Isa on himself in this way since the ambiguity occurring in divine concern was removed. The immediate circumstances indicate his proximity to Allah in that and his sincerity, since he spoke in the cradle the form which indicated the innocence of his mother. He was one of the two witnesses. The other witness was the shaking of the dried trunk of the palm tree. (4) Fresh, ripe dates came tumbling down without the male palm tree or pollination. In the same way, Maryam bore 'Isa without a man, that is, without normal and customary intercourse. If a Prophet had said, "My sign and my miracle is that this wall will speak," and then the wall speaks and says, "You have lied, you are not the Messenger of Allah," then the sign is proven and it is confirmed by it that he is the Messenger of Allah. One does not pay any attention to what the wall said.

He introduces this probability into the words of 'Isa when his mother pointed to him while he was in the cradle. Allah's greeting on Yahya is higher than this element. The passage which indicates that he is the slave of Allah is in respect of the claim made about him that he was the son of Allah. The indication is completed by sheer articulation. He is the slave of Allah according to another group who speak of Prophethood. It increases the principle of probability in logical thought until his truthfulness appeared in the future regarding all that he spoke about when he was in the cradle. So understand our allusion!

Notes to Chapter 20:

1. The wife of Pharaoh who was one of the perfect women.
2. Kharq al-'adat, miracle, literally, the breaking of the normal pattern of things.
3. 'Isa was a witness, not one who is the object of witness, since he testified on behalf of his mother.

21: The Seal of the Wisdom of Sovereignty (1) in the Word of Zakariyya (Zachariah)

Know that the mercy of Allah encompasses everything in existence and judgement, and the existence of wrath comes from the mercy of Allah by wrath. His mercy preceded His wrath, that is, the ascription of mercy to Him preceded the ascription of wrath. Then every source has an existence which demands that Allah's mercy encompass every source. For that reason, we say that the mercy of Allah encompasses all things in existence and principle.

The Divine Names are "things", but they derive from a single Source. The first thing that His mercy encompassed before time was its thingness, that source which gives existence to mercy by mercy. Thus the first thing that His mercy encompassed was itself, then the thingness indicated, then the thingness of every existent existing without end in this world and the Next, non-essential ('arad) and substance (jawhar), composite and simple. Neither the acquisition of a goal nor harmony of nature is taken into account rather, harmonious and inharmonious things are all encompassed by divine mercy in existence. We mentioned in The Makkan Revelations that effect only belongs to the non-existent, not the existent. If the existent had it, it is by the principle of the non-existent. It is a strange knowledge and a rare question. Only those who possess illusions (awhâm) know its realisation, and that is by their tasting (dhawq). (2)

The mercy of Allah pervades phenomenal beings, and circulates in essences and sources. The most ideal position of mercy is when it is known from witnessing with sublime thoughts. Everyone mercy designates is happy. There is only what mercy designates, and the mention of the mercy of things is the source of its bringing them into existence. Every existent thing has been shown mercy. O friend! Do not be veiled from the perception of what we have said by what you see of the troubles people experience and what you believe about the pains of the Next Abode which will not depart from the one whom they afflict.

First of all, know that mercy is in bringing-into-existence in general. In mercy by pains, only pains come into existence. So mercy has an effect in two ways - the first effect is by the essence, which is its bringing every existent source into existence. It does not regard desire or lack of it, suitability or lack of suitability. It looks at the source of every existent before its existence, or rather, it looks at its source-form. For this reason, it saw Allah-as-creature in creeds as a single source-form among the source-forms. Its mercy to itself is by bringing-into-existence. This is why we said that Allah-as-creature in creeds is the first thing shown mercy after its mercy to itself in its connection of bringing those shown mercy into existence.

It has another effect by request. Those who are veiled ask Allah to have mercy on them in their beliefs, and the people of unveiling ask for the mercy of Allah to settle on them. They ask for it by the name of Allah, and so they say, "O Allah! Have mercy on us!" and He only has mercy on them by carrying out mercy through them. It has authority because authority in reality belongs to the meaning based on place.

He is the Merciful in reality, so Allah is only merciful to His slaves, attentive to them by mercy. When mercy settles on them, they experience its authority through taste (dhawq). The one designated by mercy has had mercy known to him. The active participle is the Merciful (Rahîm) and the Mercy-Giver (Râhim), and this principle does not describe creatures because it is a matter of directing meanings to their essences.

States are neither existent nor non-existent they have no source in existence because they are relationships. They are not non-existent in principle because what knowledge establishes is called the "knower", and it is a state. The knower is an essence described by knowledge, but it is not the same as the essence nor is it the same as knowledge. There is only knowledge and the essence on which this knowledge is established. The being of the knower is a state of this essence when it is described by this meaning. The relationship of knowledge occurred to him, so he is called knowing. Mercy, properly speaking, is a relationship from the Mercy-giver, and it is necessarily part of the principle, so it is merciful. The One who brought it into existence in the one shown mercy did not bring it into existence in order to be shown mercy by it; He brought it into existence to show mercy to the one on whom it settled.

Allah is not in a place by events, so He is not in a place by bringing mercy into existence. He is the Mercy-Giver, and the Mercy-Giver is only Mercy-Giver by the establishment of mercy. He confirmed that He is the source of mercy. Whoever has not tasted this matter and has no part in it, does not dare to say that He is the source of mercy or the source of the attribute. Such a person says, "He is not the same as the attribute nor other than it." In his view, the attributes of Allah with Him are not Him, nor are they other-than-Him because he cannot deny them nor can he make them the same as Him. Thus he (3) moves to this interpretation, and it is a good interpretation. Yet there is another interpretation more appropriate to the matter than this one, and more likely to remove ambiguity. It is to deny the sources of the attributes any existence based on the essence of the one described. Rather, they are relationships and relative ascriptions between the one described by them and their intelligible sources. Although mercy is common to all of them, it is different in relationship to each Divine Name. (4)

For this reason, Allah is asked to show mercy by each Divine Name, so the mercy of Allah and its indirect reference, which is that which encompasses everything, has many branches according to the number of the Divine Names. It is not general in relation to that particular divine name in the statement of the one who asks, "O Lord, have mercy!" and other Divine Names, even the Avenger. So he says, "O Avenger, have mercy on me!" That is because these Names indicate the designated Essence and, by their realities, indicate different meanings. They call on Him by these Names in mercy with respect to their indication of the Essence called by that Name and no other not by what is indicated by that Name, separating it from another and distinguishing it. The Name is not distinguished from another, and with him it is the indication of the Essence. It is distinguished in itself from other-than-it by its essence, as it is generally agreed that, by any expression, this Name is a reality distinct in its essence from other-than-it.

The whole is set forth to indicate one designated source. There is no disagreement that each name has an authority which another does not have. That also must be taken into account, as one takes into account their indications of the named essence.

For this reason, Abu'l-Qasim ibn Qasi said regarding the Divine Names that each Name is, in its isolation, designated by all of the Divine Names since they preceded in mentioning its description by all the Names, that is, by their indication of one source. Although the Names based on it are many and their realities differ, i.e. the realities of these Names, the mercy is obtained by two means. The first is the path of obligation, and it is His word, "I shall prescribe it for those who are godfearing and pay zakat," (7:156) and He binds them by it through the attributes of knowledge and action. The other path by which mercy is obtained is the path of divine graciousness which is not connected to action. It is His words, "My mercy embraces all things." Of this, it is said, "So that Allah may forgive you your earlier errors and any later ones." (48:2) And of this, there are His words, "Do what you want, I have already forgiven you." (5) So know that!

Notes to Chapter 21:

1. Al-Mâlikiyya. His state was dominated by the name al-Mâlik, the Sovereign, who prevails in His orders. This strength was shown in his himma whose fruit was Yahya.
2. Because they connect the imagination (wahm) to things and bring them into existence and thus have experiential knowledge of this. As for the one on whom illusion has no effect, he is far from this question.
3. The Imam of Ahlu-s-Sunnah wa-l-Jama'ah, Shaykh Abu-l-Hasan al-Ash'ari.
4. There is a specific mercy of Allah, of al-Rahman, of ar-Rahim, of al-Malik, etc.
5. This refers to an incident involving Hatib ibn Abi Balta'a. When the Muslim army prepared to set out to conquer Makka, Hatib sent a letter to warn the Quraysh which was intercepted. 'Umar wanted kill him for intelligence with the nemy in war, but the Prophet said, "O 'Umar, perhaps Allah has looked with favor on those who already fought at Badr and said, 'Do whatever you want. I have already forgiven you.'"

22: The Seal of the Wisdom of Intimacy in the Word of Ilyas (Elijah)

Ilyas (Elijah) is none but Idris (Enoch), peace be upon him. He was a Prophet before Nuh, and Allah raised him to a high place. (1) He dwells in the heart of the spheres, the sphere of the sun. Then he was sent to the town of Baalbek (Ba'labakk). Baal is the name of an idol and "bakk" is the power of the village. The idol was called Baal and was singled out with domination. It was Ilyas who was Idris, who was given the example of the splitting of the mountain called "Lubnan (Lebanon)" which comes from lubana (desire, goal). What he needed was a horse of fire with all its trappings of fire. When he saw it, he rode it and appetite fell from him, and so there was intellect without appetite. There remained for him no connection with that which is connected to the desire of the self. For him, Allah was pure without connection. He had only half of gnosis of Allah. When the intellect is free of the self in respect to gathering knowledges by its discernment, its gnosis of Allah is based on disconnection (tanzih) not connection (tashbih).

When Allah gives gnosis by tajalli, then gnosis of Allah is perfected.
Disconnection is used in one place and connection in another place.

The gnostic sees the diffusion of Allah by existence in natural and elemental forms. There is no form but that he sees the source of Allah in its source. This is the complete perfect gnosis which is brought the roads (shara'i) revealed from Allah. By this recognition, all illusions (awham) have authority. For this reason, illusion has a stronger power in this human organism than the intellect, because the man of intellect even if his intellect reaches maturity is not free of the power which illusion has over him and over the formation of what he reasons. Illusion is the greatest power in this perfect human organism. The revealed roads brought it, and so you use both connection and disconnection. You use connection in disconnection by illusion, and disconnection in connection by the intellect. So the whole is connected to the whole. It is not possible that disconnection be free of connection nor connection from disconnection. Allah said, "Nothing is like Him," so He used connection and disconnection. "He is the All-Hearing, the All-Seeing," (2) and He used connection, and yet it is the greatest of ayat revealed on disconnection. Even so, it is not free of connection because of the Kayf (like).

So He has the most knowledge of Himself of those who know. He only designated Himself by what we mentioned. Then He said, "Glory be to your Lord, the Lord of Might, beyond anything they describe," (37:180) and they only describe according to what these realities accord them. He exalted Himself above their disconnection since they limit Him by that disconnection. That is due to the inability of the intellect to perceive the like of this.

Then all the roads (Shara'i) brought what the illusions dominate. They do not free Allah of an attribute in which He is manifest as they said. They brought that, and so communities acted on it. Allah granted them the tajalli. The heirs followed the Messengers closely, and said what the Messengers of Allah said. Allah knows best where He puts His message, and so Allah knows best who turns his face to Him in a particular aspect by transmission to the Messenger of Allah. One aspect of His begins with "He knows best where to place His message." (6:124) There is a reality in each of the two aspects for that reason, we speak of connection and disconnection, and disconnection and connection. After this (3) is established, we will lower the screens and drop the veils on the eye of the critic (4) and the one who simply follows a creed. Both of them are among the forms in which Allah gives tajalli, but He has commanded the veil for us in order that different levels of excellence of the predisposition of forms might appear. One is given a tajalli in a form according to the predisposition of that form. What its reality and exigencies accord him is ascribed to him. That must be. The example of the one who sees Allah when he is asleep and does not deny it is this. Without a doubt, it is Allah Himself. He attaches to it the exigencies of that form and its realities in which He gives the tajalli in sleep. Then after that, he interprets, i.e. he transfers it to another matter which disconnection logically demands. If the one who interprets it has unveiling and belief (iman), then he does not transfer it to disconnection at all. Rather, he gives it the disconnection that is due it and what is due to that which is manifest in it, i.e. its connection/resemblance. Properly speaking, "Allah" is an expression for the one who understands the indication (ishara). (5)

The spirit of this wisdom and its seal is that the command is divided into the effector and the one effected. These are two expressions. The effector in every aspect and in every state and in every presence is Allah. The effected by every aspect and in every state and in every presence is the universe, even if it is Allah who comes. (6) Allah is everything at its foundation which corresponds. That which appears is forever and ever a branch from the root; divine love is a branch from the supererogatory acts of the slave. So this is an effect between the effector and the effected. Allah is the hearing of the slave and his sight and faculties from this love. (7) This is an established effect which, if you believe, you cannot deny because it is confirmed by the Shari'a.

As for the person of sound intellect, he is either in possession of a divine tajalli in a natural locus of tajalli, (8) so he recognizes what we have said, or else he is a believing Muslim who believes in what was reported in sound tradition. The power of illusion must govern the man of intellect investigating what has been brought to him in this form because he believes in that form. As for the one who is not a believer, he judges illusion by illusion; and so he imagines by his logical discernment that he assigns to Allah what the tajalli gives him in dream. Illusion in that does not depart from him inasmuch as he is not aware because of his disregard for himself. From that is what Allah says, "Call on Me and I will answer You." (40:60) Allah also says, "If My slaves ask you concerning Me, I am near. I answer the call of the caller when he calls on Me," (2:186) since He only answers when there is someone who calls to Him. The source of the caller is the source of the answerer, but there is no disagreement about the difference of forms. They are two forms without a doubt.

All these forms are like Zayd's limbs. It is known that Zayd is one reality in personality, yet his hand is not the form of his foot nor his head nor his eye nor his eyebrow. He is one multiple - multiple by forms, one by source. That is like man who is one by source without a doubt. There is no doubt that 'Umar is not Zayd nor Khalid nor Ja'far, and that the individual persons of this one source are endless in existence. Even if man is one by source, he is many by forms and persons. If you are a believer, you know absolutely that Allah Himself will appear in a tajalli in a form on the Day of Rising. He will be recognized and then He will change form and be denied. (9) Then He will change from it again into another form and will not be recognized. He is the One giving tajalli and it is not other than Him in each form, even though it is known that this form is not that other form.

It is one source which has the same function as the mirror. When the viewer looks in it at the form of his belief in Allah, he recognizes Him, and so draws near Him. When it happens that he sees in it the belief of someone else, he denies Him since he sees his form and the form of someone else in the mirror. The mirror is but a single source while the forms are many in the eye of the viewer. There is no form in the mirror which comprises them all at once. Although the phenomenal being of the mirror has an effect on the forms from one aspect, it does not have an effect on the forms from another aspect. The effect which it has makes the form change shape in smallness, largeness, length, and width, so it has an effect in quantities. This is attributable to it, but this changing of it is by the difference of the size of the mirrors. In the example, look at one of these mirrors, and do not look at all of them. It is your perception in respect to His being essence, and so He is independent of the universe, and in respect to the divine names. In that moment He is like the mirrors. Whatever Divine Name in which you look at yourself or simply look at. He manifests the reality of that Name in whoever looks. The matter is thus. If you understand, do not be anxious, and do not fear. Allah loves bravery, even to the extent of killing a snake. The snake is not other than your self, and the snake is alive through its self in form and reality. The thing is not killed by itself, even if the form is destroyed in the senses, The definition determines it, and imagination does not make it depart.

Since the matter is based on this, this is the safeguard of the essences and might and invincibility. You cannot destroy the definition. What might is greater than this might? You imagine by illusion that you have killed. By intellect and illusion, the form does not vanish from existence in the definition. The proof of that is, "You did not throw when you threw, but Allah threw." (8:17) The eye only perceived the form of Muhammad which had the throwing confirmed to it in the senses. It is what Allah denied the throwing to at first, and then confirmed in the middle, only to return to the perception that Allah was the One who threw in the form of Muhammad. One must believe this. So look at this effector when Allah descended into a Muhammadan form. Allah Himself informs His slaves of that, and none of us said that of Him, rather He said it of Himself. His report is true, and it is obligatory to believe it whether or not you perceive the knowledge of what He said, being a knower or believing Muslim.

Part of what shows you the weakness of the intellect's discernment in respect to its thought, since the intellect passes judgement on cause ('illa), is that cause is not an effect of the one who is the cause. This is the judgement of the intellect which is evident. There is only this in the knowledge of tajalli, and it is that the cause is an effect to whoever is the cause. That which the intellect governs is sound when discernment is clarified. Its goal in that is that, when it sees the matter differently than what logical proof would accord it, it says that the source after it is confirmed that it is one in this multiple, and inasmuch as it is cause in one of these forms belonging to any effect is not an effect of its effect, so that its effect would become a cause to it. This is his goal when he sees the matter for what it was, although he does not continue in his logical discernment.

Since the command in causality is of this sort, your opinion by the scope of logical discernment is not in other than this narrow limit. None are more reasonable than the Messengers, may the blessings of Allah be upon them, and they brought what they brought in transmission from the Divine Presence. They confirmed what the intellect confirmed. Then they gave more in what the intellect alone does not possess by its perception and what the intellect does not imagine directly, but one draws near to it in the divine tajalli. When he is alone with himself after the tajalli, he is confused about what he saw. If he is the slave of a Lord, his intellect returns to him, and if he is the slave of reasoning, Allah gives him back judgement. This is only as long as he is veiled in the dimension of this world from his dimension in the Next World.

The gnostics appear here as if they possessed the form of this world by virtue of the fact that its principles operate on them. However, Allah has transformed them inwardly to the dimension of the Next World. That must be the case. They are unknown by form except to whomever has had his inner eye unveiled by Allah so that he perceives. (10) There is no gnostic of Allah in respect of divine tajalli who is not based on the dimension of the Next World. He has been gathered in this lower world of his and has been called from his grave. He sees what they do not see, and he witnesses what they do not witness - as a mark of concern from Allah to some of His slaves in that respect.

Whoever wishes to find this wisdom of Ilyas-Idris to whom Allah gave two formations, so that he was a Prophet before Nuh, and then he raised him up and brought him down after that as a Messenger and so Allah joined for him the two degrees, let him descend from the authority of his intellect to his appetite and be an absolute animal so that he will be shown what every creature that crawls is shown except for the jinn and men. Then he will know that he has realized his animality, and it has two tokens. One is this unveiling so he sees who is punished in his grave and who has bliss. He sees the dead alive and the silent speaking and the sitting walking. The second token is muteness since, had he wanted to utter what he had seen, he would be unable to do so. Thus he has realized his animality. We had a pupil who acquired this unveiling although dumbness did not take hold of him, and so he did not fully realize his animality. When Allah established me in this station, I realized my animality with a complete realization. So I was seeing and wishing to utter what I was witnessing but I could not. So there was no difference between me and the mute who cannot speak.

When he realizes what we have mentioned, he will move to being pure intellect in natural matter. He will witness matters which are the roots of what is manifested in natural forms. He will know from where this principle is manifest in the natural form with the knowledge of tasting. Had it been unveiled that nature is the source of the breath of the All-Merciful, he would have been given much good. If he is restricted in what we have mentioned, this power from the gnosis which governs his intellect will be enough for him. He keeps company with gnostics, and by that he knows tasting. "You did not kill them, it was Allah who killed them," (8:17) yet only iron, the blow and that which is behind this form killed them. In the whole, killing and throwing took place. So he witnesses matters by their roots and by their forms, and he is complete. When he witnesses the breath, he is completely perfect. The breath of the All-Merciful is the source of the overflowing of existence and life on all, rather the source of Allah's descent to all forms.

1. A place from which, according to Sidi Muhiddin, Idris (Enoch) descended in order to become Ilyas (Elijah). See Qur'an 19:57, "Mention Idris in the Book. He was a true man and a Prophet. We raised him up to a high place."
2. Qur'an 42:11.
3. The rule of joining tanzih and tashbih.
4. The one who uses logical proof.
5. i.e. what he recognises from the word "Allah" extends only so far as his predisposition and understanding.
6. In the wârid.
7. "When I love him, I am his hearing with he hears, his sight by which he sees, his hand with which he strikes, and his foot with which he walks".
8. i.e. the human form.

23: The Seal of the Wisdom of Ihsan in the Word of Luqman

If Allah wishes, He wills provision for Him, so all of phenomenal being is His food.
If Allah wishes, He wills provision for us,
so He is our food as He wishes.
His volition is His will, so say that He wished it.
So it is wished.
He wills increase and decrease.
So what He wishes is wished.
This is the distinction between them, (1)
so understand!
From a certain point of view, their source is the same.

Allah says, "We gave Luqman wisdom," (31:12) and He says, "Whoever has been given wisdom has been given much good." (2:269) By the divine text, Luqman had much good as Allah has testified. The example of what Luqman said to his son is, "My son, even if something weighs as little as a mustard-seed, and it is inside a rock or anywhere else in the heavens or earth, Allah will bring it out." (31:16) This is a wisdom which is articulated, and that wisdom is his setting out that Allah is the One who brings forth. Allah confirmed that in His Book and did not refute what the speaker said.

As for the silent wisdom in it, and you know it by the circumstances, he is silent about the one to whom that grain is given. He did not mention him nor did he say to his son, "Allah will bring it to you or to other than you." He used bringing in general terms and denoted the thing brought in the heavens or in the earth as an instruction that the looker might regard His words, "He is Allah in the heavens and in the earth." (6:3) Luqman gave instruction by what he said and by what he remained silent on, so Allah is the source of every knowing thing because the known is more universal than the thing, so it denies unknown things.

Then he completed the wisdom and brought it to its full value in order that the structure might be complete in it. He said, "Allah is Latif (Subtle, Kind)." (31:16) Part of His subtleness (latâfa) and His kindness (lutf) is that He is in the thing named by such-and-such a definition in such-and-such a source of that thing, so it is only what its name indicates by convention and usage. It is said that these are names: heaven, earth, rock, tree, animal, angel, provision and food, and yet the source of everything is One. Thus the Ash'arites say about this that the entire universe is homogeneous in substance (jawhar), so it is one single substance.

It is the same as our statement that the source is One. They said that it varies by non-essentials. Thus our statement that it varies and becomes many through forms and relationships so as to provide distinction. It is said, "This is not that in respect to its form or its non-essential or natural disposition (mizâj)." Say whatever you like, but this is the same as that in respect to its substance. For this reason, the source of the substance is put in the definition of every form and disposition. However, we say that it is not other-than-Allah. The mutakallim thinks that it is called substance. Even though it is true, it is not the source of Allah of which the people of unveiling and tajalli speak. This is the wisdom of the "Latîf".

Then He is described when He says "the All-Aware (Khabir)," the One who knows by experience. It is His words, "We will test you until We know." (47:31) This is the knowledge of tastes. Allah put Himself with His knowledge of what the matter is in (our) profitable knowledge. No one can deny what Allah has written about Himself. Allah differentiated the knowledge of tasting and absolute knowledge. The knowledge of tasting is limited by the faculties. He said of Himself that He is the source of the faculties of His slave when He said, "I am his hearing," which is one of the faculties of the slave, "and his sight," which is one of the faculties of the slave, "and his tongue," which is one of the faculties of the slave, "and his foot and his hand." He did not restrict Himself to specifying the faculties, but He mentioned the members. The slave is not other than his members and faculties. The source called the slave is the Real, but the source of the slave is not the Compassionate Master.

Relationships are distinct by their essence. The one brought into relationship is not distinct. (2) Then He equalized His source in all relationships, for it is but one source with various ascriptions, relationships and attributes. Part of the completeness of Luqman's wisdom in instructing his son is what has come in the ayat of these two Divine Names, Latif and Khabir - Allah is called by them. If He had put that in phenomenal being (kawn) which is existence, and said, "He was (kana)," it would have been more complete in wisdom and more eloquent in admonition. Allah related the words of Luqman in meaning as he said it and did not add anything to it. His statement that Allah is the Latif, the Aware, is from the statement of Allah. Then Allah knew of Luqman that, had he said it (kana), it would have been utterly perfected by this.

As for his words, "If it should be but the weight of one grain of mustard-seed," it is for the one who has it as food. It is only the atom mentioned in His words, "Whoever does an atom's weight of good will see it, and whoever does an atom's weight of evil will see it." (99:7-8) A mustard-seed is the smallest thing consumed. If there had been anything smaller, Allah would have used it as He said, "He is not ashamed to make an example of a gnat." (2:26) Then since He knew that there is anything smaller than the gnat, He said "or of an even smaller thing," i.e. in smallness. This is the word of Allah, and that which is in the Sura of the Earthquake (az-Zalzal, 99) is also the word of Allah. So know that! That which is smaller than the gnat is the atom, and then there is another subtlety (latîfa). That is that the atom, in spite of its smallness, is also lighter in weight because it is alive, since the living is lighter than the dead. So the meaning is that when the deed is the weight of an atom in smallness and lightness, the recompense must be seen. We know that Allah did not restrict Himself to the weight of the atom, and there is nothing smaller than it. He used it by way of intensification, and Allah knows best.

When Luqman used the diminutive for his son, (3) it was the diminutive of mercy and thereby he gave him a legacy which contains his happiness if he acts according to it. The wisdom of Luqman's legacy lies in his prohibition to his son, "Do not associate anything with Allah. Associating others with Him is a terrible wrong." (31:13) The one wronged establishes apportioning in respect to His description even though it is the same source. So he is only associating His source with Him, and this is the very greatest ignorance.

The reason for this is that the person who has no recognition of the matter nor of the reality of the thing, does not know that diversity is actually contained in a single source although forms vary in that single source. So such a person puts the form shared by another in that station, and so he makes every form a part of that station. It is known of the associate that the matter which indicates him through what occurs in him of partnership is not the source of the other with whom he is associated, since it is the other. In reality, there is no associate. Everyone is based on his portion whenever it is said about him that there is a partnership between the two in it. The reason for that joint association, if it is joint, is that the action of one of them eliminates the collective aspect. "Say: Call on Allah or call on the All-Merciful." (17:110) This is the very heart of the question.

Notes to Chapter 23:

1. The difference between volition (mashi'a) and will (irada).
2. In respect of its reality, the Essence is not distinguishable.
3. Bunayya, "little son".

24: The Seal of the Wisdom of the Imam in the Word of Harun (Aaron)

Know that the existence of Harun, peace be upon him, was from the presence of mercy (rahamut) by His words, "We endowed him with Our mercy, making his brother Harun a Prophet." (19:53) So his Prophethood was from the presence of the Rahamut. He was older than Musa, and Musa was greater than him in Prophethood. The Prophethood of Harun is from the presence of mercy (rahma) and, for that reason, he said to his brother Musa, peace be upon him, "O son of my mother!" (7:150) So he called to him by his mother, not by his father, since, in principle, mercy belongs in greater abundance to the mother than the father. Were it not for that mercy, the mother would not have the patience necessary for upbringing. Then he said, "do not seize me by the beard or by the hair," (20:94) and do not let my enemies gloat over me. All this is one of the breaths of mercy. The reason for that is the lack of ascertainment in looking at the tablets which had been given into his hands. If he had looked at them with ascertainment, he would have found guidance and mercy in them.

Musa would have found guidance, which is an elucidation of what happened in the matter which made him angry and of which Harun was innocent, and mercy towards his brother. He did not take him by the beard because of that state in which he saw his people because of his age, for Harun was older than him. That was compassion for Musa from Harun because the Prophethood of Harun is from the mercy of Allah. Only the like of that issued from him.

Then Harun said to Musa, "I was afraid that you would say: 'You have caused division in the Tribe of Israel'," (20:94) and you would make me the cause of their division since the worship of the Calf divided them. There were some of them who worshipped it following and imitating the Samiri, and there were some of them who refused to worship it until Musa returned to them so that they might question him regarding it. Harun was afraid that he would have that division between them attributed to him.

Musa knew the matter better than Harun because by his knowledge he knew the One the people of the Calf worshipped since Allah decreed that only He would be worshipped. When Allah decrees something, it must occur. Musa chided his brother Harun since the business consisted of disavowal and inadequacy. The gnostic is the one who sees Allah in everything, rather he sees Him as the source of everything. Musa was teaching Harun with the instruction of knowledge even though Musa was younger than him in age.

For that reason, when Harun said what he said, he turned to the Samiri and said to him, "What did you think you were doing, O Samiri," i.e. what were you doing in turning aside to the form of the Calf, and in your making this shape from the jewelry of the people so that you captured their hearts for the sake of their wealth? 'Isa used to say to the Tribe of Israel, "O Tribe of Israel! Every man turns to where his wealth is, so put your wealth in heaven, and then your hearts will be in heaven." Wealth is only called that (mâl) because by essence it inclines (yumîl) the hearts to worship. It is the greatest and most exalted goal in the hearts since they need it. Forms have no going-on, so the form of the Calf must vanish. If Musa had not hastened to burn it, jealousy would have overcome him. So he burned it and then scattered the ashes of that form in the sea. He told the Samiri, "Behold your god." He called it a god to alert him in order to teach him that he did know some of the places of divine tajalli, "I will surely burn it!"

The animality (hawayâniyya) of man has freedom of action over the animality of animals since Allah has subjected animals to man, especially in view of the fact that man's origin is not animal. Man has greater subjugation because that which is not-animal does not possess will. In fact, the non-animal is under the jurisdiction of whoever administers it without any recalcitrance whatsoever. The animal, on the other hand, has both will and instinct. Recalcitrance appears in some of its actions. If it has the power to manifest that, reluctance and resistance to what man wants appears from it. If it does not have that power or if what the man wants agrees with what the animal itself wants, then the animal obediently follows what is wanted of it.

Even so, man's "like" follows a command in whatever Allah has called him to in respect of the wealth which he hopes for from Him, which is designated in some states by "the other World" as when Allah says, "We have raised some of them above others in rank so that some of them are subservient to others." (43:32) His like is only subjugated to him by his animality, not by his humanness. The two likes are two opposites. The higher is degree subjugates the lower in degree by wealth or by rank with his humanness, and that other was subjected to him either by fear or greed from his animality, not from his humanness, so his like is not subjected to him.

Do you not see that what is among the beasts in the way of jostling against one another is because they are likes? Two likes are two opposites. That is why He said, "and He raised some of them above others in rank," so he is not with him in rank, and so subjugation occurs in respect of rank. Subjection is of two kinds. First, there is subjection intended by the subjector like the active conqueror when he subjects this subjected person - like the subjugation by the master of his slave although he is his like in humanness, and like the subjugation of the Sultan of his subjects who are his like in humanness, He subjugated them by rank.

The second sort is subjugation by the subjects of the king establishing their command that he drive harm away from them, protect them, do battle against those who attack them, and preserve their property and lives. All this is subjection through state by the subjects who subjugate their king in this act. In reality, it is called the subjection of rank. Rank has jurisdiction over him by this act. There are kings who work just for themselves, and there are those who recognize the matter and know that their subjects' subjugation of them is by rank. He knows their power and rights. Allah rewards him for that with the reward of those who know. The reward of the like of this is up to Allah, in Allah's being involved in the affairs of His slaves, for all the universe is subjected by state. Who is there who cannot be referred to as being "subjected"? Allah said, "Every day He is engaged in some affair." (55:29)

Lack of power was in fact the armour of Harun which saved him from the people of the Calf by mastery over the Calf as Musa had mastery over it. This is a wisdom from Allah which is manifest in existence that He should be worshipped in every form. When the form departed after that, it only departed after it had been clad with divinity by its worshipper. For this reason, there is no species but that it is worshipped, either by the worship of making divine or by the worship of subjugation. That must be so for the one who has intellect.

Nothing is worshipped in the universe except after it is clad in elevation for the worshipper and its rank is manifest in his heart. For that reason, Allah called Himself for us, "the Exalter of ranks," and He did not say the "Exalter of rank," for ranks are many in the same source. He decreed that we worship only Him in many ranks. Each rank accords a divine locus of tajalli which is worshipped in it, and the greatest locus of tajalli in which He is worshipped and the highest, is passion (hawa). As He said, "Have you seen him who takes his passion to be his god?" (45:23) It is the greatest idol. Nothing is worshipped except by it, and it is only worshipped by itself. Of it I say:

The truth of passion is that passion is the cause of passion.
If there had not been passion in the heart, passion would not have been worshipped.

Do you not see how perfect Allah's knowledge of things is? How it is completed in respect of the one who worships his passion and takes it as a god? He said, "he who Allah has misguided knowingly." (45:23) Being astray is bewilderment (hayra). That is when this worshipper sees that what he worships is only his passion, by following it in obedience to Him in what He commanded him of worship of whichever person worships Him, until his worship is for Allah the Great. That too is from passion because if passion had not occurred in him in that pure presence and it is the will to love he would neither have worshipped Allah nor preferred Him to others. In the same way, everyone worships a certain form among the forms of the universe, and takes it as a god, and he only takes it by passion. The worshipper is under the power of his passion. Then he sees that idols take on various forms among the worshippers. Each worshipper, for some reason, denies the one who worships another. What he has is a nearer perception which is confused by the unity (ittihâd) of passion, rather by the oneness (ahadiyya) of passion as He mentioned. It is the same source in every worshipper. Allah led him astray, i.e. confused him in respect to a knowledge that every worshipper only worships his own passion, and only seeks to worship his passion whether or not it agrees with the command of the Shari'a.

The complete gnostic is the one who sees that every idol is a locus of Allah's tajalli in which He is worshipped. For that reason, they are all called "god" in spite of having a particular name of a stone, tree, animal, man, star, or angel. This is the nature of the personality in it. Divinity is a rank which the worshipper imagines it to have, and it is the rank of his idol. In reality, it is a locus for the tajalli of Allah belonging to the sight of this particular worshipper devoted to this idol in this particular locus of tajalli.

This is why some of those who did not recognize an ignorant statement said, "We only worship them so that they may bring us nearer to Allah" (39:3) although they called them "god", as they said, "Has he turned all the gods into One God? That is truly astonishing." (38:5) They do not deny Him, rather they are amazed. They stop at the multiplicity of possible forms and the ascription of divinity to them. That is why the Messenger came and called them to one God who is recognized and not witnessed by their witnessing. They confuse Him with them and believe in Him when they say, "We only worship them so that they may bring us nearer to Allah" by their knowledge of those forms in stones. This is why the proof went against them when He said, "Say: Name them!" and they only named them by what they know those names to have in reality.

As for those who recognize the matter for what it is, they manifest the form of denying what is worshipped in the way of forms because their rank is in knowledge, and their rank is in accord with their being based on the principle of the moment, since they know that the moment is one of the mighty places of the tajalli of Allah in which He gives tajalli at each moment by some of His attributes. This is why time (ad-Dahr) is one of Allah's Names. The Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Do not curse time, for time is Allah!" At every moment, people are overcome by the principle of the quality in which He gives tajalli at that particular moment. The Messenger who is sent in that moment is the greatest manifestation of the perfection of that quality. He calls creation to Allah, manifested by tajalli in him, by obedience to him, which is obedience to Allah, as Allah says, "Whoever obeys the Messenger has obeyed Allah." (4:80) This is why it is obligatory to trust in him and obey him.

However, the gnostics know that they do not worship the forms themselves. Rather, they worship Allah in them according to the power of the tajalli which they know of these forms. The one who denies and has no knowledge of what Allah has manifested in tajalli is ignorant of this. The complete gnostic veils himself from the Prophet and Messenger and their heirs. He commands himself to leave that form which the Messenger of the moment left in order to follow the Messenger desiring Allah's love for them by His words, "Say: if you love Allah, then follow me and Allah will love you." (3:31) He called on a God to whom one has recourse and Who is known in respect to the whole and is not witnessed, "nor do the eyes perceive Him, but He perceives the eyes" (6:103) by His lutf and His diffusion in the source of things. The eyes do not perceive Him as they do not perceive their spirits which govern their shapes and outward forms. "...He is the Latif, the All-Aware."

Experience is tasting, and tasting is tajalli. Tajalli occurs in forms. They must be and it must be, and the one who sees Him by his passion must worship Him, if you only knew! Allah possesses the goal of the path.

25: The Seal of the Wisdom of Sublimity in the Word of Musa (Moses)

The wisdom of the killing of the male children in respect to Musa was in order to give him the support of the life of each of those killed for his sake because each of them was killed for being Musa. There is no ignorance, so the life of the one killed for his sake had to return to Musa. It is pure life in the natural state (fitra). The desires of the self have not soiled it; rather, it is in its natural state of "Yes (bala)." (1) Musa was the sum of the lives of those killed for being him. All that was prepared for the murdered ones in the way of the predisposition of their spirits was in Musa, peace be upon him. This is a divine favour to Musa which no one before him had.

The wisdoms of Musa are numerous. If Allah wills, I will enumerate them in this chapter according to what the divine command puts into my mind. This is the first about which I shall speak in this chapter.

Musa was only born being a synthesis of many spirits. He was a concentration of effective forces since the young have an effect on the old. Do you not see how the child has an effect on the older person by the special quality the child has? The older person descends from his leading position to play with the child and rock him in his arms and to show himself at the child's level of intellect he descends to the level of the child's intellect. He is under subjugation even though he is not aware of it. He occupies himself with instructing and protecting the child, seeing to his needs and consoling him so that the child is not distressed.

All this is part of the effect of the young on the old. That is due to the strength of his station. The young has a new covenant with his Lord because he has newly come into being. The old person is further from Him. Whoever is nearer to Allah subjects whoever is further away from Him, just as the elite of the near angels subject the further ones. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, used to expose himself to the rain when it came down and to uncover his head so that it would fall on him. He said that it has a new covenant with Allah. Look at this recognition of Allah on the part of this Prophet! What is more glorious, more sublime and clearer than this? The rain subjected the best of men due to its proximity to its Lord. That is a likeness of the Messenger on whom the revelation descends. The rain called him by its own state, (2) and so he exposed himself to the rain in order to receive from it what it brought from his Lord. If he had not received this divine benefit from it by the rain, he would not have exposed himself to it. This is the message of water from which Allah has fashioned every living thing (3) - so understand! As for the wisdom of Musa being put into the ark and then cast into the river, the ark (tâbût) is his human nature (nâsût). The river is what he received of knowledge through his body by what the power of discernment and the sensory imaginative faculties accorded him. Only by the existence of this elemental body does the human self have these faculties or their like. When the self comes to this body and is commanded to freely dispose of it and manage it, Allah gives it these faculties as instruments by which it obtains what Allah wills that it obtain in the management of this ark which contains the sakina (4) of the Lord. Musa was cast into the river in order to receive various knowledges by these faculties. Thus Allah taught him that the spirit which manages him is the ruler. He is only managed by it. It gives him the command of these faculties of phenomenal being which are in this nâsût that is designated by the ark in the field of indications and wisdoms.

Allah manages the universe in the same way, and it is only managed by it or by its form. It is only managed by Him inasmuch as the arrival of the one begotten depends upon its being brought into existence by the begetter. Caused things depend on their causes, proven things depend on their proofs, and true things depend on their realities. All of this is part of the universe, and it is Allah's management of it, and he only manages by it.

As for our statement, "or by its form," I mean the form of the universe, and by it I mean the Most Beautiful Names and sublime attributes by which Allah is named and described. Nothing of a name by which He is called has reached us but that we found the meaning and spirit of that name in the universe. The universe is also only managed by the form of the universe.

For that reason, the Prophet said in respect of the creation of Adam who is the blueprint which gathers all the attributes of the Divine Presence which is the essence, the attributes and the actions: "Allah created Adam in His form." His form is only the Divine Presence. In this noble epitome, which is the Perfect Man, He brought into existence all the Divine Names and the realities of that which is outside of him in the Macrocosm separate from him. He made Adam a spirit (rûh) for the universe, and so He subjected to him the high and the low through the perfection of his form. As there is nothing in the universe that "does not glorify Allah's praise," (5) in the same way, there is nothing in the world which is not subject to this man according to what the reality of his form accords him. Allah says, "He has made everything that is in the heavens and the earth subservient to you. It is all from Him." (22:65) All that is in the universe is subject to man. He who knows that from his knowledge is the Perfect Man. He who is ignorant of that is the Animal Man.

The form of casting Musa into the ark and then casting the ark into the river is outwardly a form of destruction. Inwardly, it was his rescue from being killed. He was brought to life as the self is brought to life by knowledge from the death of ignorance as Allah says, "Is someone who was dead (i.e. by ignorance) and whom We brought to life (with knowledge) and supplied with a light by which to walk among the people (which is guidance) the same as someone who is in utter darkness (in being astray) unable to emerge from it (i.e. will never be guided)?" (6) In itself the matter has no end at which it stops.

Guidance is that man is guided to bewilderment (hayra). He knows that the business is bewilderment. Bewilderment is being unsettled and movement. Movement is life. There is no non-movement nor death. There is existence and not non-existence. It is the same with the water which gives life to the earth. Its movement is His word, "so it quivers" and conceives, "and swells" with pregnancy, "and sprouts plants in beautiful pairs." (7) It only gives birth to what resembles it, i.e. has a nature like it. It has being linked in pairs (zawjiya) which is the state of being doubled by what is born from it and what appears from it.

Similarly, the existence of Allah has multiplicity and the many Names. It is this or that according to what appears from it of the universe which demands the realities of the Divine Names by its development. They are doubled by it and stand in opposition to the unity of multiplicity. It is one by source in respect to its essence, as the primal substance (hayûla) is a single source in respect to its essence, while it has many forms which it supports by its essence. It is the same with Allah through the forms of tajalli which are manifested from Him. So the locii of the tajalli are the forms of the universe, in spite of the intelligible unity (ahadiyya). Look at the excellence of this divine instruction which Allah gives by granting its recognition to whoever He wishes among His slaves.

When the family of Pharaoh found him in the river by the tree, Pharaoh called him Musa. Mu is water in Coptic and sha is tree. He named him by where he found him, for the ark stopped by the tree in the river. Pharaoh wanted to kill him. His wife, speaking by divine articulation in what she said to Pharaoh about Musa since Allah had created her for perfection as Allah said about her when He testified that she and Maryam, daughter of 'Imran, have the perfection which men have (8) - said, "he may be a source of delight for me and for you." (28:9) She would be consoled by him with the perfection which she received as we have said.

The consolation of Pharaoh was with the belief Allah gave him when he was drowning. So Allah took him pure and purified. There was no impurity in him since He took him in his belief before he had acquired any wrong actions. Islam effaces what was before it. He made him a sign of His concern so that none might despair of the mercy of Allah, for "no one despairs of solace from Allah except for the unbelievers." (12:87) If Pharaoh been of those who despair, he would not have embarked on belief. Musa, peace be upon him, was, as the wife of Pharaoh said, "a source of delight for me and for you. Do not kill him. It may well be that he will be of use to us." That is what happened. Allah gave them use of Musa, although they were not aware that he was a prophet who would destroy the kingdom of Pharaoh and his family.

When Allah protected him from Pharaoh, his mother's heart was freed of the anxiety which had befallen her. Then Allah forbade him to be suckled until he had received his mother's breast, so she suckled him that Allah might complete her joy. The knowledge of the roads (sharâ'i) is like that. It is as Allah said, "to each We have made a road," (5:48) i.e. a path (tariq), "and a direction (minhaj)" from that path. This statement is an indication of the root from which he came (minhuja). It is his food as the tree has branches and yet is only nourished by its root. What is haram in one Shari'a can be halal in another Shari'a - I mean in a certain form it can be halal, while in the heart of the matter it is not really the same as what passed because the matter is new creation, not repetition. This is what we instruct you! It is referred to in connection with Musa when the wet-nurses were made haram.

In reality, the one who suckled him, not the one who bore him, is his mother. The mother of birth carried him in regard to the trust. He is formed within her and fed by her menstrual blood without any volition on her part in that, so that does not come from her benevolence towards him. He is only fed by what would destroy her or make her ill had he not been nourished on it, or had that blood not gone out of her. The embryo is a gift to its mother since it feeds on what would cause her harm had that blood remained with her and not gone out of her, or had not the embryo been nourished on it.

Suckling is not the same. By her suckling, she intends to give him life and to sustain him. Allah gave that to Musa in the mother who bore him. No woman outside of his mother by birth had any right over him that she also might find consolation in bringing him up and watching him grow in her room, and so she was not sad.

Allah saved him from the grief of the ark, so he pierced natural darkness by what Allah gave him of divine knowledge, while he did not depart from nature. He tested him with many trials (9) and gave him experience in many places so that he might realize patience in himself in the trials Allah gave him.

The first of Allah's trials was the killing of the Copt which Allah inspired him to do and gave him success in his secret yet he did not know this. However, Musa did not feel any anxiety over killing him, although he was unsure until the command of his Lord told him, since the Prophet is inwardly protected without being aware of it until he is informed, until transmission comes to him. For this reason, al-Khidr showed him the killing of the boy, (10) so Musa criticized the killing but did not remember how he had killed the Copt. Al-Khidr told him, "I did not do it of my own volition," (18:82) and he informed him of his rank before he told him that his movement was protected in reality, but he was not aware of it.

Al-Khidr also showed him the piercing of the ship. Outwardly it was destruction, but inwardly it was rescue from the hand of the tyrant. He made that an analogy of the ark which was in the river its outward aspect was destruction, while inwardly it was rescue, for his mother did it fearing the hand of the tyrant, who was Pharaoh, that he might not kill Musa in captivity. She looked at him with the revelation Allah had inspired in her while she was not aware of it. She felt in herself that she would suckle him. When she feared for him, she cast him into the river because, as the proverb says, "What the eye does not see does not afflict the heart." She did not fear for him with the fear of the witnessing of the eye, and she was not sad with the sorrow of seeing him. It came over her thoughts that perhaps Allah would return him to her, for she had a good opinion of Him. She lived by this thought in herself and by the hope which was opposite fear and despair. When she was inspired to do this, she said, "Perhaps he is the Messenger who will destroy Pharaoh and the Copts." She lived and took joy in this, which was illusion and thought in respect of herself, but, in the heart of the matter, it is knowledge.

When they searched for Musa (after he had killed the Copt), he left in flight, fearful outwardly and in the meaning, it was love of deliverance for movement is always by love, but the onlooker is veiled from it by other causes, which are not the movement. This is because the root is the movement of the universe from non-existence which was immobile in existence. That is why it is said that the matter is movement from immobility. The movement which is the existence of the universe is the movement of love. The Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, said, quoting Allah, "I was a hidden treasure, therefore I wanted (lit. loved) to be known." (11)

If it had not been for this love, the universe would not have appeared in its source. Its movement from non-existence to existence is the movement of the love of the One who brings into existence for this purpose. The universe also loves to witness itself in existence as it was witnessed in immutability. Thus by every aspect, the movement from immutable non-existence to the existence of the sources is a movement of love, both in respect of Allah and in respect to itself.

Perfection is loved for itself. Allah's knowledge of Himself is His, since He is independent of the worlds. It belongs only to Him. The perfection of the rank of knowledge only remains by the in-time knowledge which comes from these sources. When the sources of the universe exist, then the forms of perfection appear with timeless and in-time knowledge. Thus the rank of knowledge is perfected by two aspects.

In the same way, the ranks of existence are perfected. Existence from it is before-time and not before-time, which is in-time. Pre-temporal (azali) time is the existence of Allah by Himself, and non-pre-temporal-time is the existence of Allah by the forms of the immutable universe. It is called in-time because it manifests some parts to others. He is manifest to Himself by the forms of the universe, and so existence is perfected.

The movement of the universe is by love of perfection, so understand! Do you not see how what the Divine Names bring into existence is breathed from the absence of the manifestation of their effects in a entity called the universe? It loves rest (12) which is only reached by the existence of form, high and low. Thus it is confirmed that movement occurs by love. The only movement in the entire cosmos is by love.

Among the 'ulama' are those who know that and those who are veiled by the nearer cause because it rules their state (hâl) and overpowers them. Musa was aware of his fear by what occurred through his killing the Copt. That fear implied love of deliverance from killing. So he fled by fear. In the meaning, he fled when he loved deliverance from Pharaoh and his deeds. He mentioned the nearest cause which he was aware of at that moment, which is like the form of the body of man, and love of deliverance is contained in it as the body contains the spirit which manages it.

The Prophets had the language of the outward with which they addressed people in general and on which they relied to make the one who listened understand what was said. The Messengers make allowances for people in general by their knowledge of the rank of the people of understanding. It is as the Prophet, peace be upon him, said about gifts, "I give to this man, while another man is more beloved to me than him for I fear that Allah might throw him down into the Fire." He made allowances for those whose intellect and discernment are weak and who are overcome by greed and nature.

Similarly, what they brought of knowledges, they brought wearing a robe (13) which nearer to the understanding, so that the one who has no "diving" might stop at the robe and say, "How excellent this robe is!" and he will see it as the limit of rank. Because of what this robe from the king demands, the one with subtle understanding, the one who dives for the pearls of wisdom, looks at the quality of the robe and its type of material. By it, he knows the degree of the one it covers, and so he stumbles onto a knowledge which no one else has obtained from those without knowledge of such matters.

Then the Prophets and Messengers and heirs knew that in this world and in their communities, there are those who, in this manner, express themselves in the outward language which the elite and common share. The one who is elite understands of it what the common understand, and more, inasmuch as it is valid that he be called elite. He is distinguished from the blind. Those who have obtained knowledges are content with this. This is the wisdom of his words, "I fled from you when I was in fear of you," (14) but he did not say, "I fled from you by love of safety and well-being."

Musa came to Madyan and found two women and got water for them without being paid for it. Then he turned away to the divine shade and said, "O my Lord, I am truly in need of any good You have in store for me." (28:24) He made the source of his getting water the same as the good which Allah sent down to him, and he described himself as being in need of Allah in the good which he had. Al-Khidr showed him the setting-up of the wall without wage, but Musa chided him for it. So al-Khidr reminded him of his drawing water without wage, and other things which were not mentioned. The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, wished that Musa had remained silent and had not left him so that Allah would have related more about them.

Al-Khidr alerted Musa to the fact that what had come to him and would come to him was by the command of Allah and His will which it is impossible to contradict. Knowledge of that is one of the prerogatives of wilaya. As for the Messenger, He might not acquaint him with it, for it is the secret of the decree.(15) If He had acquainted him with that, it might have been a reason for his lassitude in conveying what he was commanded to convey. Allah withholds the knowledge of this from some of the Messengers as a mercy to them from Him. He did not withhold it from our Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, because of the strength of his state. This is why our Prophet said, "I call on Allah by inner sight." (75:14)

By this he knew what Musa had succeeded in had been without knowledge on his part. If it had been from knowledge, Musa would not have criticized what al-Khidr did, since Allah had testified before Musa as to al-Khidr's purity and justice. In spite of this, Musa was heedless of the fact that Allah had made him pure, and of the conditions set down for following him. This was a mercy for us if we forget the command of Allah. If Musa had known that, al-Khidr would not have said to him, "What you have never encompassed in your knowledge," meaning I have a knowledge which you have not received by tasting as you have a knowledge which I do not know. He was just.

As for the wisdom of his parting from him, it is because Allah said of the Messenger, "Take what the Messenger brings you, and avoid what he prohibits you." (59:7) The 'ulama' of Allah who recognize this quality of the Message and the Messenger stop at this statement. Al-Khidr knew that Musa was the Messenger of Allah. He regarded what came from him to preserve the adab which is due to the Messengers. Musa said to him, "If I ask you about anything after this, then you should no longer keep me company." So he forbade al-Khidr to keep his company. When that occurred for the third time, al-Khidr therefore said, "This is where you and I part company," Musa did not tell him, "Do not do it," nor did he seek to keep him company for he knew the level of the rank he was in when he spoke of the prohibition against keeping him company. Musa was silent, and the parting took place.

Look at the perfection of these two men in knowledge and the completion of divine adab as right, and the justice of al-Khidr, peace be upon him, in what he acknowledged to Musa when he said, "I have a knowledge which Allah has taught me which you do not know, and you have a knowledge which Allah has taught me which you do not know." This information which al-Khidr imparted to Musa was a remedy for the wound inflicted on him in his words, "How indeed could you bear with patience something you have not encompassed in your knowledge?" (18:68) although he knew the sublimity of his rank with the message, and al-Khidr did not have this rank.

This appeared in the community of Muhammad in the hadith regarding the fertilization of the date tree. The Prophet, peace be upon him, told his Companions, "You know more about the matters of your daily life."16 There is no doubt that the knowledge of the thing is better than ignorance of it. Allah praises Himself, saying, "He has knowledge of all things." The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, acknowledged to his Companions that they knew more about the exigencies of this world than him because he had no experience of them. It is knowledge of tasting (dhawq) and experience, and the Prophet, peace be upon him, had not occupied himself with this sort of knowledge. Rather, he was occupied with what was more important. I have informed you about a great adab by which will benefit you if you occupy yourself with it.

Musa's statement, "My Lord gave me right judgement," (26:21) means the khilafah, "and made me one of the Messengers," means the message. Not every Messenger is a Khalif. The Khalif has a sword, duties and governance. The Messenger is not the same rather, he transmits what he has been sent to transmit. If he does battle and defends with the sword, then he is both Khalif and Messenger.

As for the wisdom of Pharaoh's question regarding divine whatness (mâhiya) when he said, "What is the Lord of the worlds?" (26:23) that question did not arise from ignorance, but it was posed in order to test Musa and to see what answer he would give when he claimed that he had a message from his Lord. Pharaoh knew the rank of the Messengers in knowledge of Allah and he wanted to test Musa's answer to ascertain the validity of his claim. In order to inform those present, he invited an answer which would have been misleading as far as they were concerned since they did not know what Pharaoh himself knew about the question. Musa answered him with the answer of those who have knowledge of the matter. Then Pharaoh, in order to preserve his position, asserted that Musa had not answered his question. So because of the inadequacy of their understanding, it seemed clear to those who were present that Pharaoh knew more than Musa. For this reason, when Musa answered him with what was not appropriate and outwardly it is not an answer to what he was asked about and Pharaoh knew that he would only give that answer, Pharaoh then said to his companions, "Your Messenger" who was sent to you "is mad" since the knowledge of what I question him about is veiled from him (17) since it is inconceivable that it be known at all.

The question is valid. The question of the what-ness is a question about the reality of what is asked about - it must be real in itself. As for those who make definitions which consist of category and genus, these are matters shared by various things. Whoever has no category must have a reality in Himself which belongs to no other. The question is invalid in the school of the People of Allah, sound knowledge and sound intellect. The only answer to it is the answer Musa gave.

Here is a great secret! He mentioned the "act" in giving the answer to the one who asked for a definition of essence. He made the essential definition the source of the attribution to what appeared of Him in the forms of the universe, or what appeared in Him of the forms of the universe. In answer to, "What is the Lord of the worlds?" he said that He is the One in whom the forms of the universe are manifest on high which is the heaven - and below - which is the earth, "if you but have certainty," (18) or He who is manifest by them.

When Pharaoh told his companions that Musa was mad, (majnûn) in the sense that he was possessed, Musa added to the elucidation in order to inform Pharaoh of his rank in divine knowledge because he knew that Pharaoh already knew that. Musa said, "The Lord of the East and the West," bringing what was manifest and what was hidden, in the outward and the inward, "and what between them is" which is Allah's words, "He has knowledge of everything," "if you have intellect," (19) i.e. if you possess qualification since this comes from intellect.

The first answer is for those who are certain, and they are the people of unveiling and existence. Musa said, "If you have certainty," i.e. if you are the people of unveiling and existence. I have given you knowledge of what you are already certain about in your witnessing and existence. If you are not of this category, I have answered you in the second answer: if you are among the people of intellect and qualification, and you limit Allah according to what the proofs of your intellects accord.

Thus Musa manifested both aspects in order to inform Pharaoh about his question and his veracity. Musa knew that Pharaoh knew that because he asked about the what-ness of Allah.

He knew that his question was not couched in the language the ancients used in their questioning by means of what. That is why he answered him. If he had known anything else from him, he would have been mistaken in the question. Musa treated that about which he was asked as the source of the universe, and Pharaoh addressed him by this language (20) although the people present were not aware of that.

Pharaoh said to him, "If you take any god other than me, I will certainly make you one of the imprisoned." (26:29) The letter sin in prison (sijn) is one of the letters of increase, (21) meaning I will veil you, for you answered by what supported me so that I might say the same to you. If you say to me, "O Pharaoh! I do not I do not recognize your threat to me while the source is but one, so how can you separate?" Then Pharaoh replied, "The ranks are separate, but the source is not separate and it is not divided in its existence. My rank right now is power over you by actual fact, O Musa! I am you by the source and other than you by rank!"

When Musa understood that from him, he gave him his due in respect to himself and told him, "You will not be able to do that." Pharaoh's rank gave him power and influence over Musa because Allah is in the rank of Pharaoh in respect of the outward form which has authority over the rank in which Musa appeared in that assembly.

Therefore Musa told him that Allah had manifested a barrier to his hostility against Musa. He said, "Even if I were to bring you something undeniable?" Pharaoh could only reply, "Produce it then, if you are someone telling the truth" so that Pharaoh would not appear to be unjust among those of his nation who were weak-minded. They had doubts about him, and they were the group Pharaoh made unsteady. However, they obeyed Pharaoh because they were a corrupt people; (22) that is, lacking sound intellects' rejection of taking Pharaoh's claims literally. The intellect stops at a certain limit, and only those of unveiling and certainty can cross that limit. This is why in his answer, Musa first addressed those of certainty and then address those of the intellect.

"So he drew down his staff ('asa)" (26:32) which is the form with which Pharaoh defied (23) ('asa) Musa when he refused to answer his call. "And there it was, unmistakably a snake," i.e. an evident snake. Thus rebellion, which is evil, changed into obedience, which is good, as Allah says, "Allah will transform their evil deeds into good deeds," (25:70) meaning in judgement. Here the judgement manifested a differentiated source in a single substance (jawhar) so it is a staff, a snake, and a manifest serpent. It devoured its likes among the snakes in the form of a snake, and the staffs in the form of a staff. The proof of Musa overcame the proofs of Pharaoh in the form of staffs, snakes and ropes. The sorcerers had ropes, but Musa did not have a rope. The "rope" is the small hill; (24) that is, their powers in relation to the power of Musa is as the hills are to the lofty mountains.

When the sorcerers saw that, they recognized Musa's rank in knowledge and they saw that he possessed a power which was not mortal. If it had been within the power of a mortal, it would only belong to someone who could distinguish sure knowledge from imagination and illusion. So they believed in "the Lord of the Worlds, the Lord of Musa and Harun" - that is, the Lord to whom Musa and Harun summoned them because they knew that the people understood that they were not being called to Pharaoh. Pharaoh was in the position of authority, and he was the master of the moment since he was the Khalif with the sword, even though he broke the customary divine laws when he said, "I am your Lord most high" - i.e. since all are lords, (25) I am the highest of them through the power which you have outwardly given me over you. The sorcerers knew that he spoke the truth in what he said, and they did not deny it. They affirmed that to Pharaoh, and said, "You only judge in this passing life, so judge as you like, for the kingdom is yours." So the statement of Pharaoh, "I am your Lord most high," was valid. Although the source is from Allah, the form is Pharaoh's. He cut off the hands and feet, and crucified through a real source in false form in order to attain the ranks which are only attained by that act.

There is no way to neutralize causes because the source-forms necessitate them. They only appear in existence by the form on which they are based at the source since "there is no changing the words of Allah." (10:64) The words of Allah are not other than the sources of existent things. Timelessness is ascribed to Him in respect to their permanence, and in-time ness is ascribed to them in respect of their existence and appearance. Thus we say, a certain man or guest happened (26) to be with us today." That does not mean that he did not have any existence before this event. For that reason, Allah says about His Mighty Word which is timeless, "No reminder (dhikr) from their Lord comes to them lately renewed (27) without their listening to it as if it were a game," (21:2) and "but no fresh (28) reminder reaches them from the All- Merciful, without their turning away from it." (26:5) The Merciful only brings mercy, and whoever turns away from mercy advances the punishment which is the absence of mercy.

As for the words of Allah, "but their belief when they saw Our violent force was of no use to them. That is the pattern Allah has always followed with His slaves," (29) (40:85) that did not mean that it did not profit them in the Next World through His exception, "except for the people of Yunus." He meant that that did not prevent them being punished in this world. For that reason, Pharaoh was seized in spite of the existence of his belief even though his affair was that of someone who is certain that his death is approaching. The circumstances accord that he was not certain that he was going to die because he saw the believers walking on the dry path which had appeared when Musa struck the sea with his staff. Pharaoh was not certain that he would perish since he believed that he would not die until the moment actually reached him. He believed in the One in whom the Tribe of Israel believed, in certainty of his deliverance.

It was indeed certain, but it was in a form other than the one he wanted. He was saved from the punishment of the Next World in himself and his body was saved as Allah says, "Today We will save your body that you might be a sign for those after you," (10:92) because, if his form had vanished, his people might have said that he had gone into occultation. His known form appeared as a corpse that it might be known that it was really him. Deliverance was encompassed both in the senses and in the meaning.

The one who has the word of the punishment in the Other World realized for him (30) will not believe, even if every ayat had been brought to him, "so that they might see the painful punishment," that is, taste the punishment of the Next World. Pharaoh left this class of people. This is the literal meaning of what the text of the Qur'an brought us. We say, and the matter belongs to Allah, that the fixed idea which the common people have regarding the wretchedness of Pharaoh is not based on anything in the divine text. As for his family, that is another judgement. This is not the place to mention it.

Know that Allah only takes someone while he believes that is, affirms what divine transmissions bring, and I mean those who are consciousness at death. This is why dislikes sudden death and being killed while unaware is disliked. The definition of sudden death is that the incoming breath goes out and the outcoming breath does not come in. This is sudden death and when that happens, one is not conscious of death.

It is the same if a man is killed unawares by a blow from behind on the back of the neck. He is then taken with whatever belief or disbelief he possesses at that moment. For that reason, the Prophet said, "One will be gathered in the state in which one dies," as one is taken in whatever one is doing at the time. The one who is conscious of death is only the one who sees it coming. He believes what he sees. He is only taken in what he is doing because that is an existent expression connected to time by the circumstances. We distinguish between the unbeliever who is conscious at death and the unbeliever either killed while unaware or who dies suddenly as we have said in the definition of sudden death.

As for the wisdom of tajalli and the discourse on the form of the fire, this was because it was the object of Musa's desire. Allah gave him a tajalli in what he was searching for so that Musa would turn to Him and not turn away. If Allah had given the tajalli in other than the form which he was seeking, Musa would have turned away because his interest was concentrated on a particular goal. If he had turned away, his action would have rebounded on him, and Allah would have turned away from him. Musa was the chosen one and the one brought near. When Allah brings someone near to Him, He gives him a tajalli in the object he desires, without him knowing it.

Like the Fire of Musa which he saw as what he needed.
It was Allah,
but he did not perceive it.

26: The Seal of the Wisdom of What One Turns to (as-Samad) in the Word of Khalid

As for the wisdom of Khalid ibn Sinan, (1) by his call he manifested the Prophethood of the interspace. He claimed that he would tell them about what happens after death. He commanded that he should be disinterred and questioned in order that he might report that the judgement in the Interspace occurs in the form of the life of this world. Thus it would be known that all the Messengers spoke the truth in what they related in this life regarding what happens after death. Khalid's goal was that all the world would believe in what the Messengers brought so that there would be mercy for all. He was honored by his Prophethood being near the time of the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace. He knew that Allah had sent Muhammad as a mercy to the worlds, but Khalid was not a Messenger. He wanted to receive a generous share of this mercy contained in the message of Muhammad. He was not commanded to convey the message, but he wanted to have that share in the Interspace so that there would be stronger knowledge about the creation, and for this reason his people squandered him.

The Messenger of Allah described them as having squandered their Prophet because they did not do what he wanted them to do. Did Allah give him the reward for what he wanted? There is no doubt and no disagreement that he had the reward of what he wished, but there is doubt and disagreement about the reward of the goal. Is wishing for it the same in the Next World as its occurrence even though it did not occur or not? In the Shari'a, equality is not supported in many places such as in the case of the one who performs the prayer in the group. (2) The one who prays it in the group has a reward from the presence of the group. He is like the person who, in spite of poverty, desires to be able to give charity as the people of wealth and property do. He has the like of their rewards, but the like of their rewards can be in their intentions or their deeds. The people had both the intention and the action. The Prophet, peace be upon him, did not prescribe both of them, nor one of them, and outwardly they are not the same. For that reason, Khalid ibn Sinan sought the proclamation to confirm for him the station of joining both matters so that he would receive two rewards. Allah knows best.

Notes to Chapter 26:

1. Al-Qashani, the commentator, says that Khalid lived in Aden, and was a man of great himma who was overcome in the contemplation of divine unity. One day a great fire appeared from a cave among his people. It destroyed the crops and the livestock, and the people called on him to protect them from it. He struck the fire with his staff, saying, "Away! Away!" until it became cold and retreated to the cave. Then he told his people that he would enter the cave in order to extinguish the fire, and he told them to call him after three full days had passed. Should he call him before that, he would come out and die. If they were patient, he would emerge in good health.

They waited two days, and then Shaytan made them restless, and doubts came to them and they were afraid that he might have been destroyed. They shouted to him. He emerged from the cave with his hand on his head from the pain their shouting had caused him. He told them, "You have killed me and squandered my word and my covenant." He then told them of his death and commanded them to bury him and then watch for forty days. Then, he said, a flock of sheep led by a donkey with slit ears and its tail cut off would come to them. When it stood opposite his grave, they were to disinter him and he would rise and tell them of the true state of things after death from witnessing and vision so that all creation would receive certainty as to what the Messenger related. Then he died and they buried him.

They waited until the forty days had passed. The flock of sheep came led by a donkey with slit ears. It stopped opposite his grave, so they understood that they should disinter Khalid as he had commanded them so that he might inform them as to the truth of the Prophets. Some of his older sons were adverse to that and said that it would shame them among the Arabs and that they would be called, "the sons of the disinterred one." There was the vehemence of the Jahiliya in that. They squandered their legacy and destroyed him. After the Prophet Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, was sent, a daughter of Khalid came to him, and he said to her, "Greetings to you, O daughter of a Prophet whose people squandered him!"

2. His Prophethood did not appear in this world.

27: The Seal of the Unique Wisdom in the Word of Muhammad

Muhammad's wisdom is uniqueness (fardiya) because he is the most perfect existent creature of this human species. For this reason, the command began with him and was sealed with him. He was a Prophet while Adam was between water and clay, (1) and his elemental structure is the Seal of the Prophets. The first singular is three, and what is more than this firstness of individuals comes from three. The Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, is the surest proof of his Lord, so he was given all the words, (2) which are everything that is named by the names of Adam. (3) He resembles the proof in its threefoldness, and the proof is a proof of itself. Then his reality grants the first uniqueness which is threefold in structure. For that reason, speaking about the domain of love which is the root of existence, he said, "I was made to love three things in your world," (4) because of what this world has of threefoldness. Then he mentioned women, and perfume, and that the coolness of his eye was in the prayer.

The Prophet began by mentioning women and ended with the prayer. That is because woman is part of man in the root of the manifestation of her source, and because man's recognition of himself preceded his recognition of his Lord. That is why the Prophet, peace be upon him, said, "Whoever knows himself knows his Lord." If you wish, you can say that this tradition is the forbidding of gnosis and stating the inability to attain to Him - and that is a permissible statement; and, if you wish, you can say that it is the affirmation of gnosis. The first is that if you do not know yourself, so you will not know your Lord. The second is that you recognize yourself, so you do recognize your Lord. Muhammad was the clearest proof of his Lord. Every part of the world indicates its root which is its Lord, so understand!

The Prophet was made to love women, so he yearned for them because as the whole yearns for what is part of it. The matter is self-evident through what Allah says regarding this elemental human constitution, "and I breathed My Ruh into him." (15:29; 38:72) Then He described Himself with intensity of yearning to meet those who yearn for Him. He said, "O Dawud! I have intense yearning for them," i.e. those who yearn for Him, and it is a particular encounter. The Prophet said in a hadith about the Dajjal, "None of you will see his Lord until after he dies." (5) Allah must yearn for those near ones - because even though He sees them and wants them to see Him, that encounter is still prevented by man's station. That is like His words "until We know" although He is Knowing. He yearns for this particular attribute which only is achieved existence through death.

By this, He tests their yearning for Him as He said in the hadith of hesitation which concerns this matter, "I do not hesitate in anything I do, but I hesitate to take the breath of My believing slave because he hates death, and I hate to make him die. But He must meet Me." He gave him good news and did not say to him, "he must die" because He did not want to distress him by mentioning death. Man only meets Allah after death as the Prophet says, "None of you will see his Lord until he dies." That is why Allah says, "He must meet Me," for Allah desires the existence of this relationship. He made it clear that He breathed into him some of His spirit (rûh) so He only yearns for him. Do you not see that He created him on His form because he is from His Spirit?

Man's constitution is based on these four elements which are called the "humors" in his body. The combustion of the moisture found in the body occurs from his breath. The spirit of man is fire as regards his constitution. For this reason, Allah only spoke to Musa in the form of fire, (6) and put his need in it. If his constitution had been from nature, (7) then his spirit would have been light. Allah alluded to it with the blowing (nafkh) which indicates that it is from the breath (nafas) of the All-Merciful. It is by this breath, which is the blowing-out that he manifested from Him, and by the predisposition of the one blown into, that combustion is fire and not light. The breath of Allah is hidden in that by which man is man.

From man, He derived a person in his form called "woman". She appeared in his form, and he yearned for her with the longing of that thing has for itself, and she yearned for him with the longing of that thing has for its home. Allah made him love women. Allah loves the one whom He created in His form, and He made the luminous angels, in spite of the power of their might and their station and the sublimity of their natural constitution, prostrate to him. (8) From this comes the affinity which occurs in the form which man and woman share, which is like that between Allah and man. The form has the greatest affinity, as well as the most glorious and perfect. It makes a pair that is, doubles the existent belonging to Allah, as the woman, by her existence, doubles man, and makes him one of a pair. So three appeared: Allah, man and woman. Man yearns for his Lord who is the origin as woman yearns for man.

His Lord made him love women as Allah loves the one who is in His form. Love only occurred by the One by whom he is formed. His love was for the One he was formed by, and He is Allah. This is why the Prophet said, "He made me love...", and he did not say, "I loved" as coming from himself because his love is connected to his Lord in Whose form he is. In his love for his wife, he loves her by Allah's love for him as a divine nature. (9)

When a man loves a woman, he desires union, that is, the goal of union which exists in love. In the elemental form, there is no greater union than marriage. (10) By this appetite encompasses all parts. For that reason, complete ritual washing is prescribed after intercourse. Purification envelops him as annihilation in the woman was complete in the obtainment of appetite. Allah is very jealous of His slave if He believes that he finds pleasure in other than Him. So man purifies himself by ritual washing in order to return to Him in whom he was annihilated, since that is all there is.

When man witnesses Allah in women, his witnessing is in the passive; when he witnesses Him in himself, regarding the appearance of woman from Him, he witnesses Him in the active. When he witnesses Him from himself without the presence of any form from him, his witnessing is in the passive directly from Allah without any intermediary. So his witnessing of Allah in the woman is the most complete and perfect because he witnesses Allah inasmuch as He is both active and passive. Regarding himself, He is passive in particular. For this reason, the Prophet, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, loved women because of the perfection of the witnessing of Allah in them since one does not ever witness Allah free of matter. Allah by His essence is independent of the worlds. So from this aspect, the business is impossible, yet witnessing only occurs in matter. The witnessing of Allah in women is the greatest and most perfect witnessing. The greatest union is marriage.

It is like the projection of His will on the one He created in His form in order to create him. He sees His form in him, rather, He sees Himself. He fashioned him and balanced him and breathed into him of His spirit (rûh) which is His breath. Outwardly he is creation, and inwardly he is Allah. For this reason, Allah describes Himself with having management of this frame. He "directs the whole affair from the heaven," which is the height of the earth, "to earth," (32:5) which is the lowest of the low, because it is the lowest of all the elements.

He called them women (an-nisâ') which is a plural which does not have a singular form. For that reason, he said, "He made me love three things in your world: women..." and he did not say, "woman". He took note of the fact that they came after him in existence. The word an-nisa' also means postponement. Allah says, "The month postponed is an increase in disbelief," (9:37) and the sale of "nasi'a" is said to be by postponement, that is, by credit. That is why he said an-nisa'. He loved them only by rank, and they are the place of the passive. They are to him as nature is to Allah in which Allah opened the forms of the world by the projection of the will and the divine command which is marriage in the world of elemental forms, and aspiration (himma) in the world of luminous spirits, as in the order of premises and their meanings through deduction. All of that is the marriage of the first uniqueness in each of these aspects. Whoever loves women in this measure, loves with a divine love. Whoever loves them in respect to natural appetite in particular, deprives himself of the knowledge of this appetite. For him it is a form without a spirit (rûh). That form in the heart of the matter is the essence of a spirit, but it is not witnessed by the one who comes to his wife or any woman by pure gratification, and he does not perceive the one it is for even so, he has no knowledge of himself, as others have no knowledge of him, since he has not been verbally named so that he could be known.

One of them said:
It is confirmed with people that I am a passionate lover, although they do not know the object of my passion.

It is the same with the one who loves gratification - he loves the place in which it occurs, being the woman, but the spirit of the question is obscure to him. If he had known it, he would have known by whom he has pleasure and who it is that has pleasure. He would have been perfect.

Similarly, the woman has a lower degree than the man by the words of Allah, "As for men, they have a degree over them." (2:228) The one created on the form is lower in degree than the one who is fashioned in His form, (11) even though he is in His form. This is the degree by which He is distinguished from the form. So Allah is independent of the universe, and He is the first Doer. The form is the second doer, and does not have the firstness which Allah has. Sources are distinguished by ranks. "He gives each thing its creation," (12) as every gnostic gives each thing with a right its due.

That love that Muhammad, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, had for women came from divine love. "Allah gives everything its creation," and that is the source of its truth. He only gave creation to it by merit, so it merits what He called it that is, by the essence of the created thing.

He put women first because they are the place of the passive as nature precedes that which exists from it by means of form. Nature in reality is only the breath of the Merciful. The forms of the universe, high and low, are introduced into it by the diffusion of the breath (nafkha) in the primal substance (jawhar hayulânî), particularly in the world of bodies. As for its diffusion by the existence of the luminous spirits and non-essentials (a'râd), that is another kind of diffusion.

In this tradition, the Prophet put the feminine before the masculine because he meant to attach importance to women. He said, "Three (thalath, the feminine form of the number) and he did not say thalatha (the masculine) with the ha' which is by the number of the masculine since scent (tīb) is one of the three, and it is masculine. The custom among the Arabs is that the masculine takes precedence over the feminine. When they say, "The Fatimas and Zayd went out," they saw kharajû (mas. pl) and do not say kharajna (fem. pl). The masculine, even if it is only one, take precedence over the feminine, even if they are a group. The Prophet was Arab, so he respected the meaning which was intended by showing love for what did not happen through his own love. Then Allah informed him of what he did not know, and Allah's bounty to him was great. (13) The feminine took precedence over the masculine by his word, thalath without ha'. Who knew the realities better than him, may Allah bless him and grant him peace? Who had greater care to observe rights and dues?

Then he placed the seal with what was like the first since it is also feminine (salat, prayer, is feminine), and he placed the masculine between them, as in existence. He began with "women" and ended with "prayer", both of which are feminine while perfume is masculine. The man is between the essence from which he appeared and then the woman appeared from him. So man is between two feminines, the form of the Essence (14) from which he appeared, and a real feminine, woman, who appeared from him. Similarly, women is a real feminine, and the prayer is not a real feminine. Scent is the masculine between the two, as Adam is between the essence from which he has existence and Hawwa' (Eve), who existed from him. If you wish, you can say "attribute (sifa)" which is also feminine. If you wish, you can say, "power (qudra)" and it is feminine. Be of whatever school you wish. You will always find that the feminine takes precedence, even among the people of cause ('illa) who make Allah a cause in the existence of the form, and cause is also feminine.

As for the wisdom of the perfume which he mentioned after women, because women have fragrance in their form, the most fragrant of perfumes is the embrace of the lover as they say in the common example. When the Prophet was created a slave, by the nobility of his origin, he did not lift his head at all to mastery rather, he continued to prostrate himself in humility and to remain passive in spite of who he was until Allah formed from Him what He had intended. He gave him the rank of action in the world of breaths, and the breaths are fragrant scents. So Allah made him love perfume. For that reason, he put perfume after women.

He observed the ranks which belong to Allah in His words, "Raiser of ranks is He, Possessor of the throne" (40:15) by His sitting on it by the name of the All-Merciful. There is none among those that the Throne encompasses but that divine mercy touches him. That is the words of Allah, "My mercy embraces all things," (7:156) and the Throne encompasses everything, and the One who sits on it is the Merciful. By its reality, mercy is diffused through the universe as we explained in another part in this book and in The Makkan Revelations.

Allah put perfume in this marital connection in the innocence of 'A'isha, (15) may Allah be pleased with her! He said, "Corrupt (16) men are for corrupt men, and corrupt men are for corrupt women; and good (17) women are for good men, and good men are for good women. The latter are innocent of what they say." (24:26) He made their scent fragrant because the word is breath, and it is the source of the scent. It goes out with fragrance and putrefaction according to what appears in the form of speech. As it is divine by the nobility of its origin, it is all good, and so it is good. As for what is not praised and is censured, it is good and bad. The Prophet said in respect to the badness of garlic, "It is a plant whose scent I dislike." He did not say, "I dislike it." The source is not disliked, but he disliked what appeared from it.

Dislike for that is either by custom or unsuitability of nature, by something in the Shari'a, or a lack of perfection or something other than what we have mentioned.

Since the command is divided into corrupt and good as we confirmed, he was made to love perfume rather than repulsive odours. He described the angels as being offended by unpleasant odours. He described the angels as being offended by unpleasant odours. Since there is putrefaction in this elemental structure as it is created of "dry clay from mud moulded (or fetid)," (18) so the angels dislike it by essence. The nature of the dung-beetle is offended by the scent of the rose which is one of the pleasant scents. For the dung-beetle, the scent of the rose is not a pleasant scent. If someone has the same sort of nature (as the dung beetle) in meaning and form, the truth offends him when he hears it, and he is gladdened by the false. It is what Allah said, "those who believe in falsehood and reject Allah." (29:52) He described them with loss, and said, "those, they are the losers" who have lost themselves. Whoever does not distinguish goodness from corruption, has no perception.

Allah made the Messenger of Allah, may Allah bless him and grant him peace, love only the good (the perfume) of everything, and there is only that. Can it be conceived that there is a disposition in the universe which only finds good in everything but does not recognize the bad? We say that there is not. We find it in the very root from which the universe appeared which is Allah; we find that He hates and loves. The corrupt is only that which He hates, and the good is only that which He loves. The universe is the form of Allah, and man is in both forms. There is no nature which only perceives one matter in everything - rather, the nature distinguishes the good from the corrupt in spite of the fact that it knows that it is corrupt by tasting and good without tasting. The perception of the good in it diverts him from the sensation of its corruptness. This can happen. As for the removal of the corrupt from the universe that is, from phenomenal being it is not admissible. The mercy of Allah extends to both the corrupt and the good. The corrupt considers itself good, but the good in itself is corrupt. There is nothing but good but that an aspect of its disposition is bad, and vice versa.

As for the third by which uniqueness (fardiyya) is completed, it is the prayer. The Prophet said, "and the coolness of the eye (19) is in the prayer" because it is contemplation. That is because it is intimate discourse between Allah and His slave as Allah says, "Remember Me, and I will remember you." (2:152) It is worship ('ibâda) which is divided in two parts between Allah and His slave one part belongs to Allah and one part to His slave, as has come in sound transmission from Allah in which He says, "I divided the prayer into two parts between Me and My slave. One part is Mine and one part is My slave's, and My slave will receive what he asks for. The slave says, 'In the name of Allah, the All-Merciful, the Most Merciful,' and Allah says, 'My slave has mentioned Me.' Then the slave says, 'Praise belongs to Allah, the Lord of the Worlds,' and Allah says, 'My slave has praised Me.' The slave says, 'The All-Merciful, the Most Merciful,' and Allah says, 'My slave has glorified Me. My slave has given Me authorisation.'" (20) All this part belongs purely to Allah.

"Then the slave says, 'You alone we worship. You alone we ask for help,' and Allah says, 'This is between Me and My slave, and My slave has what he asks for.'" Sharing occurs in this ayat. "The slave then says, 'Guide us in the straight path, the path of those You have blessed, not of those with anger on them nor of the misguided,' and Allah says, 'This is for My slave, and My slave has what he asks for.'" This is purely for His slave as the first part is purely for Allah. The knowledge of this makes the recitation of the Fatiha obligatory. Whoever does not recite it has not prayed the prayer establish between Allah and His slave.

The prayer is then a secret conversation (munajat). It is remembrance/invocation (dhikr). When someone mentions Allah, he sits with Allah and Allah sits with him. It is a sound divine transmission that Allah said, "I sit with the one who mentions Me." (21) Whoever sits with the One he mentions and has sight, sees the One with whom he sits. This is contemplation (mushahada) and vision. If he does not have sight, he does not see Him. Thus the one who prays knows his rank, and whether or not he sees Allah with this vision in the prayer. If he does not see Him, then let him worship Him by belief (iman) as if he saw Him, imagining Him to be in the qibla of his conversation, and let him listen for Allah's reply.

Without a doubt, everyone who prays is an Imam, so the angels pray behind the slave when he prays alone, as is related in tradition. If he is the Imam for his particular world and the angels pray with him, then he has attained the rank of the Messenger in his prayer which is deputyship from Allah. When he says, "Allah hears whoever praises Him," (22) he informs himself and whoever is behind him that Allah has heard him. The angels and those present say, "Our Lord, praise belongs to You."

Allah says on the tongue of the slave, "Allah hears whoever praises Him." Look at the sublimity of the rank of the prayer and where it takes the one who has it! Whoever does not achieve the rank of vision in the prayer has not reached the goal nor does he have the coolness of the eye in it because he does not see the One he addresses. If he does not hear the answer of Allah, he is not one of those who listen. Whoever is not present in the prayer with his Lord, and does not hear nor see Him, is not one who prays at all, and he is not along those "who listen well, having seen the evidence." (30:37)

The prayer is the only form of 'ibada during which one is forbidden to perform any other action. The mention of Allah in it is greater than the words and actions it contains. We mentioned the attribute of the perfect man in the prayer in The Makkan Revelations and his nature, because Allah says that "the prayer precludes indecency and wrongdoing" (29:45) since it is set down in the Shari'a that the one performing the prayer cannot act in anything except this 'ibâda as long as he is in it, and he is called the one the prays (musalli). "The remembrance of Allah is greater still" (29:45) in it that is, the mention which is from Allah to His slave when He answers him in his request, and his praise of Him is greater than the mention of the slave of his Lord in it, because greatness belongs to Allah. (23) This is why He says, "Allah knows what you do," and He says, "He who listen well, having seen the evidence" he gives ear to what Allah mentions in the prayer.

Therefore, since existence is from an intelligible movement which transported the universe from non-existence to existence, the prayer encompasses all movements. There are three movements: vertical, which is the state of standing in the prayer, the horizontal, which is the state of bowing, and the downward movement, which is the state of prostration. The movement of man is vertical, the movement of the animal is horizontal, and the movement of plants is downward. The inanimate does not have a movement from its essence. If a rock moves, it moves by other means than itself.

As for the words of the Prophet, "The coolness of my eye is in the prayer," he did not ascribe the action of putting it there to himself, so Allah gives the one who prays a tajalli which stems from Him, not from the one who prays. If he had not mentioned this attribute from himself, he would have commanded the prayer without tajalli from Him to him. Since that is from Him by means of graciousness, the contemplation is also through graciousness. He said, "the coolness of my eye is in the prayer," and it is only contemplation of the Beloved by which the eye of the lover is delighted by continuance. The eye remains seeing Allah. It does not look with Him to other than Him in anything, and for that reason, it is forbidden to turn away in the prayer. The glance is something which Shaytan steals from the prayer of the slave in order to forbid him the contemplation of the Beloved. (24) If Allah had truly been the Beloved of the one who turns aside, he would not have turned aside in his prayer to another qibla. Man knows his state in himself, whether he is like that in this particular act of worship or not. "Man will be clear proof against himself in spite of any excuses he might offer." (75:14) He recognizes his lie apart from his truth in himself, because man is not ignorant of his state, his state has tasting (dhawq) for him.

The prayer has another portion. Allah commanded us to pray to Him, and He told us that He prays for us. The prayer is from us and from Him. When He prays, He prays by His name, the Last, for it comes after the existence of the slave, and it is the source of Allah which the slave created in his qibla by logical discernment or by imitation. He is the God of the one who has a creed. It varies according to what the place of the tajalli has and according to the established predisposition as al-Junayd said when he was asked about recognition of Allah and the gnostic. He said, "The color of water is the color of its vessel." It is a masterly answer giving information about the matter for what it is. This is Allah who prays for us. If we pray, we have the name, the Last, so we are in it, as we mentioned, in the state of the One who has this name we are with Him according to our state. He only regards us by the form which we bring to Him.

The one who prays is behind the one who precedes him in the place. It is His words, "Each one knows its prayer and its glorification " (24:41) that is, its rank in being behind the worship of its Lord and the extolling which his predisposition accords him of disconnection (tanzih). "There is nothing which does not glorify Him with praise" of its Lord, the Forbearing, the Forgiving. For that, we do not understand the extolling of the universe distinctly, (25) creature by creature.

Then a rank refers the pronoun to the extolling slave in His words, "There is nothing which does not glorify Him with praise," that is, the praise of that thing. The pronoun which is in His word, "His praise (bi-hamdihi)" refers to the thing - that is, with the praise that is from it.

As we said of the one who has a creed other than Islam, he praises the God who is in his creed and attaches himself to Him. What is from his work returns to him, so he only praises himself. It is from the praise of fabrication the artisan is praised without a doubt, and so the excellence of what he creates or its lack of excellence returns to the artisan. The god of a creed is the product of the one who looks at it, and it is his fabrication; his praise for what he believes is his praise for himself. For this reason, he condemns the creed of another if he had been fair, he would not have done that. Indeed, the possessor of this particular object of worship is certainly ignorant in his rejection of other than what he believes about Allah, since had he recognized what al-Junayd said, "The color of water is the color of its vessel," he would have conceded to everyone who has a creed what he believed in, and he would have recognized Allah in every form of worship of every person with a creed, He has opinion but does not know it. For that reason, Allah says, "I am in My slave's opinion of Me," (26) that is, I only appear to him in the form of his creed. If he wishes, he generalizes, and if he wishes, he limits. The god of creeds is taken from definition, so He is the God which the heart of His slave encompasses. (27)

The Absolute Divinity is not encompassed by anything because He is the source of things and the source of Himself. It is not said of the thing that it encompasses itself, not that it does not encompass itself, so understand! "Allah speaks the truth and He guides to the Way." (33:4)

THE GOOD END

(OF ONES LIFE)
IT MEANS, PORTENTS AND THE WARNING OF THE BAD END

In the Name of Allah the All-Beneficent, All-Merciful

The Good End

Praise be to Allah whose Mercy embraced each and every thing and who keeps account of all things (i.e. He knows the exact number of every thing). He had mercy on whom He willed through that which he enjoined (on them to perform) on this world which (if they perform them) consequently raise their ranks on the Hereafter, so they (Muslims) were perseverant in His obedience and strove in His worship; if they are inflicted with calamities and show patience it will be good for them (in the Hereafter), and if favours are bestowed to them [by Allah] and they are thankful and grateful [for Allah], it will be good for them in the Hereafter, and concerning them Allah said:

“Only those who are patient shall receive their rewards in full, without reckoning”. [Az-Zumar (10)]

I bear witness that there is no true God but Allah who has no partner, and I bear witness that Muhammad ﷺ is His Slave and Messenger who sent as a mercy for the Alamin, prayers from Allah be on him, his household and his reverend Companions.

A portion (of good) for a man in this world is his lifetime; if he makes good use of it in things that benefit him in the eternal abode (Paradise), then his trade will be of a great profit. But if he misuses it (his life) by committing sins and disobedience till he meets Allah in such a state, he is surely of those who are losers; how many of them in the graves?! He who is of a sound sense calls himself for account before Allah calls him to account (on the Day of Account), and fears his sins (and consequently get faraway from them) before they lead him to destruction (i.e. HellFire). Ibn Mas'ood ؓ said:

“The (true) believer sees his sins (and himself) as if he is sitting at the side of a mountain which he fears it will soon fall upon him” [Bukhari (11/88-89) and Muslim]

How many a man who persisted on committing a small sin and was familiar with it and considered it to be nothing, and never thought of the greatness of the One whom he (the sinner) disobeyed and so it (this small sin) was the bad end (of his life and so he was admitted to Hell-Fire). Anas Ibn Malik ؓ said:

"You do deeds, which you consider smaller than a hair, we used to consider as major sins at the time of Prophet ﷺ" [Bukhari (11/283)]

Allah the All-Mighty drew the believers attention in the Holy Qur'an to the importance of the good end (of one's life and deeds); He says:

"O you who believe! Fear Allah [by doing all that He has ordered and by abstaining from all that He has forbidden] as He should be feared, and die not except in a state of Islam [as Muslims] with complete submission to Allah." (Qur'an 3: 102)

He also said:

"And worship your Rabb [Lord] until there comes unto you the certainty [i.e. death]." (Qur'an 15: 99)

The order (in the previous verses) to fear Allah and worship Him (Alone) continues till one dies so that good end (of one's life and deeds) could be achieved. The Prophet ﷺ informed us that there are some people who strive in doing obedience for a long time of their lives but shortly before they die they commit sins and disobediences and end their lives in such a state (and consequently they are admitted to Hell-Fire). The Prophet ﷺ said:

"A man may do deeds characteristic of the people of the (Hell) Fire, so much so that there is only the distance of a cubit between him and it, and then what has been written (by the angel) surpasses, and so he starts doing deeds characteristic of the people of Paradise and enters Paradise. Similarly, a person may do deeds characteristic of the people of Paradise, so much so that there is only the distance of a cubit between him and it, and then what has been written (by the angel) surpasses, and he starts doing deeds of the people of (Hell-) Fire and enters Hell-Fire." [Bukhari (11/417), and Muslim Narration no. (2643)- I translated the complete hadith for more benefit to the reader (Translator)].

Sahl Ibn Sa'd As-Saidi رضي الله عنه, narrated that during one of his battles, the Prophet ﷺ encountered the disbelievers (polytheists, pagans, and idolaters), and the two armies fought, and each of them turned to their army camps. Amongst the (army of the) Muslims there was a man who would follow every single isolated pagan and strike him with his sword. It was said: "O Allah's Messenger! None has fought so satisfactory as so-and-so (namely, that brave Muslim)." The Prophet ﷺ said: "He is from the dwellers of the Hell-Fire." Then a man from amongst the people said: "I will follow him and accompany him in his fast and slow movements." The (brave) man got wounded, and wanting to die at once; he put the handle of his sword on the ground and its tip in between his breast, and then threw himself over it, committing suicide. Then the man (who had watched the deceased) returned to the Prophet ﷺ, and said: "I testify that you are the Messenger of Allah." The Prophet ﷺ said: "What is this?!" The man told him the whole story. The Prophet ﷺ said:

"A man may do what may seem to the people as the deeds of the dwellers of Paradise, but he is of the dwellers of Hellfire and a man may do what may seem to the people as the deeds of the dwellers of Hell-Fire, but he is from the dwellers of Paradise." [Fath al Bari the explanation of Sahih Bukhari (7/538-4202) page 538. The first edition of Dar Ar-Rayyan (1988)].

Allah the All-Mighty, described His believing slaves (in the Holy Qur'an) as the ones who joined between fear of Allah's punishment and sincerity in worship in their hearts. He the All-Mighty, said:

"Verily! Those who live in awe for fear of their Rabb [Lord]; And those who believe in the Ayat [proofs, verses, lessons,...] of their Rabb; And those who join not anyone [in worship] as partners with Allah; And those who give that [their charity] which they give [and also do other good deeds] with their hearts full of fear [whether their alms and charities are accepted or not], because they are sure to return to their Rabb [for reckoning]. It is those who race for good deeds and they are foremost in them [e.g. offering the compulsory, Salat [prayers] in their [early] stated, fixed times and so on] (Qur'an 23: 57-61).

This was the state of the reverend Companions. Ahmad narrated from Abu Bakr-As-Siddiq ؓ that he said:

"I wish I was a hair in a believer's body."

And he ؓ used to hold his tongue and say:

"This is the thing that led me to the ways (of destruction)."

Ali Ibn Abi Talib ؑ used to fear two things: the long hope, and following desires. He ؑ said:

"Long hope makes (you) forget all about the Hereafter, and following desires hinders (you) from the way of Truth (i.e. Islamic monotheism, good deeds, obedience, etc.)", and also he used to say:

"Verily, this world has run away and the Hereafter is coming forward (to us) very fast. And there are sons for each one of them, so be of the sons of the Hereafter [i.e. loving the Hereafter and do good deeds that Allah has enjoined so that He may admit you to Paradise], and do not be of sons of this world (i.e. who love this world and who live their lives committing sins, disobedience, etc.) for in this world there are deeds and no accounts but Tomorrow (Day of Account) there will be only account and no deeds (that could be done)."

Sudden death was a detested thing in Islam because it comes to a person all of a sudden and gives him no time (to repent), he might be doing something evil and so his life will end on such a state.

The righteous predecessors (the reverend Companions and their followers) used to fear the bad end of one's life with a great fear. Sahl At-Tusturi said: "The Siddiqun (truthful persons) used to fear the bad end of one's life in any move or at any moment and they were described by Allah in the Holy Qur'an as: 'their hearts are full of fear'" [Qur'an 23: 20]

The fear of the bad end (of one's life) should be present in front of one's eye in each and every moment for fear induces (the person) to work (i.e. do good deeds). The Prophet ؐ said:

"Whoever fears (should) walk at night (i.e. begins early and work very hard to complete his journey; that is he races for good deeds) and who walks at night, reaches home (Paradise). Allah's good is expensive, Allah's good is Paradise." [At-Tirmithi no. 2452].

But when the death of a person becomes very near and he is about die, he should have more hope in Allah and he should look forward to the meeting with Him for whoever likes the meeting with Allah, Allah likes the meeting with him. The Prophet ﷺ said:

"None of you (Muslims) should die but having a good thought of Allah, the All-Majestic, the All-Mighty."

But most of the ignorant Muslim common folk depended on Allah's spacious mercy, pardoning, and forgiveness and kept on committing disobedience and did not abstain from doing sins, on the contrary, their knowledge of Allah's attributes (i.e. Forgiveness, Mercy, etc.) induced them to commit more sins and this is a destructive mistake and a destructive inference (of Allah's Attributes) for Allah is the All-Merciful, the Oft-Forgiving and (He is) the severest in punishment as Allah, the All-Mighty, stated in many of His Holy Verses; He the All-Majestic said:

"Declare [O Muhammad] unto My slaves, that truly, I am the Oft-Forgiving, the All-Merciful. And that My Torment is indeed the most painful torment." [Qur'an 15: 49-50]

And He also said:

"Ha-Meem. The revelation of the book [this Qur'an] is from Allah, the All-Mighty, the All-Knower. The Forgiver of sin, the Acceptor of repentance, the Severe in punishment,..." [Qur'an 40: 1-3].

Ma'ruf Al-Karkhi said: "Your hope in the mercy of the One whom you do not obey is foolishness and disappointment (for you)." Some of the scholars said: "The One who enjoined that your organ (i.e. your hand) should be cut off for the stealing of 3 dirhams (1/4 of a gold coin), do not feel safe of his punishment in the Hereafter that it would be the like of it."

A Muslim should always be keen to pay back people's debts and give them their due rights for whatever right is with a person which is due to his (Muslim) brother, the latter will surely take it back on the Day of Resurrection. If the former has no rewards in his scale, the latter's sins will be laid on the former's scale of sins (and eventually be admitted to Hell). The Prophet ﷺ informed (us) that the believer's soul is hindered (from getting into Paradise) by his debts till they are paid on his behalf back to its owner.

The Bad End

Now I will explain things that cause the bad end (of one's life):

First - Delaying Repentance:

Turning in repentance unto Allah from all sins is an enjoined duty on every mature Muslim at any moment as is stated in the words of Allah:

“And all of you beg Allah to forgive you all, O believers, that you may be successful.” [Qur'an 24:31].

The Prophet ﷺ used to ask Allah's forgiveness one hundred times every day although Allah has already forgiven him his sins. Al-`Aghar Al-Muzni said that the Prophet ﷺ said:

“O people! Turn in repentance to Allah. Verily! I turn in repentance to Him one hundred times every day.”
[Muslim 2702].

The Prophet ﷺ stated that the one who turn in repentance to Allah (sincerely) from a sin is as the one who has (committed) no sin. [Ibn Majah (4250) and this (hadith) have a sound chain of narrators]. One of the Satan's tricks by which he beguiles people is delaying repentance. He (Satan) insinuates to the sinner to delay his repentance for he has enough times to do that and if he wants to repent now and commits the same sin afterwards then his repentance will never be accepted again, and he will be of those who are admitted in Hell. Or he (Satan) insinuates to him (sinner) that who he (the sinner) reaches the age of fifty or sixty he may then turn into repentance - sincere repentance - and may retire in the mosque (for optional prayers) and may do many optional good deeds, but now he is in his youth hood and his golden age. So he should entertain himself and not to exhaust it with obedience.

These are some of Satan's tricks by which he induces people to delay their repentance. Some of the righteous predecessors (reverend Companions and their followers) said:

“I warn you of ‘I will’ (i.e. do not say I will repent later) for they are (i.e. these words) one of Satan's most atrocious forces. The similitude of the firm believer who turn in repentance to Allah from each and every sin and at any time out of fear of the bad end (of his life) and out of love to Allah, and the careless one who delays his repentance as the similitude of a group of people who are on a journey and entered a village; the firm believer bought whatever helps him to complete his journey and waited ready for the day to leave (the village) and the careless one would always say: "I will get ready tomorrow." Then the leader of the journey announced the departure and this careless one has nothing (to help him continue his journey). This similitude is for the people of this world; the firm believer never regrets on any thing when death comes to him but the careless sinner will say when he is resurrected from death: "O my Rabb (Lord), send me back (to the world) so that I may do good deeds in that world (which I left behind)."

Second - Hope in long life:

It is the reason behind the misery of many people when Satan beguiles them and makes them think that they have a long time to live and successive years in which one can dream of things and achieve them, so Satan induces them to spend these years achieving their hopes and making real their dreams and forgetting all about the Hereafter and making no mention of death and if one makes mention of death they feel annoyed because it makes their lives distressed and spoils their desires. The Prophet ﷺ warned us of these two things which is a great warning saying:

"I mostly fear for you two things: Following desires, and the long hope (in life); following desires hinders you from (accepting) the Truth (i.e. Islamic Monotheism, etc.), and long hope is (going to lead you towards) loving this world to a extent that you will stop thinking in the Hereafter and the Islamic obligations enjoined on you."

[Ibn Abu Ad-Dunya narration with a weak chain of narrators. AI-Iraqi (commentary) on AI-Ihya (4/433)].

If a man loves this world more than the Hereafter, he will prefer it (this world) and strive hard to gain its delights, enjoyments and pleasures and forgets all about the Hereafter and all about building his 'house' in Paradise near his Rabb with those whom Allah has favoured of the Prophets, truthful, martyrs, and the righteous ones, and best are those as a company.

Having short hope in life will appear (in one's deeds) as stepping towards doing good deeds and making good use of one's life for the days of one's life are preordained and one's breath is counted already and what passes away (of one's life) will never come back or restored, and on the way (of one's life) there are many obstacles which the Prophet ﷺ mentioned in his hadith saying:

"Step towards (good) deeds before seven [obstacles hinder you from doing them (deeds)]:

Do you wait but for abject poverty that makes you forget (Islamic obligations on you), extravagant richness, destructive diseases, detested senility, death, or Pseudo Messiah;

(these are all) absent evils that are being waited or the Hour (which is also being waited) and it is more detested and harder (on you than all these)." [At-Tirmidhi (2408) and he said: "This hadith is a sound one"].

Abdullah Ibn `Umar (may Allaah be pleased with them) said: The Prophet ﷺ once held my shoulders and said:

"Live in this world as (if you are) a wayfarer or a stranger (who will sooner or later leave the town he is staying in)." And Ibn `Umar (may Allaah be pleased with them) used to say: "If you will live till night, do not wait for the next day (i.e. do not have hopes that you will live to the next day), and if you wake up in the morning do not have hope that you will live till night. And take (advantage) from your health for (the times when you are afflicted with) diseases (and can not perform any obedience) and take advantage of your life for death (i.e. do every possible obedience in your life before death comes to you for then no deeds can be performed." [Bukhari (11/190-200) and At-Tirmidhi no. 2334].

The Prophet ﷺ, guided the believers to the way they should follow to get rid of the long hope in life and to think thoroughly of (the truth of our existence in) this world; he ﷺ ordered them to remember death and visit the graves frequently, to wash the dead before putting them in their graves, to follow the funeral processions, to visit sick people and to visit the righteous people because all these matters awaken the heart and deliver it from its unawareness and lighten it (with the light of Truth and) with the things and affairs he will later face (in the Hereafter) in order to get ready for them. You will be (dear reader) provided with some details.

(A) - As for remembering death, it induces one to lead an ascetic life, and long for the Eternal World (in Paradise) and consequently it induces the person to strive in doing righteous deeds and not to incline to one's forbidden desires in this world, which is not permanent. Abu Hurairah ؓ narrated that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"Make mention of the destroyer of desires (i.e. death) very often." [At-Tirmidhi no. 2049 and he said: "This hadith has a sound chain of narrators." It is also narrated by Ibn Majah no. 4258].

Ibn Umar (may Allaah be pleased with them) said that a man from Ansar¹ asked:

"O Messenger of Allah, who is the soundest of people and most generous (in manners)?" The Prophet ﷺ said: "The soundest of people and most generous in manners is the one who makes mention of death very often and prepares himself fully for it; Verily, these are the ones who are the soundest of people. They gained the honour in this world and the glory in the Hereafter." [Ibn Majah no. 4259 with a weak chain of narrators. Ibn Abu Ad-Dunya also narrated it with a good chain of narrators; AI-Iraqi also narrated it in his book "Takhrij Ahadith Al-Ihya" (4/451)].

Footnote 1 ANSAR: The Companions of the Prophet ﷺ from the inhabitants of Madinah, who embraced Islam and supported it and who received and entertained the Muslim emigrants from Makkah and other places.

The person then thinks thoroughly of these dead people in the graves; weren't they once those of strong bodies, and of great wealth, commanding orders and forbidding (things), and this day (in their graves) their bodies are being eaten by worms and their bones are perished. Then this person thinks, can he escape death or death will inescapably take him and consequently prepares himself fully for the Hereafter by doing righteous deeds for they are the beneficial currency in the Hereafter.

(B) - As for visiting cemeteries and seeing graves, it is regarded as the best admonition for the hearts, when man sees these digged dark places and when; he remembers the moment when the beloved ones of the dead person pour sand over him after placing him in his tomb and closing it with some clay bricks, then they disperse away from him and inherit his money and own his properties (according to the Islamic laws of inheritance), and his women will marry other men after his death and after a little while he will be forgotten although he was the one who is obeyed if he ordered for something to happen and the one who is not disobeyed when he forbids something. When a person thinks of all that while visiting the cemetery, he will realize the benefit of the Prophet's hadith: "Visit the graves for they remind you of death." [Muslim narration no. 976]

(C) - Washing the dead and following funeral processions:

Turning the dead body of the dead from one side to the other while washing it is a great admonition (for us and for the one who does the washing) for when he (this dead person) was alive, none could turn him to any side or even get nearer to him except with his permission, and he may be of those who were of a great strength and a tremendous awe but now (as a dead) he is a unmoving body that the washer can turn it to the side he wants.

Mukhul Ad-Dimashqi used to say - whenever he sees a funeral: "Go ahead (i.e. and follow the funeral) for we will all going to die, (this is) a great admonition (for us), a swift unawareness (is our state in this world), the first and the last (of us) will go away (die) bearing no mind (out of fear)." Usman رضي الله عنه used to cry whenever he follows a funeral procession and stands on a grave. It was said to him: "When you make mention of Paradise and Hell-Fire you do not cry but whenever you stand near a grave you cry!" He said: 'I heard the Prophet ﷺ say:

"(Being in) the grave is the first stage of the stages of the Hereafter, if he (i.e. the dead person) was delivered [by Allah] safely from it, what follows it is much easier, but if he is not delivered from it, then that which is after (this stage) is much worse." Ahmad and At-Tirmidhi narrated it. Ibn Majah and Al-Hakim said: "It is a sound hadith." [Al-Musnad (1/63), At-Tirmidhi narration no. 2309]

(D) - Visiting Righteous People:

Visiting righteous people awakens the heart and encourages the soul (to do righteous deeds) for when the visitor sees how the righteous people strive in doing good deeds and how they compete each other in doing obedience to seek the pleasure of Allah only, and to win His Paradise paying no attention to this world and its attractions for these hinder them from walking on the honoured path (i.e. Islamic Monotheism, obedience...). Allah, the All-Mighty, ordered His Prophet ﷺ to accompany such people and show perseverance in doing that:

"And keep yourself [O Muhammad] patiently with those who call on their Rabb [i.e. your companions who remember their Rabb with glorification, praising prayers, and other righteous deeds] morning and afternoon, seeking His Face, and let not your eyes overlook them desiring the pomp and glitter of the world; and obey not him whose heart We have made heedless of Our Remembrance, one who follows his own lusts, and his own affairs [deeds] has been lost.)
[Qur'an 18:28].

Al-Hasan was asked: "O Abu Hasan (father of Al-Hasan)! What shall we do? Shall we sit with people who make-our hearts in our mouths (out of fear)?" He said: "By Allah! To sit with people who make you fear (now) so that you would feel safe later (in the Day of Resurrection) is better than sitting with people who make you feel safe (in this world) till fear comes to you (on the Day of Resurrection)."

Third - Loving the sin and getting used to it:

If a person gets used to any sin and ever repents from it, Satan (Shaitan) will seize his heart (over power it), and it (the sin) will be the only thing that he thinks of even in the last moments of his life, and if his friends induce him to utter the two testifications at time of death - so that the last thing he would say is "La ilaha-illa Allah [There is no God but Allah]" - sin will have control over his mind and he will utter only what he used to commit of sins. The following are some real stories:

There was a man who used to work as an auctioneer in the market. When death came to him his sons induced him to utter the two testifications [i.e. saying: "Ashhadu Anna La Illaha IllaAllah Wa'anna Muhammadan Rasul Allah - There is no God but Allah and Muhammad is His Messenger]," the father only said: "Four and half, four and half."

It was said to another: Say, "La ilaha-illa Allah" she said: "Many times she would say that she had got tired."

It was said to a third person: Say, "La ilaha-illa Allah" but he sang.

And death may reach the person (who insists on committing sins) while he is committing the sin and he will meet Allah on such a state and He (Allah) would be angry with him. The Prophet ﷺ said:

"He who dies on something (i.e. doing it), Allah will resurrect him on the same state (he was in) before his death." Al-Hakim narrated it and he said: "It is authentic according to the conditions that Muslim put for the authentic ahadith," and At-Thahabi agreed with him." [Al-Mustadrak (1/340)]

Fourth - Suicide:

If a Muslim is afflicted with a calamity and shows patience and seeks Allah's pleasure in that, this calamity will increase his rewards. But if the Muslim gives up (of Allah's mercy) and feels unsatisfied with his life and thinks that the best way to get rid of his problems and agonies is to commit suicide, in that case he chose disobedience and incurred Allah's anger on himself and killed his own self without just cause. Bukhari narrated that Abu Hurairah رضي الله عنه said: The Prophet ﷺ said:

"He who commits suicide by throttling shall keep on throttling in the Hell-Fire (forever) and he who commits suicide by stabbing himself shall keep on stabbing himself in the Hell-Fire (forever)." [Bukhari (3/180)].

Bukhari and Muslim, may Allah have mercy on them both, narrated that Abu Hurairah رضي الله عنه said:

"A man witnessed the battle of Khaibar with the Prophet ﷺ, and he رضي الله عنه said about a man claiming to be a Muslim: "This (man) is from the dwellers of Hell-Fire." When the battle began, the man [whom the Prophet ﷺ talked about strove satisfactorily and he was wounded badly. Then it was said to the Prophet ﷺ: "The man you talked about earlier strove in the battle satisfactorily and died (isn't he a martyr?!)." The Prophet ﷺ said: "To Hell-Fire (he shall go)." Doubt sneaked to the hearts of the Muslims. While being in such a state, it was said that the man did not actually die but wounded badly. When night came, the man could not bear the pains and killed himself (i.e. committed suicide). The Prophet ﷺ was told the matter and then he رضي الله عنه said: "I bear witness that I am Allah's Slave and Messenger." Then he رضي الله عنه ordered Bilal رضي الله عنه to announce for people that: "None will enter Paradise but a believer. And verily, Allah may support this religion (Islam) with a wicked (sinful) man." [Bukhari narration (6/125) and Muslim (111)].

Portents of Good End

The Prophet ﷺ informed us of some of the good end portents which if the person's death was with one of them then it will be a good omen and a glad tidings. Some of these portents are:

(1) -To utter the testification of faith [i.e. "La ilaha-illa Allah" - None has the right to be worshipped but Allah] at the time of death. Al-Hakim narrated that Mu`ath Ibn Jabal ؓ said: The Prophet ﷺ said:

"He whose last words (in life) were ' La ilaha-illa Allah', None has the right to be worshipped but Allah shall enter Paradise" [Abu Dawud narration (3116), Al-Hakim (1/351) and regarded it authentic hadith and At-Thahabi agreed with him].

(2) - To die as a martyr while striving to Allah's word (i.e. Islamic Monotheism) superior. Allah said:

"Think not of those who are killed In the way of Allah as dead. Nay they are alive, with their Rabb and they have provision. They rejoice in what Allah has bestowed upon them of His Bounty, rejoicing for the sake of those who have not yet joined them, but are left behind [not yet martyred] that on them no fear shall come, nor shall they grieve. They rejoice in a Grace and a Bounty from Allah, and that Allah will not waste the reward of the believers". [Quran 3:169-171]

(3) - To die while preparing for a battle in Allah's Cause, or while performing Hajj (pilgrimage). The Prophet ﷺ said:

"Whoever is killed in Allah's Cause he is (regarded as) a martyr (he will gain the reward of that of a martyr) and whoever dies in Allah's Cause, he is a martyr." Muslim and Ahmad narrated this hadith.

The Prophet ﷺ said - about the man who was performing Hajj and fell down from his she-camel and died:

"Wash him with water and (the leaves of) the lotte tree, and shroud him with two sheets and do not cover his head for he will be resurrected on the Day of Resurrection saying the "talbia " (devotional calls recited

when one performs Hajj or Umra; they are as follows:
Labbaika Allahumma Labbaik..O Allah, here I am responding, here I am worshipping You).

(4) - To die exactly after performing an obedience to Allah (i.e. this obedience be the last thing one did). Abu Huthifa رضي الله عنه said that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"He who says 'La ilaha-illa Allah' [i.e. no one has the right to be worshipped but Allah] seeking Allah's Countenance (and pleasure) and is the last thing he does (in his life) will enter Paradise. And he who fasts a day seeking Allah's Countenance (and pleasure) and happened to be the last day in his life, will enter Paradise. And he who gives money as a charity seeking Allah's Countenance (and pleasure) and this was his last thing he did, will enter Paradise." (Ahmad 5/391).

(5) - To die while striving to defend the five things that the Islamic law preserved (for Muslims, i.e. none should transgress to deprive a Muslim from them) and they are: religion, soul, wealth, honour and mind. Said Ibn Zaid رضي الله عنه narrated that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"He who dies while defending his wealth (from the one who wants to take it away from him by force) is a martyr, he who dies while defending his household (from those who want to cause harm for them) is a martyr, he who dies while defending his religion (i.e. fighting the disbelieving transgressors) is a martyr, and he who dies while defending his soul (from the one who wants to kill him) is a martyr." (At-Tirmidhi and Abu Dawud)

(6) - To die because of one of the epidemic diseases. The Prophet ﷺ informed us of some of them; they are:

A - Plague: Anas Ibn Malik رضي الله عنه narrated that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"Plague is a cause of martyrdom for every Muslim (who dies because of it)." [Abu Dawud (4772), and At-Tirmidhi no. (1418 and 1421)].

B - Tuberculosis: Rashid Ibn Hubaish said that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"Dying during fighting in Allah's Cause is (the cause of) martyrdom, Plague is (a cause of) martyrdom (for every Muslim who dies because of it), dying because of delivery is (the cause of) martyrdom (for any Muslim woman) and tuberculosis is (the cause of) martyrdom (for a Muslim who dies because of it)." (Ahmad 3/289)

C - Abdominal diseases: Narrated Abu Hurairah ؓ that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"He (a Muslim) who dies because of an abdominal disease is a martyr." [Muslim no.1915]

D - Pleurisy: Jabir Ibn Atik narrated that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"The one who dies because of pleurisy is a martyr." (i.e. he will be given a reward equals to that of a fight martyr) This hadith will later be narrated fully.

(7) - The dying of a (Muslim) woman because of delivery or in her after-birth state: Ubadah Ibn As-Samit ؓ narrated that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"And the woman who dies because of her son, after her delivery, her son will drag her with his umbilical cord to Paradise." [Ahmad (4/201) and (5/323).

(8) - Dying because of drowning, being underneath debris, and bums: Abu Hurairah ؓ narrated that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"Martyrs are (of) five (kinds): The one who dies because of plague, abdominal diseases, drowning, and the one who dies underneath debris." [At-Tirmidhi (1063) and Muslim no. (1915) the like of it].

Jabir Ibn Atik said that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"The martyrs other than being killed in Allah's Cause are, (of) seven (kinds): the one who dies because of plague is a martyr, the drowned (Muslim) is (regarded as) a martyr, the one who dies because of pleurisy is a martyr, the one who dies because of abdominal diseases is a martyr, the one who dies because of burns is a martyr, the one who dies because of being underneath debris is a martyr, and the (Muslim) woman who dies because of delivery is a martyr." This hadith was narrated by Ahmad, Abu Dawud, An-Nisai, and Al-Hakim who classified it as an authentic hadith and Ath-Thahabi agreed with him." [Ahmad (5/446), Abu Dawud (3111), An-Nisai (4/13-14) and Al-Hakim (1/352)].

(9) - To die on the Thursday night or on the daytime of Friday: Abdullah Ibn Amru رضي الله عنه said that the Prophet ﷺ said:

"No Muslim dies on Friday or on the night of Thursday but Allah will deliver him from the trials of the grave."
[Ahmad (2/176) and At-Tirmidhi (1080) and he said "This is a strange hadith that has no connected chain of narrators"]

(10) - Sweat on the Forehead: Narrated Buraidah from Al-Husaib رضي الله عنه that he said: The Prophet ﷺ said:

"A believer dies with sweat on his forehead." [At-Tirmidhi no. (982), An-Nisai (4/6) and this hadith has a good chain of narrators]

Conclusion

At the end of this book, it is better to sum up some of the means that Allah made ways to lead Muslims to the good end (of one's life), and they are:

a) To fear Allah in secrecy and in public and to hold fast with that which the Prophet ﷺ gave us (of laws) for these are the ways of salvation. Allah, the All-Mighty said:

“O you who believe! Fear Allah [by doing all that He has ordered and by abstaining from all that He has forbidden] as He should be feared, and die not except in the state of Islam [as Muslims] with complete submission to Allah.” [Qur'an 3:102]

And a (Muslim) slave should ward off sins completely for major sins lead one to Hell and persisting on committing minor sins will make them major sins. And the committing of minor sins and turning not in repentance to Allah nor asking his forgiveness will turn into "Ran" (covering of sins and evil deeds) on the heart. The Prophet ﷺ said:

“Beware of minor sins, (for they are) as travelling people who wanted to take a rest in a valley, this brought a piece of fuel wood and that brought another piece of fuel wood till they managed to cook their bread (or meal). If one commits minor sins persistently they will lead him to destruction (i.e. Hell-Fire).” [Ahmad 5331].

b) Remembering Allah all the time:

He who remembers Allah all the time and the last thing he says in his life was: 'La ilaha illa Allah' [there is no true God worthy of worship but Allah], he would entertain the Prophet's glad tiding for he ﷺ said:

“He whose last words were 'La ilaha illa Allah' enters paradise. [Abu Dawud (3116) and Al-Hakim (1/351) and classified it as an authentic hadith and Ath-Thahabi agreed with him].

Abu Dawud narrated this hadith and Said Ibn Mansoor narrated it from Al-Hassan that he said: The Prophet ﷺ was asked: 'Which deeds are the best in Allah's view?' He said:

"To die while remembering Allah very much with your tongue." [Al-Mughni by Ibn Qadamah 2/450].

O Allah make our deeds (in this life) the best ones, and the best of our days the days when we meet You and make us of those whom You have favoured with bounties in Your Paradise and Your Presence, and may Allah's prayers and peace be on our Prophet Muhammad ﷺ his households and Companions.

MULLA SADRA'S TRANSCENDENT PHILOSOPHY

Sadradin Shirazi (1571–1640), known also as Mulla Sadra, spoke of the primacy of Being and promoted a new ontology, founding a new epistemology. Mulla Sadra's ontology is an important philosophical turn and contribution to the understanding of the development of Muslim philosophy and thought.

This comprehensive study of Mulla Sadra's philosophical thought explores his departure from tradition; his turn to the doctrine of the primacy of Being; the dynamic characteristics of Being and the concept of substantial change; comparisons with Heidegger's fundamental ontology; and the influence of Mulla Sadra's ontology on subsequent Muslim philosophy. Of particular value to students of philosophy, Islamic and Middle Eastern studies, philosophy of religion, and general readers who seek to understand Muslim philosophy, this book explores the significance of the doctrine of Mulla Sadra and its impact on subsequent debates in the Muslim world.

Ashgate World Philosophies Series

The Ashgate World Philosophies Series responds to the remarkable growth of interest among English-language readers in recent years in philosophical traditions outside those of 'the West'. The traditions of Indian, Chinese, and Japanese thought, as well as those of the Islamic world, Latin America, Africa, Aboriginal Australian, Pacific and American Indian peoples, are all attracting lively attention from professional philosophers and students alike, and this new Ashgate series provides introductions to these traditions as well as in-depth research into central issues and themes within those traditions. The series is particularly designed for readers whose interests are not adequately addressed by general surveys of 'World Philosophy', and it includes accessible, yet research-led, texts for wider readership and upper-level student use, as well as research monographs. The series embraces a wide variety of titles ranging from introductions on particular world philosophies and informed surveys of the philosophical contributions of geographical regions, to in-depth discussion of a theme, topic, problem or movement and critical appraisals of individual thinkers or schools of thinkers.

What is all about beauty in the world? The image,
Like quivering boughs reflected in a stream,
Of that eternal Orchard which abides
Unwithered in the hearts of perfect men.

Jalal al-Din Rumi

Introduction

In the post Ibn Sinan period, the primacy of essence (asalat al-mahiyah) was one of the prime philosophical issues for Muslim thinkers. The school of illumination, headed by Suhrawardi, held the view that ‘essence’ not ‘existence’ was the only reality. Nothing in the external world corresponded to ‘existence’, and hence ‘existence’ remained an empty concept and an intellectual property, whereas ‘essence’ was real and primary. By contrast, Sadr al-Din Shirazi (1571–1640), known also as Mulla Sadra,¹ spoke of the primacy of Being (asalat al-wujud) and promoted a new ontology.

From the twelfth century CE, the school of illumination occupied a focal place in the intellectual life of Muslims, particularly in the Persian-speaking world. The philosophical thought of this school marked a vivid departure from rationalism to Gnosticism, or knowledge by illumination (al-ishraq). Shahab al-Din Suhrawardi (1171–1208), the founder of this school, believed that knowledge of an object in the world came only through revealing its essence or quiddity. The Being of the object, unlike its essence, was a mental concept and had no external reality. To prove this point, Suhrawardi developed the argument that there were two possible ways of understanding the meaning of Being: either as a universal concept shared by all existent beings or as a particular being. In the first case, Being remains a mental concept, but in the second it depends on its essence to exist because a particular being is equivalent to its essence, which makes the being the way it is.²

A universal concept such as ‘blackness’ is conceived only in respect of a particular black object; existence, then, as a universal concept, reveals itself through a particular being. Thinking of existence as a universal concept, and then of its reliance on a particular type of being for its existence is similar to Aristotle’s understanding of the relationship between universals and particulars. Aristotle, in rejecting the Platonic view of reality, argued for the dependence of universal determinations on particular beings and against the ontological status of universal determinations. In projecting his own views, Suhrawardi, on one hand, relied on Aristotle’s argument, and, on the other, reversed the argument. He came closer to Plato by insisting on the dependence of particular beings on their universal determinations, not vice versa.³

Suhrawardi’s thought influenced the dominant philosophical tradition in Isfahan, where Mulla Sadra studied. Mulla Sadra’s teacher, Mir Muhammad Baqir al-Astarabadi (d. 1630), also known as Mir Damad, was one of the leading figures of the doctrine of illumination. But it seems that Mir Damad was not a blind follower of Suhrawardi, because he tried to reconcile the Gnostic ideas of Illuminationism with Ibn Sina's ontology, or, as Nasr remarks, he provided the illuminationsit interpretation of Ibn Sina.⁴ Mulla Sadra, at the beginning of his philosophical career, and under the influence of Mir Damad and this dominant philosophical trend in Isfahan, advocated the doctrine of the primacy of essence and was one of the followers of Illuminationism. To understand his turn from or criticism of Suhrawardi's metaphysics it is also of the utmost importance to take into account the influence of Ibn Sina (979–1037) and Ibn al-'Arabi (1163–1240) in Mulla Sadra's project of a new type of metaphysics based on the primacy of Being. This project meant destroying the foundation of essentialism in pursuit of a serious ontological investigation into the truth of Being. To achieve this, Mulla Sadra had to admit his disillusionment with essentialism and abandon the notion of the primacy essence.

Mulla Sadra belonged to the ishraqi philosophical tradition. He changed his position and became a defender of the doctrine of the primacy of Being under the influence of 'spiritual inspiration' rather than a rationalistic discourse and logical investigation. He clearly states 'until my God guided me and showed me his proof', which expresses the occurrence of a mystical experience for Mulla Sadra. From then on, Mulla Sadra devoted his time to defending his ontological position and the general principles of his transcendent philosophy. The 'darkness of illusion' described here is indicative of the domain of Suhrawardi's metaphysics, in which a state of untruth reigns over the whole of reality so that the meaning of Being becomes unattainable. It is reflected in the 'abandonment of Being' or 'nihilism' discussed by Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), and is a philosophical position from Plato to Nietzsche representing a history of negligence of the question of Being.⁵ In both the Western philosophical tradition and Suhrawardi's metaphysics, what is lost or abandoned is the being of beings as a whole, which has led to the 'disintegration of truth' or the 'forgottenness' of truth and the thinking of Being as 'essence'.⁶

Turning from this type of metaphysics became a serious philosophical enterprise for Mulla Sadra after his departure for Kahak, a village near Qum, and his choosing a solitary life for more than a decade. The overcoming of the 'darkness of illusion' would be achieved by deconstructing Suhrawardi's metaphysics and in reconstructing an ontology based on the primacy of Being. The new ontology dealt with the primordial philosophical question of the meaning of the being of beings, rather than with familiarity with beings or essence. Overcoming Suhrawardi's metaphysics meant a radical change to recognizing the priority of the question of the meaning of Being.

The reason for Mulla Sadra's self-imposed exile was reportedly political. His fame in Isfahan had met with jealousy on the part of a group of religious scholars who were politically ambitious and determined to gain patronage from the rulers of the day.⁷ There was, however, more to this opposition than jealousy. Fazlur Rahman stated that, in addition to his sympathy for Ibn al-'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being, Mulla Sadra's ideas were too radical for the religious circle of the time.⁸ The political position of his father at the Safawid court played an important role in saving him, but he was forced to make a choice between defending his views and turning to seclusion. He chose the latter, with a sense of disillusionment with the rational method of the Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophy and essentialism of the school of illumination. After his time in solitude, he returned to Shiraz, where he founded a school, where he taught thinkers such as Mulla Muhsin Fayd Kashani and 'Abd al-Razzaq al-Husayn al-Lahiji. In later centuries, Persian Muslim thinkers such as Mulla Hadi Sabzawari, Mulla Ali Nuri and Mulla Ali Mudarris Zunuzi came under his influence. Today, Muslim thinkers such as Abdul Hasan Qazwini, Muhammad Kazim Assar and Muhammad Hussain Tabatab'i adhere to Mulla Sadra's philosophy.⁹

As mentioned earlier, the turn from the primacy of essence to the primacy of Being in Mulla Sadra's thought belonged to his period of solitude and to his teaching in Shiraz. During that time the question of Being rather than essence proved to be 'the foundation of the principles of philosophy'.¹⁰ For him, the primacy of Being was fundamental in the sense that Being and not essence was the only reality on which the multiplicity of beings (essents) stands.

Certainly, what Mulla Sadra tried to prove in his ontological enterprise of discovering a unified ground had been discussed earlier by Aristotle in the Metaphysics, Book VII. For Aristotle, the diversity of the modes of Being leads to the question of its underlying unity. But the difference between Aristotle and Mulla Sadra arises with the doctrine of the categories and the epistemological significance of this doctrine for knowing reality. Aristotle proposed ten categories, of which the most fundamental was substance, with others, for example quantity, quality, relation, place, time, posture, state, action, and passion, dependent for their existence on substance. These categories are classes or genera, the application of which makes possible knowledge of every mode of being and reality. Mulla Sadra's metaphysics asserts the realm of this principle of unity beyond the domain of the categories. For this reason, Being remains indefinable.¹¹ It is neither a genus for another entity, differentia, or species, nor a common or specific accident. Understanding its meaning cannot be based on anything more prevalent than itself.¹² This negative approach, however, does not mean that nothing about Being or this unifying principle can be known. The indefinability of Being points out the inherent shortcomings of Aristotle's logic and rational apprehension; meanwhile the inability of this type of logic and epistemology should not eliminate the question of its meaning. The failure of the rational apprehension of Being was not an obstacle to Mulla Sadra's ontological enterprise or to inquiry into its meaning. He denounced pure rationality, and relied instead on intuition or mystic experience for knowing the inner reality of Being:

As it has been stated the reality of existence is neither genus, nor species, nor accident, since it is not a natural universal. Instead, its inclusion happens in another mode of inclusion, and no one has gnosis of it except the mystics, i.e. 'those who are firmly grounded in mystical knowledge' [3:7]. Sometimes it is interpreted as the spiritual soul [i.e. Holy Spirit], other times as that grace 'which extendeth to all things' [7:156]. Sometimes [it is as the] 'reality from which entities have been created', according to the mystics. [Also, it is] the expansion of the light of existence to the structures of contingent entities, and the essences, which are receptive to it; finally [they speak of] its descent towards the abodes of inner natures.¹³

The rationalist preoccupation with epistemology does not constitute a reawakening of the question of Being because it presupposes a subject–object dichotomy. It depends on having turned away from Being to beings. Mulla Sadra's epistemology is significant for eliminating the subject–object dichotomy and reawakening the question of Being. According to Fazlur Rahman, it also shows a resemblance to the epistemological positions of Plotinus (205–270) and Henri Bergson (1859–1941). The latter, for example, insists on the point that 'duration' as an experience cannot be rationally apprehended and is a matter of intellectual intuition.¹⁴ It is worth mentioning that, in inquiring into the meaning of Being, Mulla Sadra agreed with Suhrawardi that Being was not apprehended rationally and that the Aristotelian logic failed to reveal its truth, whereas essence was conceived rationally. Essence did not exist by itself but arose in thinking when a particular mode of Being was conceived. For this reason, essence should be thought of as a mental phenomenon that exists in thinking and for thinking and not as an external reality or something with its own ontological status.

Mulla Sadra's criticism of Suhrawardi's metaphysics became explicit in his philosophical turn when he formed the contrary philosophical view that Being was not a mental property but an objective reality outside the domain of rational thinking. For this reason, Being could be perceived and understood through its illuminative presence by a new cognitive tool. Only in this way was doubt about the inner nature of reality superseded. Based on such intuitive experience, Being appeared the most evident of all things. It was the principle without which even 'non-being' was unthinkable.¹⁵ This ontological enterprise parallels in some ways that of Martin Heidegger, except that Mulla Sadra's ontology is entangled with theology. Otherwise, both thinkers advocate the primacy of Being. Heidegger, in interpreting the history of metaphysics, thinks that the abandonment of Being is rooted in Platonism; for Mulla Sadra it was inherited in Suhrawardi's thought. Meanwhile, they share the view that Aristotle's logic is incapable of revealing the meaning of Being.

Reliance on the Aristotelian system of logic brings shortcomings into our ontological inquiry. According to Heidegger, for instance, this reliance led the post-Aristotelian thinkers to neglect Being and to turn towards studying ontic entities instead.¹⁶

For Mulla Sadra, the doctrine of the primacy of essence led to the concealment of the truth. Its advocates neglected fundamental philosophical questions in favour of investigating the nature of something less fundamental or grounded that could not exist by itself. The reason for this, as explained by Mulla Sadra, lay in the reliance on the rational apprehension of Being.¹⁷ Heidegger, in Being and Time (1927), concurs, arguing that the post-Aristotelian thinkers accepted the dogma of negligence, and withdrew themselves from the genuine philosophical question about the meaning of Being, for three reasons. First, they thought that Being was the most universal concept, and that its universality 'transcended' any universality of genus. Second, since Being is the most universal concept, and is not an entity, it is therefore indefinable and escapes all attempts to define it in accordance with the rules of 'definition' provided in Aristotelian logic. Third, Being is self-evident.¹⁸ Heidegger rejects the three presuppositions and argues against the post-Aristotelian thinkers that the universality of the concept of Being does not guarantee the clarity of its meaning, and that the meaning of this concept is still the darkest of all. He also, like Mulla Sadra, says that Being is not an entity and is thus indefinable, and that Aristotle's concept of definition 'definitio fit per genus proximum et differentiam specificam' is not applicable to it. Heidegger also believes that the indefinableness of Being does not invalidate the question of its meaning, and should not hinder us from investigating that meaning.¹⁹

There are, however, three ontological positions in dealing with the primacy of Being or essence. Either Being is prior to essence or posterior to it, or they co-exist. When Being is thought of as prior to essence, it signifies that Being can stand by itself without, or prior to, its essence. If, however, the primacy of essence is accepted as true, it implies that essence exists without Being. But for this, essence has to exist or needs another existence to rely on, and for Mulla Sadra this is a vicious regress. The third position is that existence and essence co-exist. This ontological view involves the notion that essence is with existence and not in it. In this case, essence again relies for its existence on another existence. As a consequence of this, essence cannot be without prior existence.²⁰

In arguing against these three ontological positions, Mulla Sadra concluded that the qualification of essence by existence, unlike the qualification of a body by colour, is an intellectual operation. Neither existence nor essence is prior to the other, nor do they have a state of simultaneity, since nothing can be prior, posterior or simultaneous to itself. Both are ontologically inseparable and differ only in thinking:

What has been said earlier is sufficient to refute this claim, for existence is identical with essence in the external [realm] but different from it mentally. Therefore, there is no relation between them except in intellectual consideration. In [such an intelligible] consideration, the relation will have existence which in its inner reality is identical with it, but is different from it in the realm external [to the mind]. This kind of as infinitum is stopped when the intelligible consideration is ceased.²¹

What, then, does the primacy of Being mean if these three positions are refuted? How can we talk about the primacy of Being? In answering these questions, we can think of the primacy of Being over essence and its modes like the primacy of a ground over the grounded. Mulla Sadra believes that Being and essence, like the ground and the grounded, are ontologically inseparable; they are different realities in thinking only.²² When a being is conceived and analysed into its determinations, the Being of this being appears in thinking to be distinct from these determinations. This intellectual apprehension does not coincide with the inner reality of Being, because essence is not distinct from Being, nor is existence an addition to essence. It is only in thinking that the priority of one over the other, in particular of essence, becomes evident, because thinking analyses each entity into existence and essence. The latter appears as the prior factor due to its nature as a universal determination and something apprehended by the intellect, whereas existence is not apprehended. Here, the primacy of essence becomes a mental factor, and Being remains an ontological ground inaccessible to rational thinking. The distinction between Being and essence in the intellectual sphere is not similar to that between an object and its accident. Instead, it is like the connection that exists in the species between a genus and its differentia.²³ Being is a being of an object; when we abstract an essence from it that essence will not subsist. Although an accident seems to be identical to the existence of an object, it is not the being of that object. Mulla Sadra supports this view by relying on Ibn Sina's ontology, agreeing with him that an accident needs an object to become existent, whereas the case with existence and essence is different.²⁴ Being for Mulla Sadra has four characteristics:

- i Being stands as a unitary ground for its own modifications or the grounded.
- ii Being is separated from essence in thinking.
- iii Being is equivocal or systematically ambiguous.
- iv Being is dynamic and changes itself substantially.

In arguing for the primacy of Being and searching for a unitary ground, Mulla Sadra holds the view that essence is what distinguishes all entities from one another and limits them. When we say 'p' is 'q', the predicate 'q' distinguishes and limits 'p' by excluding other possibilities that can be predicated of it. Once the implication of this view is taken into account and Being is thought of as a mere mental concept, as advocated by Suhrawardi and his followers, we realize the following. First, there will be limitation in reality. Second, God's existence as pure Being will not only suffer limitation by His essence but will also become a mental concept that has no ontological status but is 'unlike everything, which is other than it [lit. non-existence i.e., essence], because every other thing, to be existent requires that existence be taken into consideration and joined to it'.²⁵

According to the first characteristic, Being stands as an ontological reality for all kinds of ontic entities or modes of Being. This relationship between Being and its ontic modifications is also similar to that between phenomenon and appearance in Heidegger's ontology. Heidegger makes a distinction between phenomenon and appearing. Phenomenon is something that shows itself or is manifest.²⁶ This showing itself is the way in which a phenomenon appears and is apprehended. The relationship between these two ontological spheres is illustrated in the metaphor of 'Krankheitserscheinungen' (symptoms of illness). The symptoms of influenza, such as high temperature and bodily pain, indicate a phenomenon that does not show itself, namely influenza. The phenomenon of this illness announces itself through its symptoms or signs. Appearing is, therefore, not a phenomenon but an announcing of a phenomenon, and a phenomenon is that which announces itself through its appearance.²⁷ In understanding the ontological division of Being into the ground and the grounded, or Being and its modes when it is understood in the light of emanation, we arrive at the conclusion that existence requires the grounded or its manifested modes to announce itself and to make itself intelligible, while the grounded depends on the ground for its existence.²⁸ Being, in this regard, is not one but many. The multiplicity of the grounded is based on the oneness of the ground. This describes Being as equivocal, as something used ambiguously in more than one sense (tashkik al-wujud).²⁹

The systematic ambiguity of Being represents the truth of Being as becoming and is also systematic and a perpetual progression without repeating itself. It is an intentional progress from the more indeterminate to the more determinate or concrete mode of Being. Thus, Being is a unitary ground that manifests itself in a variety of modes and gradations, vertically as well as horizontally. The modes of Being are different from one another in terms of prior and posterior, perfection and imperfection, strength and weakness.³⁰ As a consequence, Being is neither unity nor diversity, but unity in diversity. The degrees of diversity are different in intensity and perfection. Being continues beyond this diversity without ceasing to be a unity. To elucidate this point, Mulla Sadra utilized the Sufi interpretation of the unveiling of God (al-tajalli). From God, all modes of Being flow constantly in all realms of the microcosm and to the prime matter, which is capable only of accepting forms. In this way

Mulla Sadra conjoins a multi-dimensional conception of reality itself, which has become an open field, with possibilities. His ontology is, thereby, intended to be opposed to the monolithic system.

Since Being is equivocal and the only reality, it acts as the principles of identity and difference. The modes of Being are identical in their inner reality but different in terms of prior and posterior, perfection and imperfection, strength and weakness. This relationship between these two principles of Being becomes clear when the modes of Being are interpreted as gradations in terms of less and more perfect. For example, plants are less perfect than animals and animals less perfect than human beings. Being, therefore, has two different poles of perfection, but at the same time it can be achieved when Being shows itself as pure existence rather than essence.

Even at the level of regional ontology or ontic entities, the existence–essence dualism remains a mental factor. The systematic ambiguity of Being, as we see, is downward (tanzil), from pure to concrete modes of Being. This irreversible process, when it is understood in light of emanation, becomes problematic. Emanation, as a vertical systematic ambiguity, begins with the highest form of Being to the lowest. In this respect it cannot be seen as progress, but as a journey towards darkness and the unreal, while the systematic ambiguity of Being is an irreversible progress from less perfect to more perfect. In this case, it is not a journey towards the dark corners of existence, but rather a movement similar to the dialectic movement of Geist in Hegel's philosophy for accomplishing absoluteness. Only in this context of understanding it dialectically can the systematic ambiguity of Being be seen as progress.³¹ Although Hegel, unlike Mulla Sadra, sees the world as rational and holds the view that human inquiry must grasp this rationality in order to have an adequate apprehension of reality, the dialectic movement of Geist shares commonality with the ambiguity of Being. This commonality, however, does not deny the fundamental ontological differences between Hegel and Mulla Sadra's thought. For Hegel, reality is a range of universal thought determinations or categories: 'Metaphysics is nothing but the range of universal thought determinations and is as it were diamond-net into which we bring every thing in order to make it intelligible.'³² In considering reality as 'the range of universal thought determinations', Hegel lapses into the 'darkness of illusion' or 'nihilism' in the Heideggerian sense.

For Aristotle and Muslim peripatetic thinkers, substance, unlike accident, is unchangeable. Substance cannot become more or less substance. We can think of change in quality or of an object's becoming more or less white, but a substance such as an animal cannot become more or less animal. The species 'animal', despite changing qualities, remains the same. Keeping substance aloof from change and from all accidental qualities under the sway of change is, for Mulla Sadra, again based on the illusion of subject–object dualism, which he refutes. Since this dualism is a mental factor, the dynamic character of Being should be described as a substantial change (al-haraka al-jawhariyyah), according to which everything is continuously transformed. Such transformation implies that change is not limited to the four accidental categories of quality, quantity, place and position. In addition, there is a more fundamental change, that of substance itself.³³ Under the influence of change, Being transforms itself without losing its identity or unity. This transformation should be understood in the light of the principles of identity and difference mentioned earlier. Based on this view, Being passes through infinite accidental forms and substantial changes in an evolutionary manner.

From this survey of Mulla Sadra's doctrine of the primacy of Being, we see that his turn is as significant to Western thought as was Martin Heidegger's. Unfortunately, Mulla Sadra has received little attention in the West. This, to a great extent, as Nasr remarks, is due to the fact that the works of this Muslim thinker, unlike those of Ibn Sina and Ibn Rushd, were not translated into Latin.³⁴ Mulla Sadra's ontology is important for understanding the development of Muslim philosophy in the post Ibn Sinan era. It brings a new philosophical insight in dealing with the nature of reality and creates a major transition from essentialism to existentialism.

Mulla Sadra's ontological turn is dealt with in this book in six chapters. Chapter One is an introduction to the nature of this investigation and outlines the conflict between the doctrines of the primacy of Being and the primacy of essence. Chapter Two explores the philosophy of Suhrawardi and his doctrine of the primacy of essence. It discusses his arguments justifying this doctrine and the influence of the doctrine on the Islamic intellectual life in Isfahan. It also explains Suhrawardi's interpretation of the history of philosophy and Plato's influence on Suhrawardi's metaphysics, which has great significance for understanding Mulla Sadra's ontology and for comparing Mulla Sadra's ontology with that of Heidegger. Chapter Three deals with the development of the Isfahan school of philosophical thought during the Safawid dynasty. Mulla Sadra was a student of that school. Chapter Three also explores the ideas of thinkers such as Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i, the Suhrawardi tradition in the school, the life and philosophical development of Mulla Sadra and the major changes in his metaphysical position, namely his turn to the doctrine of the primacy of Being. The chapter concludes with Mulla Sadra's influence on the subsequent philosophical development in Persia and other parts of the Muslim world, particularly the rise of the philosophical schools in Teheran and Sabzawar during the Qajar period.

Chapter Four focuses on Mulla Sadra's ontological turn and his doctrine of the primacy of Being. This is compared with the ontological enterprise of Heidegger. The similarities between them are explained on the ground of three points: their criticism of Platonism, the primacy of Being, and the shortcomings of the Aristotelian logic and rationalistic discourse for understanding the meaning of Being. Also explained is how Mulla Sadra's ontology differs from that of Heidegger. Chapter Five investigates the nature of trans-substantial change as one of the central doctrines in Mulla Sadra's ontology and his interpretation of change as a clear departure from Platonism. Trans-substantial change is also compared with Hegel's and Bergson's understanding of the constant renewal of the world. The religious and philosophical consequences of this doctrine and its impact on the human understanding of truth, values and knowledge are considered.

Chapter Six explores Mulla Sadra's interpretation of knowledge by both the presence and the failure of the rationalistic apprehension of Being. Mulla Sadra's rejection of pure rationality and his reliance instead on intuition or mystic experience for knowing the inner reality of Being is explained. The analysis includes the nature and different kinds of intuitive knowledge (al-idrak), beginning from sense-perception to intellectual perception. Two major epistemological issues discussed by many Muslim philosophers apart from Mulla Sadra are also addressed in this chapter. These are the unity of the intelligent and the intelligible, and God's knowledge of the world. Mulla Sadra's analysis of these issues is a significant part of the chapter.

Chapter Seven crystallizes the book and presents the contribution of Mulla Sadra's philosophy to the development of intellectual life in the Muslim world. His significance is seen in terms of his ontology in dealing with the doctrine of the primacy of Being, the gradations and trans-substantial change of the modalities of Being, and finally the role of his metaphysics in determining the unity of the intelligent and the intelligible, which makes reality accessible to the human mind.

In interpreting Mulla Sadra's main philosophical doctrines I have tried to compare them with philosophical views and doctrines of some Western philosophers such as Hegel, Heidegger and Bergson. At a number of places the similarity between the existentialist views of this Muslim philosopher and the ontological enterprise of Heidegger are elucidated. It should also be remembered that Mulla Sadra and these Western philosophers, in particular Heidegger, not only come from different cultural background; their metaphysical objectives will remain parallel. I have used the original works of Mulla Sadra in Arabic and in working on this project over the last two years I have benefited from the writing of Seyyed Hossein Nasr and Fazlur Rahman on Mulla Sadra in English. Although few works are published on Mulla Sadra in English, recently much interest has been shown in rereading of his philosophy. In 1913 Max Horten wrote Das Philosophische System von Schirazi. This was followed by Henry Corbin's edition of a selection of Mulla Sadra's writings in French. Thinkers such as William Chittick and Oliver Leaman have contributed articles on Mulla Sadra's epistemology in the Journal of Transcendent Philosophy, a special issue on Mulla Sadra (Vol. 1, No. 1, June 2000). In 1981 James Morris translated Mulla Sadra's al-Hikma al-'Arshiyyah (The Wisdom of the Throne) into English. Seyyed Hossein

Nasr, Hossein Ziai and Muhammad Abdul Haq have published articles on Mulla Sadra's life and aspects of his philosophy. However, the only systematic work to date in English is Fazlur Rahman's The Philosophy of Mulla Sadra (1975). According to Nasr, this work is a rationalistic interpretation of Mulla Sadra's transcendent philosophy without recourse to the living oral tradition and consideration of the spiritual and Gnostic background of Mulla Sadra, which are significant for understanding his ideas. In 1992 Parviz Morewedge translated Mulla Sadra's al-Mash'ir into English, a work that summarizes Mulla Sadra's metaphysical system. An investigation into the philosophy of this Muslim thinker, as we see, is beset with some difficulties. Mulla Sadra's major philosophical work Al-Asfar, which presents his entire philosophical system, has not been translated into Persian and Urdu but not into English. With the exception of Fazlur Rahman's work no comprehensive book on his philosophy is available. In addition to this limitation in accessing Mulla Sadra's philosophy in English, his style of writing is sophisticated and complex. It covers a broad area of metaphysics, Gnosticism and theology. It deals with the views of Mulla Sadra's predecessors critically Mulla Sadra's new philosophical ideas are presented or constructed. Despite these difficulties it should be remembered that Mulla Sadra's philosophy is the product of the sixteenth century but quite relevant to our understanding of reality and contemporary society. His doctrine of the trans-substantial change and his views on novelty and constant transformation of history could play a profound role on our ethical as well as political life in the Muslim world.

I am indebted to Dr Purushottama Bilimoria at the University of Melbourne for his assistance and encouragement to write on this project and publish it. My acknowledgment is gratefully made to Prof. Gholam Hossein Ebrahimi Dinani of the Department of Philosophy, Teheran University for his valuable time and valuable discussion on Mulla Sadra, and to the Sadra Islamic Philosophy Research Institute (SIPRI) in Teheran for their support and assistance. My thanks go to Donna Williams who went through the manuscript and enabled me to root out inelegancies of expression. I wish also to express my appreciation to the editor of the series of Ashgate World Philosophies in which this book appears.

The School of Illuminationism and the Doctrine of the Primacy of Essence

Al-Ghazali's (1058–1111) polemic of rationalistic philosophy, along with the Seljuq dynasty's revival of Ash'ari Sunni theology, contributed to the eclipse of philosophical discourse in some parts of the Muslim world.¹ These two factors, however, did not disrupt the intellectual continuity of Shi'i twelfth century, Muslim philosophical thinking forged two different directions: the rationalistic discourse re-emerged under the influence of Aristotelian philosophy in Spain led by Muslim philosophers such as Ibn Bajjah (1106–1139), Ibn Tufayl (d. 1185) and Ibn Rushd (1126–1198); and Illuminationism (al-ishraqiyyah) spread in Persia.

The school of Illuminationism, which is significant for our understanding of Mulla Sadra's philosophy, was founded by Shahab al-Din Yahya b. Habash b. Amirak Suhrawardi, known also as Shaykh al-Ishraq, the master of illumination. Suhrawardi's date of birth is not known precisely. We only know that he was born in Suhraward or 'Suhrabard', a Kurdish village between Zenjan and Bijar. According to Mulla Salih Ibrahimi, Shahab al-Din Suhrawardi was originally Kurdish and the nephew of Mulla Omer Suhrawardi, another Kurdish Muslim scholar from the same village and of Sunni-Islamic origin. Mulla Omer and Shahab al-Din also wrote poetry in Kurdish; some poems of the latter were published by Ibrahimi. It is also reported in Nuzat al-arwah e rawzat al-afrah by Shams al-Din Shahrazuri that 'Shuraward' was a Kurdish village.² In the tenth century, the village was destroyed by the Mongols. According to Noldeke and Marquart, its name derived from Suhrab, who was a Persian governor of Hira.³ Today, Suhraward (Suhrabard) is located in the municipality of Azerbaijan in Iran. For this reason, some people, without knowing the ethnic make-up of the region, think that Suhrawardi was originally Turkish or Persian.

Shahrazuri states that Suhrawardi was born in 1166 or 1171.⁴ Nasr also gives two dates. In one of his early works, Nasr says that Suhrawardi was born in 1153;⁵ later, in his introduction to Opera Metaphysica et Mystical, he indicates that Suhrawardi was born in 1171.⁶ After receiving an Islamic education, Suhrawardi travelled through Persia to Anatolia and Syria. He was a contemporary and classmate of Fakhr al-Din al-Razi; the two had studied under Shaykh Mujjad al-Din Jili and later under Zahi al-Din Qari in Isfahan. On one of his journeys from Damascus to Aleppo, the capital city of the Ayyubid Sunni dynasty,⁷ Suhrawardi met Malik Zahir, the governor of Aleppo and the son of Salah al-Din al-Ayyubi, who patronized him and engaged him in conversation on thorny philosophical and theological issues with a cluster of the 'ulama in Aleppo.⁸ Another reason for travelling to Aleppo – a centre of the new political conflict between Islam and Christendom – rather than to a peaceful region, might be seen in Suhrawardi's ethnic affiliation with the Ayyubi family.

The political situation in Syria at that time could be defined as crucial and in turmoil. The Shi'ite Muslims who had long ruled Syria and North Africa, particularly Egypt, lost their hegemony to the Sunni Muslims. Salaha al-Din destroyed the Fatimid Shi'i dynasty in Egypt and Syria. In addition to this internal conflict between Sunnism and Shi'ism over political hegemony, the Crusaders appeared as an eminent external force against the Muslim world. Salah al-Din Ayyubi, who represented the Sunni political hegemony, was seen as the only one with authority to protect the interest of Sunni Islamic civilization from these external and internal rivalries. Under such unfavourable circumstances for the development of philosophy, it seems that, by travelling to the heart of this turmoil, Suhrawardi chose a wrong direction and time to advocate his philosophical ideas. The Sunni Islamic world, facing threats from Christendom represented by the Crusaders and from Shi'ism, was not resilient to change and could not tolerate innovation. The Sunni 'ulama, considering themselves the guardians and protectors of Islamic faith and identity, were looking at any philosophical inclination or intellectual contention with suspicion. Suhrawardi's philosophical ideas, in the court of Malik Zahir, were seen in this political context; on them were visited the hostility and rejection of the institution of the 'ulama. The 'ulama branded Suhrawardi's ideas as heretical and asked Malik Zahir to put the young philosopher to death. Malik Zahir was reluctant to do this against his master and friend, so the 'ulama approached Salah al-Din, who ordered his son to act. Suhrawardi was finally executed in 1208 at the age of thirty-eight. According to Shahrazuri, there are several accounts of his death. One reports that he was starved to death in prison. Another states that Suhrawardi himself fasted until he died. Some held the view that he was suffocated, executed or thrown from the wall of the fortress and then burned.⁹

The term 'ishraq', which is Arabic for 'illumination', was used before Suhrawardi by Ibn Sina in his Mantiq al-Mashriqiyyan, where he talks about the oriental wisdom as a superior source of knowledge to the rationalistic discourse. Suhrawardi was aware of the significance of Ibn Sina's view but believed that Ibn Sina was unable to comprehend the importance of oriental cognition as he did not have the proper epistemological tools or access to the sources of ishraqi wisdom (Gnosticism). He states in his treatise Risaleh safari Simurgh that seeking the Truth through rationalistic discourse is like seeking the sun with a lamp.¹⁰

In Suhrawardi's view, the history of philosophy did not begin with Thales in 600 BC. Instead Hermes is considered by this Muslim thinker to be the father of illuminative philosophical thinking or wisdom. Hermes was followed by sages from Greece, Persia and the Muslim world. In Greece, this type of philosophical thinking came to an end with Aristotle, who replaced the cognitive tool of illumination with the rationalistic discourse. But the illuminative philosophy continued to develop in Persia, and after the advent of Islam was continued by Muslim Sufis such as Dhu al-Nun al-Misri, Abu Salih Tustari, Abu Yazid Bistami, Mansur al-Hallaj, Abu Hassan Kharraqain and finally Suhrawardi himself.

What is important for us in understanding the history of philosophy described by Suhrawardi and for developing our argument is that this Muslim thinker acknowledged the connection between Plato's thought and his own metaphysics. The depiction of this connection is significant when we try to compare Mulla Sadra's metaphysical background and criticism of Illuminationism and Heidegger's interpretation of 'nihilism' in the West by tracing them back to Plato. To demonstrate similarities between Mulla Sadra's opposition to Illuminationism, in particular the doctrine of the primacy of essence, and Heidegger's negative attitude towards nihilism, we need to highlight the relationship between Plato's metaphysics and Illuminationism. We begin by explaining how Suhrawardi, in his introduction to Hikmat al-Ishraq, refers explicitly to Plato and the place of his ideas in the development of the illuminative philosophy,

In all I have said about the science of lights and that which is not based upon it, I have been assisted by those who have travelled the path of God. This science is the very intuition of the inspired and illumined Plato, the guide and master of philosophy, and of those who came before him from the time of Hermes, 'the father of philosophy' upon Plato's time, including such mighty pillars of philosophy as Empedocles, Pythagoras, and others.¹¹

It is customary in the history of Western philosophy to begin with Thales (a Milesian philosopher of 640–546 BC) as the father of Western philosophy. To understand the development of Greek philosophy we must also distinguish between the pre-Socratic and the post-Socratic periods. But for Suhrawardi, philosophy began with Hermes and Plato rather than with Thales. For Suhrawardi, this was the demarcation between two stages of development in the history of this type of philosophical thinking. The science of light or the illuminative philosophy came down from Hermes to the sages of ancient Iran and Egypt and thence to Plato. Greek, ancient Iranian, Egyptian and Islamic sources have become the foundation of this type of philosophy. In dealing with these historical roots and sources, Suhrawardi mentions the ancient Iranian religion, Zoroastrianism, several times. But as John Walbridge argues, this in no way indicates a revival of pre-Islamic religious belief or an endorsement of metaphysical dualism in Suhrawardi's philosophical system.¹² This Muslim thinker also describes the original form of Zoroastrianism as monotheism, to which King Gushtasp later introduced dualism.¹³ He believes that Zoroastrianism as a religion is different from the teachings of the Zoroastrian sages that he follows, such as Kiumarsh, Faridun and Kaikhusraw, who guided their community towards the light by their illuminated wisdom, and who were in turn different from the so-called Manichaeans.¹⁴

As far as Greek thought is concerned, Plato's metaphysics and his allegory of the cave were an inspiration for Suhrawardi.¹⁵ He sees the ascent of the human being from the cave towards the light as a real liberation from the domain of shadows of the contingent world. Attaining the Truth is determined by this journey of the seeker of the Truth who attempts to liberate him/herself from the dogma of the cave and look into the light. In Plato's philosophy, those who liberate themselves from the shadows of the cave and are unshackled will be able to see the sun. In his short treatise Al-Qissa al-Ghurbat al-Gharbiyyah (Story of the Occidental Exile), Suhrawardi pursues Plato's allegory with some modification. In this work, the seeker of the Truth, like the prisoner freed from the cave, must undertake the spiritual journey of his/her liberation from the occident, which is the world of darkness and material existence, to the orient, the world of light and archangels. In Suhrawardi's allegory, human beings are not shackled in a cave but are imprisoned at the bottom of a well and left in total darkness. These prisoners were originally from Yemen (a land between the occident and the orient of the Muslim world), and were sent into exile to Qirawan, a city in Tunis, in the west of the orient. Like the prisoner unshackled from the cave, the escapee from the well will return to the well after seeing the light of the orient because he has not discarded all his bonds.

In the context of Plato's metaphysical analysis, according to Suhrawardi, the rationalistic approach of Aristotle broke the chain of continuity of the Platonic philosophical tradition. Discursive knowledge and rationalistic thinking replaced intuitive knowledge. For this reason and due to the dominance of Plato's metaphysics in the history of Illuminationist philosophy, thinkers like al-Jurjani define the adherents of Illuminationism as "philosophers whose master was Plato".¹⁶ In al-Talwihat, Suhrawardi, besides discussing his doctrine of the principality of essence, presents a critical study of Aristotle's categories. First he argues that the categories were discovered by Archytas (a Pythagorean thinker) before Aristotle. Second he reduces their number from ten to four and adds 'motion' as a new category.¹⁷ In this work, Suhrawardi encounters Aristotle (the master of discursive knowledge) in a state between dreaming and being awake; it is in this state that their discussion on the origin of Illuminationism, the distinction between discursive and intuitive knowledge, takes place.¹⁸

Suhrawardi not only incorporated Plato's metaphysics into his own but he also considered his philosophy of illumination as the continuation of

Platonism. He recognizes Plato not as a philosopher but as one of the masters of Illuminationism:

Plato and his companions showed plainly that they believed the Maker of the universe and the world of intellect to be the light when they said that the pure light is the world of intellect. Of himself, Plato said that in certain of his spiritual conditions he would shed his body and become free from matter. Then he would see light and splendour within his essence. He would ascend to that all-encompassing divine cause and would seem to be located and suspended in it, beholding a mighty light in that lofty and divine place.¹⁹

At another place, Suhrawardi compares Plato's philosophy with the allusions of the prophets,²⁰ and describes himself not as the founder of Illuminationism but as a follower of masters such as Hermes and Plato.²¹ In classifying seekers of knowledge, Suhrawardi also places Plato among those who possess perfect discursive knowledge and illumination. A philosopher like Plato, in possession of these two faculties of knowledge, is the vicegerent of God and a person wise enough to be a leader or ruler of society and a philosopher king. By contrast, the rationalist philosophers such as Aristotle, proficient only in discursive knowledge, are not suitable candidates for such elevated positions in society.

It is worth mentioning that, although it does not have a direct relationship with the essence of things, Suhrawardi still considers discursive knowledge to be one of the cognitive tools. But for Suhrawardi, a true philosopher is one who is capable, like Plato, of possessing discursive as well as intuitive knowledge and using both, in particular the latter, for understanding the nature of reality and knowing the Truth. Suhrawardi's opposition to Aristotle, and to Muslim Peripatetic thinkers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, can thus be elucidated in the light of Aristotle's metaphysical position, his criticism of Plato, and his reliance on discursive knowledge in his epistemology. Aristotle's philosophy is seen as a philosophical tendency hostile towards Platonism and as a philosophical position yielding a distorted notion of reality.

Plato assumed that the plurality of individual objects could be unified under common essences or Ideas.²² The essences have their own reality as objective essences rather than mere universal concepts that exist only in thinking. To Plato, referring to the universal concept or quiddity of an object also means referring to its objective essence. Besides, essences do not rely on individual objects to exist, because they are transcendent and spatially detached from them. The essences constitute the reality of individual objects but do not reside in them in the sensible world.

How does the human mind know and reach these transcendent essences? In the Symposium, Plato describes a procedure or 'itinerary' for this. For example, one can arrive at realizing the essence of 'beauty' by ascending from beautiful objects to the pure notion of beauty and thence to the form of this essence, which is universal and self-subsistent.²³ Individual objects, which are detached from these essences, are objects of ‘opinion’ and ‘sense-experience’. In contrast, the essences are not in the domain of ‘opinion’ and ‘sense-experience’ but objects that can be ‘known’. Here and in the Platonic context, true knowledge corresponds to the apprehension or intelligibility of the essences when the human mind is turned upwards in the method of ascent.²⁴ This kind of knowledge and way of knowing became in the Republic a prerogative of the philosophers who seek to turn their minds upwards in order to see the universal transcendent essences. A philosopher should not be interested in a multiplicity of individual objects of the sensible world but in their unified essences or the source of their existence in the ideal world. For Suhrawardi, this upward turn or the sight of the sun in Plato’s theory of cognition is illumination (al-ishraq) and the source of true knowledge through which the human mind can apprehend the transcendent reality.

There is more than a convergence of views between Platonism and Illuminationism; in my opinion the latter has a parasitical relationship with the former. Further similarity between these two philosophical schools can be found in Plato’s analogy of the idea of Good with Light. Among all essences, the Form of the Good is both supreme and the source of all other essences. This notion of the Good is also compared to the sun or the ‘Light’, shining upon all other essences and making them visible and intelligible:

This, then, which imparts truth to the things that are known and the power of knowing to the knower, you may affirm to be the Form of the good. It is the cause of knowledge and truth, and you may conceive it as being known, but while knowledge and truth are both beautiful, you will be right in thinking it other and fairer than these. And as in the other world it is right to think light and sight sun-like, but not right to think them the sun, so here it is right to think both knowledge and truth like the good, but not right to think either of them the good. The state or nature of the good must be honoured still more highly.²⁵

The Form of the Good is to an extent the foundation of all other essences. Their existence and intelligibility are thinkable only in their relation to the Good. In understanding this relationship Heidegger remarks that ‘the highest idea, although itself barely visible, is what makes possible both being and unhiddenness, i.e. it is what empowers being and unhiddenness as what they are. The highest idea, therefore, is this empowering; the empowering for being which as such gives itself simultaneously with the empowerment of unhiddenness as occurrence.’²⁶ This empowering is the characteristic and the essential quality of the Form of the Good, which corresponds to the symbol of light. Similarly for Suhrawardi the world is made up of contingent light, which depends for its existence on the ultimate light or the Light of lights (nur al-anwar): ‘Accident light is not light in itself, since its existence is in another. Thus, it can only be light due to another. The incorporeal pure light is light in itself. Therefore, everything that is light in itself is incorporeal pure light.²⁷

The world is indebted to the Light of lights or the form of the Good not only for being visible and comprehended but also for what it is. The coming into being and ceasing to be of everything in the contingent world is empowered by the Light of lights. In the realm below the empowering Light there are four forms of light: immaterial, luminous, accidents and bodies. The immaterial light is the cause of the other three lights and is also a self-conscious substantial light. God, the intellects of the spheres, human intellect and animal soul are all immaterial lights, which cause the other three forms of light to exist. Since the contingent lights belong to a lower ontological division, they are less bright. They also share the same essence, as all of them spring from the same source. They are also gradations of the same reality but different in their intensity and perfection in brightness. This ground for making a distinction between one contingent light and another is not the realization of their 'differentia' or 'accidents'. It is due to their rank in the hierarchy of emanation. Two contingent lights are different because they vary in perfection or the intensity of light. Human beings, for example, are more perfect than animals. They both belong to two different ranks of existence. The vertical emanation from the Light of lights goes from the Intellects of the celestial sphere to the individualization of light in accidents and bodies. Based on the relationship between the immaterial light and the other three forms, the immaterial light is divided into dominating and managing light. The former functions like the Platonic Forms and the latter is the individual soul in an individual body:

Even though the managing light comes from one of the exalted dominating lights and accepts many illuminations, it is not like a dominating light in perfection of its substance. The dominating light brings into being the managing incorporeal light only due to perfections of the barrier acquired from the mighty lords and in order to manage it in the way appropriate for controlling barriers of finite power. By this, it strengthens its connection with the barrier.²⁸

In explaining this relationship among various forms of light, Suhrawardi thinks in line with Plato, but at the same time he does not repeat the Platonic doctrine of Ideas without alteration. For him, the dominating light is concerned with species. Every species that exists as a dominating light has a universal form called 'Lord of the Species'. These Lords of Species or Forms are not universal essences shared by all particulars. They exist at a higher realm and are independent of particulars. Their universality is determined by the same relationship to all particulars of the same species. The Lords of Species are the causes of the particulars and are universals in the sense that they have this causal relationship to all particulars of the same species. For example, the universal Form of 'cat' has the same causal relationship to all individual cats in the material world. This can be seen as a difference between Suhrawardi's understanding of the universal Forms and that of Plato. Another essential difference to be noted here is that Suhrawardi, unlike Plato, believes that the domain of the Forms is beyond the cognitive capacity of reason and is to be apprehended intuitively. In this way, Suhrawardi followed Plato but at the same time offered his own point of view and contribution to the doctrine of the Forms. He accepts the doctrine but thinks of the Forms as causes of individual beings, not as a universal predicate shared by all of them. The question that arises here is how a multiplicity of contingent lights can arise from the simple and indivisible nature of the Light of lights.

Suhrawardi found a Neoplatonic answer to this question: from the Light of lights emanates the lower levels of contingent lights, the angelic order, and the archetypes. The Light of lights is the single origin of all things and gives constant illumination to them. It is the highest in the metaphysical hierarchy of being, not only in terms of rank but also as the most perfect source and origin of all contingent lights. The emanated realms, unlike the Light of lights, are different in their degree of perfection and remoteness from their illuminating source. They are either self-subsistent or dependent on something else. In addition to this classification they can be distinguished by their degree of self-consciousness. A self-conscious being is either self-subsistent, as in the case of the Light of lights, the angels and the human consciousness, or depends on something other than itself for its self-awareness, as in the case of stars or fire. Another division of the lights is based on their degree of self-awareness. A light is either self-aware of or obvious to itself. The self-aware light is either self-subsistent or depends on something other than itself in order to become aware of itself. The classification continues and the differences between all things at various levels of this hierarchy of light depend on the intensity of light manifested in each kind of being. But the illuminating source or the Light of lights is not affected by this multiplicity of its own manifestation and gradation:

Multiplicity cannot conceivably result from the Light of lights in its unity, nor can any darkness be conceived to result from a dusky substance or state, nor yet two lights result from the Light of lights in its unity. Therefore, that which first results from the Light of lights must be a single incorporeal light. This then cannot be distinguished from the Light of lights by any dark state acquired from the Light of lights. This would imply the multiplicity of aspects in the Light of lights in contradiction to the demonstration that the lights, particularly the incorporeal lights, do not differ in their realities. Therefore, the Light of lights and the first light that results from it are only to be distinguished by perfection and deficiency.²⁹

of being in the ontological system of other Muslim emanationists such as al-Farabi (c. 870–950). According to this Muslim philosopher, the first emanation from the 'One' was not a multiplicity of contingent beings but the first intellect capable of knowing the 'One' as well as itself. The second intellect emanates from the first intellect and the third from the second intellect, which gives rise to the sphere of the fixed stars. This process of emanation continues until the emanation of the tenth intellect is reached, and with it the corresponding spheres of Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the sun, Venus, Mercury and the moon. At the lowest level of emanation lies the 'prime matter'. This contains the four elements of water, air, fire and earth. These include minerals, plants, animals and finally human beings.³⁰ Similarly, from the Light of lights emanates the first light, and from this the incorporeal light and barrier. This emanation continues until there are the nine spheres and the series of lights from which no other incorporeal light emanates. Suhrawardi also believes that emanation is a pre-eternal process because the Light of lights neither changes nor withers away.³¹ His analysis of human existence is also based on his understanding of reality. As a thinker who believes in the reality of the incorporeal realm, he divides human beings into two parts: incorporeal (soul) and corporeal (body). These two parts represent light and darkness. Nor is a relationship between them necessary. The incorporeal soul, although attached to the body, is independent and survives without embodiment. The corporeality of human existence has at the same time an attachment to darkness, which is a barrier that foils the human soul's access to knowledge of the reality. Identifying the human soul with light and the body with darkness represents for Suhrawardi two aspects of human existence, which are essentially distinct and belong to two different ontological ranks. The human soul is also in constant struggle to keep itself aloof from the influence of the body in order to reach perfection, which can be obtained by giving up worldly pleasure and the demands of corporeal life. This is a journey in human life towards the abode of pure light and the Sufi path of self-purification and elevation.³²

As mentioned earlier, Suhrawardi acknowledges his debt to Plato, under whose influence he rejects the question of the primacy of being and treats being as nothing, and develops arguments for the primacy of essence (asalat al-mahiyyah). For him, something exists when its essence becomes cognizant; its reality relies on its essence. The arguments in vindication of this metaphysical position rotate around the philosophical conviction that existence is conceptual and has no reality of its own in the external world. It has no representation outside the human mind. Before explaining Suhrawardi's main arguments it is important to mention some considerations discussed by him in Section Three of the Third Discourse ('Concerning the Illuminationsit Judgments on Certain Points') in Hikmat al-Ishraq. These considerations are:

- Against Muslim Aristotelian–Neoplatonic thinkers he argues that ‘There is nothing in existence, which is itself the quiddity of existence; for as soon as we conceive its concept, we may wonder whether or not it has existence.’³³ This will eventually result in an infinite regress, because existence would have another existence and so on.
- If we think that essence has existence, then it should have a relation to it. This relation would also need existence, which stands in a relation to the previous relation and so on. This would continue to infinity.³⁴
- If existence were in entities and were not an essence, then it would become a state in them. In this case existence would become dependent on them. ‘Thus its locus would be actualized, but it would exist before its locus. Its locus could not be actualized simultaneously with it, since its locus would exist with the existence, not by the existence – which is absurd.’³⁵
- According to Muslim Aristotelian–Neoplatonic thinkers, the locus is prior to an accident. Thus, as pointed out by Suhrawardi, the existence would be prior to existence; this is not only absurd, but also impossible.³⁶
- Muslim Aristotelian–Neoplatonic thinkers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina believed that ‘existence’ was added to ‘essence’ of an entity as an accident. But, according to Suhrawardi, if we think of existence as an accident, it should subsist in its locus. In this case existence would need its locus for its realization. Since the locus is existent, then its subsistence would be circular, and this is again absurd for Suhrawardi.

Let us now turn to Suhrawardi’s main argument for the primacy of essence. In this argument he tries to prove that existence is either a universal concept or a particular. If it is a universal concept and shared like any other universal concept by all particular existents, existence remains in the domain of thinking as something conceptual. If existence is a particular, it is dependent on its essence. Let us say that ‘existence’ is a universal concept because all things that exist do so equally – or they share existence. In this case, ‘existence’ as a universal concept becomes a universal nature. But there are other universal concepts such as ‘blackness’ or ‘whiteness’ of the same nature. Could we say that existence, like these universal concepts, is a universal essence? If the answer to this question is ‘yes’, then existence becomes a universal concept; otherwise we have to think of it as a particular entity.³⁷ If existence is thought to be a particular entity, it still remains a mental concept, and essence becomes real in which a particular existence is actualized. A particular existence is nothing more than its essence. As Suhrawardi argues, ‘existence’ is conceived in respect to a particular existence and the particular existence is also equivalent to essence. Existence is thus contingent on a particular existence. To clarify this metaphysical position Suhrawardi states:

Next we argue that if blackness is non-existent, then its existence is not actual. Therefore its existence is not existent, since its existence is also non-existent. If we do intellect existence and judge that it is not existent, then the concept of existence is distinct from the concept of existent. We might say that blackness, which we had taken as non-existent, now exists and that its existence was not yet actual but then becomes actual. If so, the actuality of the existence would not be the existence itself, and the existence would have existence. This same argument applies to the existence of existence, and so on to infinity. But a simultaneous ordered infinity of attributes is absurd.³⁸

What we understand from this is that 'existence' cannot be a primordial ontological condition for a thing. That primordial ontological condition is 'essence', which occupies a primary position on which the existence of all things relies and which supports the contingency of existence.

In Suhrawardi's philosophy 'essence' is also equated with 'light'. God, who is the Essence of the essences, is the Light of lights. Here we find a lucid distinction between the Light of lights as the cause and empowering light of all lights and the contingent or caused and empowered lights. The Light of lights cannot be thought of as another contingent light; all contingent lights are dependent on something other than them to exist and the Light of lights is their final cause, which has no cause. It is that being that does not fail to exist and so is necessary. This argument, which is originally Aristotelian, is also used by Muslim theologians and philosophers in a variety of forms to prove the existence of God. The Light of lights provides constant illumination and brings all contingent lights into existence. These lights are either self-subsistent, for example incorporeal lights, or they are accidental and their subsistence relies on something other than themselves.

The individual self, which is a contingent light, is more illuminated as it nears its source. This increase in the intensity of illumination occurs with the abolition of the ontological distance between the Light of lights and the self. Suhrawardi calls this proximity to the Light of lights 'presence', the awareness of which is 'knowledge by presence', which is considered to be the most reliable source of cognition. 'Knowledge by presence' or intuitive knowledge, however, had a significant impact on Mulla Sadra's epistemology, which is discussed in Chapter Six.

The thinkers who were responsible for the early transmission of Suhrawardi's ideas and were known for their writings on Illuminationism were Shams al-Din Muhammad al-Shahrazuri (d. 1288), Sa'ad b. Mansur Ibn Kammunah (d. 1284) and Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi (d. 1311). Al-Shahrazuri is considered to be the first major commentator on Suhrawardi's thought. Ibn Kammunah wrote on Suhrawardi in al-Talwihat, a book studied widely by the advocates of Illuminationism in Persia. Al-Shirazi incorporated Illuminationism into Ibn Sina's ontology and the doctrine of the Unity of Being of Ibn 'Arabi.³⁹ From the thirteenth century onwards, other thinkers, such as Muhammad b. Zayn al-Din b. Ibrahim Asha‘i (d. 1479) and Giyath al-Din Mansur Dashtaki (d. 1541), wrote under the influence of Suhrawardi’s illuminative philosophy.

Suhrawardi’s Illuminationism changed philosophical tradition in the Muslim world by bridging the gulf between Gnosticism and rationalism. It left a great mark on the development of intellectual life in the Muslim world. Its influence can be found in Persia and the Indian subcontinent to the present day. The magnitude of this influence will be discussed in the next chapter on the Safawid period in Isfahan, when Mulla Sadra came under the sway of this philosophical tradition at the beginning of his philosophical training and vocation.

The School of Isfahan and Mulla Sadra's Departure from Suhraward's Tradition

Suhrawardi died young but the impact of his philosophy on Muslim intellectual life was outstanding. He advocated the doctrine of the primacy of essence and established harmony between discursive and intuitive knowledge, with an emphasis on the latter as a reliable source of knowing the Truth. The predominance of Suhrawardi's philosophy was greatly felt in Persia and his school, namely Illuminationism, flourished in Isfahan during the Safawid dynasty (1051–1732), attracting a number of Shi'ite thinkers, including Mulla Sadra. To understand the popularity of Illuminationism during that period it is helpful to discern the origin and development of the Safawid dynasty and to explain why the Safawid rulers patronized this type of philosophy in their dynasty.

The Safawid was originally a Sufi order whose founder, Shaykh Safi al-Din (1252–1334), was a Sunni Sufi master descended from a Kurdish family in north-western Iran.¹ Nasr, in his article 'The School of Isfahan', does not mention the ethnic and sectarian origin of the order, but he gives the title Ardibili to the founder because the family of Safi al-Din had settled at Ardibil and Shaykh Safi al-Din died there.² At another place, Nasr acknowledges that the order belonged originally to Sunni Islam as an offshoot of the Qadiriyyah order founded in Baghdad.³ According to Percy Sykes, however, the dynasty traces its descent from Musa al-Kazim (745–799), the seventh Shi'i imam for the Twelvers. Sykes does not say whether this Shi'i genealogy of the order was given by Shaykh Safi al-Din or was fabricated at the later stage of the encroachment of the order into Shi'i Imamism.

The political orientation of the order and the transformation of the sect to Shi'i Islam began with Shaykh Junayd (d. 1460), the grandson of Shaykh Safi al-Din, and his son 'Ali (d. 1496). Shaykh Junayd advocated the idea of jihad (holy war) against non-Muslims as well as corrupt Muslim rulers in Persia. He recruited supporters from Turkish and Kurdish tribes and called them Qizilbash (those who wore red headgear with twelve gores for the twelve Shi'i imams). But the total conversion of the order to Shi'i Islam and the establishment of the dynasty took place at the time of Isma'il (1487–1524), also known as Shah Isma'il, the grandson of Junayd who marched on Tabriz in 1501 and designated himself a king (shah).⁴ The conversion of the order by Shah Isma'il, as it is seen in the political history of the order, provided a terra firma for consolidating Shah Isma'il's own political hegemony. Relying on the notion of the messianic or the Shi'i doctrine of the imamate, Shah Isma'il claimed to be imam al-muntazr (Awaited One) or the Mahdi. On this matter, Nasr asserts that the veneration of 'Ali in the inner tendency of the order was responsible for this conversion:

Both Shah Ni'mat Allah who came to Persia from Aleppo, and Shaikh Safi al-Din from Ardabil were at first Sufis of Sunni background such as the Shaziliyya and Qadiriyya brotherhoods. But the inner belief in the valayat of 'Ali gradually transformed the outer form of the orders as well into thoroughly Shi'i organizations, although the inward structure of these orders, being sufi, remained above the Shi'i-Sunni distinctions.⁵

In my opinion Shah Isma'il combined political and divine authority by seeking absolute power and devotion from his followers. This claim, however, was challenged by the followers after Shah Isma'il's defeat by the Sunni Ottoman Empire during the reign of Selim I (r. 1512–1520) at the battle of Chaldiran in 1514.⁶ To neutralize the tension and avoid humiliation before his followers the defeated Shah Isma'il adopted a softer theological position by making Twelver Shi'ism the official religion of the state. He also began to force the Sunni population to convert in the areas he controlled in Persia. Many Shi'i scholars such as Shaykh 'Ali b. Abd al-'Ali Karaki, Shaykh Baha al-Din 'Amili and Ni'mat Allah Jaza'iri were invited from Iraq, Lebanon and Bahrain to participate in the establishment of Shi'i educational institutions in Persia. Further to this, the Safawid state embarked on a plan to eliminate the rival sects, in particular those with antagonistic attitude towards Shi'ism. The messianic-extremist Shi'i sects and Sufi orders such as Naqshabandiyyah and Khalwatiyyah were banned; Sunni Muslims and other religious minority groups were persecuted. It was during this time that Persia was transformed from a predominantly Sunni Islam to a Shi'i Islamic dynasty.⁷

There were, however, three groups that contributed to the foundation of the Safawid state and its development: the Qizilbash, who represented the popular Sufi movement; the institution of the 'ulama or salaried clergy; and finally, at the top, the ruler. The first group was gradually suppressed for political reasons and the second group drew closer to the royal court. With the advent of Shah Tahmasib (1524–1576), the state openly supported the 'ulama against the Qizilbash and other Sufi orders. Shah Abbas I (1571–1629) recruited many 'ulama in different administrative positions. But his support for the scholars of Gnosticism and real Sufis never ceased. The development of philosophy in Isfahan is indebted to Shah Abbas's patronage of scholars of theology and Gnosticism. It was during his reign that the philosophy of illumination received official recognition and was advocated by some influential Shi'i thinkers who remained close to the monarch. As we see, on one side the Safawid dynasty stood hostile towards Sunni thought and Sufism, while on the other side it did not curtail the development of illuminative philosophy of Suhrawardi and theological debates on various religious matters.⁸

This Shi'i state, like other Islamic states, was supportive of a philosophical discourse favourable to the metaphysical foundation of its political power. Intellectual endeavour was consequently subject to the favour of despotic rulers who were either for or against it. This was characteristic of the political environment in which ideas were shaped in the Muslim world. Philosophy, unlike religious discourse, never enjoyed a long-term engagement and relationship to the state and was forced by the clergy to stand outside the educational institutions most of the time. Nevertheless, there were reasons for the revival of Illuminationism during the Safawid dynasty. As mentioned earlier, the Safawid was a gnostic Sufi order that was transformed into a political movement. Unlike other Islamic dynasties it was not based purely on military insurgence. It was expected to incline towards a type of metaphysics that could easily be manipulated for political ends. Illuminationism, as Amin Razavi remarks, provided such a philosophical foundation for the political convictions of the dynasty.⁹ The contribution of some great Shi'i thinkers with political influence was to promote Suhrawardi's philosophy; this played a remarkable role in having Illuminationism recognized as an influential philosophical trend of the time.

During the Safawid dynasty, Muslim thinkers in Persia continued the post Ibn Sinan intellectual tradition. They were able to establish systems of thought that were neither purely philosophical nor gnostic but a combination of both. They intended to develop a theosophical tradition rather than a rationalistic philosophy based purely on discursive knowledge. Thinkers such as Ghyas al-Din Mansur and later Mir Damad interpreted Ibn Sina's Peripatetic doctrine in the light of the illuminative philosophy of Suhrawardi. Other thinkers, such as Abd al-Razzaq Kashani, Sa'ad al-Din Hamuya, Aziz al-Din Nasafi, Fakhr al-Din Araqi, Auhad al-Din Kirmani and Abdul Rahman Jami, were influenced by Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the unity of being. They incorporated this gnostic doctrine into their philosophical systems.¹⁰ In the fourteenth century, Sayyid Haider Amuli, Ibn Abi Jumhur and Rajab Basri, whose theosophical doctrines were developed under the influence of Ibn 'Arabi, contributed to the integration of Gnosticism in Shi'i Islam during the Safawid period. Sayyid Sharif Jurjani and Jalal al-Din Dawani also tried to bridge the gulf between philosophy and theology.¹¹

Among these Muslim Shi'i thinkers, Mir Damad is of great importance because, with Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i, he belonged to the first generation who were the main thinkers behind the establishment of the School of Isfahan. The name of this school was employed recently by Henri Corbin, Nasr and Ashtiyani. Corbin includes Mir Damad, Mulla Sadra and Qadi Sa'id Qummin as its main figures. Nasr gives a longer list of names but emphasizes Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i as the forerunners of the school. These three thinkers were also patronized by Shah Tahmasp and Shah Abbas, the Safawid ruler. It is reported that Shah Abbas visited them frequently at their place of residence and developed a kind of friendship with them.¹²

Mir Burhan al-Din Muhammad Baqir Damad was known as Mir Damad and was also given the title of 'Third Teacher' following Aristotle and al-Farabi.¹³ Another title by which he was known was Sayyid al-Afdil, 'Master of the Most Learned'.¹⁴ This Muslim thinker was born in 1561 in Ashtarabad. His father, Mir Shams al-Din, was the son-in-law of Shaykh 'Ali b. Abd al-'Ali Karaki, a distinguished Shi'i cleric (d. 1538) and the author of the theological discourse al-Najmiyyah and several other commentaries on religious subjects. Shaykh 'Ali Karaki migrated to Persia after the establishment of the Safawid dynasty and during the reign of Shah Tahmasp (r. 1524–1576) enjoyed patronage and power. Mir Damad gained his education in the major Shi'i cities of Persia. He studied philosophy, transmitted sciences ('ulum al-naqliyyah) and natural sciences and closely studied Ibn Sina's philosophical texts. He became the leading authority on philosophy, theology, jurisprudence and natural sciences. During the time of Shah Abbas he went to Isfahan to teach, where he attracted a large number of disciples. Among them were Mulla Khalil Qazwini, Sayyid Ahmed 'Alawi, Qutb al-Din Ashkiwari and Mulla Sadra.¹⁵ Mir Damad wrote various religious and philosophical titles in Arabic and Persian; for example Qabasat, Taqdisat, Taqim al-imam, al-Sirat al-mustaqim and al-Ufuq al-mubin were in Arabic. He also wrote Jazarat and Sirat al-muntaha in Persian. These works included discussions on philosophical matters such as being, time, eternity, the relationship between eternal and temporal, creation and God's knowledge of particulars. He also wrote poems under the pen name Ishraq. At the age of twenty, Mir Damad was recognized as a philosopher and was admired by people in the intellectual circles of Mashad and Isfahan. In 1631 he died on his way to Kerbela and was buried in Najaf, a city in present-day Iraq.

It should be remembered that philosophical discourse in the Muslim world has always been looked at with suspicion. The powerful, dogmatic and politically greedy clergy thought of philosophy as poisonous to the religious mind. During the Safawid dynasty, the hostility towards intellectual discourse continued and the Shi'i clergy, like the Sunni clergy, expressed no sympathy with philosophy. The establishment of the School of Isfahan can be attributed less to intellectual tolerance and freedom of expression in the Safawid dynasty than to other factors such as the political position and power of the families of Muslim thinkers like Mir Damad and Mulla Sadra in Shiraz and Isfahan. Mir Damad's father and grandfather were among the influential Shi'i clergy of their time and enjoyed the patronage and support of the Safawid rulers. Mir Damad also was known for his devotion and religiosity. He was highly revered by the 'ulama and by the seekers of irfan (Gnosticism). His style of writing was also complicated and difficult for the clergy to understand, particularly those who were not familiar with theosophy and Gnosticism. Nor should we forget Shah Abbas's personal interest in intellectual debate and philosophy and his encouragement of learning and his friendship with Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i. All these factors contributed to the establishment and development of the School of Isfahan and rescued its founders from persecution by the clergy.

Mir Damad's philosophy is characterized by a fusion of Suhrawardi's Illuminationism and Ibn Sina's ontology. For him, there is a clear distinction between Hellenistic philosophy and Islamic thought. Islamic thought is the source of illumination and theosophy, whereas Hellenistic philosophy represents rationalistic discourse. Illuminationism, as explained by Suhrawardi in Hikmat al-Ishraq (see Chapter Two), was the continuation of a philosophical tradition from Hermes to Plato and then to Eastern thinkers such as himself.¹⁶ Mir Damad, however, kept Platonism outside Hellenistic thought, because Platonism belonged to the philosophical tradition of the illuminative philosophy. Nasr also mentions that eternal creation, huduth-i dahri, is the central idea of Mir Damad's thought.¹⁷ This idea is better understood in light of Mir Damad's division of essence based on Suhrawardi's metaphysics, which eventually leads to different concepts of time. Admittedly, in dealing with the idea of eternal creation, Mir Damad endeavoured to solve the contradictions between the views of Muslim philosophers on creation. He put forward an answer to the question of whether the world was created in time or is eternal. This issue was discussed from the beginning of the rise of Muslim philosophy by thinkers such as al-Kindi, al-Farabi and Ibn Sina. Some Muslim philosophers stated that the world was created in time, while others held that it was eternal. The second view was also attacked by al-Ghazali in his Tahafut al-falasifa; he branded it heretical. Mir Damad took another metaphysical position by synthesizing these two antagonistic claims and advocating the idea that the world was eternally created. For him, the essence of God is absolutely simple and transcends all distinctions, limitations and qualities. It is the source of divine attributes, which are one with it and at the same time different. The divine essence and divine attributes enjoy a necessary and unchangeable relationship, which is eternal or sarmadi, having neither beginning nor end.¹⁸

The divine attributes are similar to the universal Forms in the ideal world in Plato's metaphysics. Even they have a similar relationship to the particular objects of the material world: they are unchangeable but are capable of generating change. The relationship between this unchangeable sphere of the divine attributes and the changing world leads to the rise of another form of time called dahr. The third form of time, called zaman by Mir Damad, is the measure of the quantitative change in the material world.¹⁹ What is the significance of this division of time? How does Mir Damad solve the contradiction between the views of those who advocate the paradigm of creation in time and those who believe in the eternity of the world?

Mir Damad's solution to the relationship between dahr and zaman is that the two forms of time belong to two different spheres of existence. The former time is for the unchangeable and necessary relationship between the divine attributes and the material world. For this Muslim thinker, as for Plato, the material world is distinct from the divine attributes (or the universal Forms in the ideal world). The material world also relies on the divine attributes for its existence. The creation of the world is, therefore, preconditioned by the divine attributes, but it did not occur in the form of time called zaman (time as a quantitative change), because zaman cannot exist without the material world or before the creation of material objects. The world, which exists in zaman and depends on the divine attributes, is also outside the sphere of dahr. Conversely, the divine attributes are in dahr but not in zaman. Something that exists in zaman is non-existent in dahr, and vice versa. Above them, sarmad or the temporality of the divine essence transcends both forms of time. The divine essence is neither in dahr nor in zaman but is aloof from them and their influence.²⁰ Divine essence is the source of everything and everything as essence is identified with light. Following Suhrawardi's doctrine of the primacy of essence, and thinking of everything in the world as the originated light, Mir Damad believes that the essence is the only reality and existence is an accident. Accepting the emanationist doctrine of Neoplatonism, he believed that the world came into existence in the process of emanation. This process is characterized by a descending and ascending order. From the divine essence emanated the divine attributes or the archetypal lights, and the universal intellect was the first component of this emanation. From this emanated the heavenly soul, of which the universal soul is a member. From the universal soul emanated the natural souls. In the final stage, matter emanated. This process is described as a descending order from the most to the least perfect form of existence. At the lowest stage of emanation the process takes an ascending order from minerals to animals and the human species.²¹ Sufism also inspired Mir Damad. In Jadhawat, he describes the ascending journey undertaken by the seekers of redemption to employ intuitivemystic knowledge ('irfan) for understanding the Truth and to devote time to serious spiritual contemplation.

Another Muslim thinker who played a role in Mulla Sadra's intellectual life in Isfahan, and who was a member of the School of Isfahan, was Mir Abdul Qasim Findiriski (d. 1641). Mir Findiriski taught philosophy, mathematics and medicine. Many of his students, for example Rafi'a Gailani, Aqa Husayn Kundsari, Mulla Muhammad Baqir Sabzwari and Mulla Rajab 'Ali Tabrizi, became well-known scholars. However, according to Nasr, it is debatable whether Mulla Sadra studied under him. Mulla Sadra, however, was introduced to Mir Findiriski and the two knew one another well. Mir Findiriski lived longer and died in the same year as Mulla Sadra or one year later.²² Mir Findiriski was acquainted with non-Islamic religious and philosophical traditions in India and Persia. He travelled to India and studied Hinduism as well as Zoroastrianism. He wrote Usul al-fusul on Indian philosophy and a commentary for the Persian translation of the Yoga Vasistha by Nizam al-Din Paniputi. He was also interested in the fine arts and wrote Sana'iyyah, a treatise on the arts and sciences in society.²³ He wrote poetry and lived simply, mixing with the common people and identifying with them. Nasr narrates a story from Riyad al-aarifin that Mir Findiriski's attitude towards the common people annoyed Shah Abbas. One day Shah Abbas said, 'I hear some of the leading scholars and sages have been attending cock-fights in the bazaar.' Mir Findiriski, realizing that the remark was meant for him, replied, 'Your majesty, rest assured, I was present but I saw none of the 'ulama there.'²⁴

Another important figure of the first generation of scholars of the School of Isfahan was Shaykh Baha al-Din 'Amili, known also as Shaykh Baha'i. His father Shaykh Husayn, the son of Shaykh Abdul Samad 'Amili, was originally an Arab from Lebanon, and was sent at the age of thirteen to Persia. He became one of the leading theologians and jurists of his time, a Sufi, a poet, and the leader of the 'ulama in Isfahan.²⁵ He was also a close friend of Mir Findiriski and Mir Damad. The friendship between these three thinkers is revealed in a fresco in the ruins of a Safawid royal building in Isfahan.

This fresco depicts a famous story, according to which one day Mir Damad and two of his prominent contemporaries, Shaykh Baha'i and Mir Findiriski, were sitting in a royal hall, engaged in a philosophical discussion. Suddenly a lion that had escaped from the royal zoo enters the hall. The fresco depicts Shaykh Baha'i as collecting himself with signs of fear on his face, Mir Damad as prostrating in gratitude, and Mir Findiriski as utterly indifferent to the lion's presence. The three distinguished friends were later obliged to provide an explanation of their immediate reactions. Shaykh Baha'i is reported to have said that by the power of reason he knew that unless the lion was hungry, it would not attack him, and yet instinctively he was moved to protect himself. Mir Damad explained that, being the descendant of the Prophet, he knew that the lion would not attack him, so he prostrated himself and thanked God for being a descendant of the Prophet. And Mir Findiriski is reported to have said that he mastered the terrifying beast by the power of his inner serenity and self-control.²⁶

This story, besides disclosing the friendship between these three thinkers, is indicative of the three forms of discourse, namely rational thinking, doctrinal faith and mystical tendency, combined in the intellectual tradition of the Safawid period. The writings of Shaykh Baha'i on theology and astronomy, and his commentaries on the Qur'an and on Arabic grammar were widely used in Persia. He wrote poems under the influence of Rumi (1207–1273), a Persian Sufi and poet and the founder of the Mawlawiyyah Sufi order.²⁷ Like his two friends, Shaykh Baha'i was Gnostic and believed that intuitive knowledge was superior to discursive or rationalistic knowledge. Needless to say, these three thinkers played a remarkable role in the flourishing of the School of Isfahan. The theosophical activities of the school attracted many students from other cities in Persia; Mulla Sadra belonged to its second generation of students.

Mulla Sadra (Sadr al-Din Muhammad b. Ibrahim b. Yahya Shirazi Qawami), also known as Sadr al-Muta'allihin and Akhund, was born in Shiraz. Although the exact date of his birth is unknown he was probably born in 1572 because it is recorded that he died in 1640 at the age of seventy on his seventh pilgrimage to Mecca. He was buried in Basra, a city in southern Iraq. His father, Mirza Ibrahim b. Yhya Qawami, was a religious scholar and a Shiraz noble. He was also said to have held a ministerial post in the government of Fars province. Shiraz was the capital city of Fars, and, like Isfahan, was well known for its cultural and educational tradition. Mulla Sadra, being the only child of a wealthy, educated and politically powerful family, received the best education possible under the tutelage of his father. Later, after the death of his father in 1587, the adolescent decided to go to Isfahan to pursue his religious studies.²⁸ The intellectual life in Isfahan, in particular under the influence of Shaykh Baha'i and Mir Damad, enabled Mulla Sadra to develop a keen interest in philosophy and Gnosticism ('irfan'). He studied the transmitted sciences ('ulum al-naqliyyah') with Shaykh Baha'i and philosophy with Mir Damad.

According to Mulla Sadra's confession in al-Masha'ir, he was a follower of Suhrawardi's metaphysics and advocated the doctrine of the principality of essence.²⁹ His subsequent dissatisfaction with this philosophy, however, suggests that the foundation of his conviction was not firm. His philosophical interest changed from the primacy of essence to the primacy of being. He became more concerned with Ibn Sina's ontology, and later in his book Tarh al-kawnayn he engages himself with Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being.³⁰ But the change in Mulla Sadra's thinking was received with hostility by the 'ulama' in Isfahan. Some interpreted Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being as the identification of God with nature, or belief in an immanent God, contrary to the concept of the transcendent God accepted by the majority of Muslims. Also, the philosopher Ibn 'Arabi belonged to the Sunni theological tradition and was venerated by some Sunni Sufi orders, for example the Naqshabandiyyah, who were hostile towards Shi'ism. This may be seen as one of the reasons contributing to the marginalization of Ibn 'Arabi's theosophy by the Shi'i 'ulama' and to the condemnation of his metaphysical views as heretical.

For Ibn 'Arabi, the 'Unity of Being' means that there is only one Being, and existence is nothing but the manifestation or outward radiance of that One Being.³¹ In this regard, being rather than quiddity becomes the ruling principle of and reason for the existence of everything. Being is also one and manifests itself at all ranks of existence. Apparently, this multiplicity is not the negation of unity but gradations of the manifestation of the unity. William Chittick, in Ibn 'Arabi's Metaphysics of Imagination, tries to explicate the meaning of this doctrine, first by relating the 'Unity of Being' to 'the profession of God's Unity' (al-tawhid) in Islam, and second by making a distinction between this Sufi doctrine and pantheism in occidental philosophy. It is noteworthy that the concept of the unity of God (al-tawhid) is distinct in connotation from the concept of the Unity of Being (wahdat al-wujud). The latter identifies God with Being or renders God and Being as synonymous. The Qur'anic concept of the Unity of God does not mean that nothing other than God exists. It is a simple denial of the polytheism that was a common belief among some Arab tribes of the pre-Islamic period: 'Your God is One God. There is no god but He, the Compassionate, the Merciful';³² 'Allah bear witness that there is no god but He, and so do the angels and men of learning. He upholds justice. There is no god but He, the Mighty and Wise One.'³³ The statement "There is no God but Allah" (la ilaha ila Allah) vividly expresses the existence of one God. It stresses monotheism and rejects other deities beside Allah. The advocates of the Unity of Being altered the first part of this statement 'There is no God . . .' (la ilah) to 'There is no being . . .' (la maujud). The original Qur'anic verse is the denial of polytheism, and the Sufi version of the unity is an assertion that there is no existence except God, which is an emphasis on the immanence of God rather than His transcendence. Fariduddin al-Attar (1119–1230) illustrated this unity by the analogy of water, saying that: 'Water is water in the boundless ocean; and in the jug too it is the same water.'³⁴ Again for al-Attar, that which unites the multiple particularization of Reality is being and not quiddity. Likewise all the various gradations of being such as human beings, animals, trees and so on enjoy this unity. In Fusus al-Hikam, Ibn 'Arabi also considered God to be the totality of beings: 'God, by virtue of being, is the same as the things that are, because there is no existence other than His Being.'³⁵

William Chittick's distinction between the Unity of Being and pantheism in occidental philosophy is not convincing. In my opinion these two doctrines are similar in several ways. Both of them put away duality without insisting on the identification of God with the world. For Spinoza, one of the advocates of pantheism in the West, everything exists through the 'Substance', and beings are particularizations of the manifestation of the attributes of Substance. Meanwhile, Substance is, and at the same time is not, a being: 'God (Deus) I understand to be a being absolutely infinite, that is a substance consisting of infinite attributes, each of which expresses eternal and infinite essence.'³⁶ He adds: 'Whatever is, is in God, and nothing can exist or be conceived without God.'³⁷ Spinoza rejects the notion of transcendent God; for him, God's causality is immanent causality, in the sense that God is an indwelling power, but is not identical with his creation or gradations. It is true that Spinoza's concept of God as the only Reality (which is also the view of the advocates of the doctrine of the Unity of Being) can be mistaken for the identification of God with nature, but nature for Spinoza is one of the infinite attributes of God. Furthermore, Spinoza makes a distinction between natura naturans and natura naturata, an indication of a certain self-differentiation in God, implying two distinguishable though inseparable aspects of the same reality.³⁸

In the face of the hostility from the official 'ulama, Mulla Sadra was left with two options: to defend his philosophical position or to retreat from public life. He chose the second and in 1610 left Isfahan for isolation in Kahak, a village near Qum. According to Fazlur Rahman, there was more to this intense opposition and criticism. In fact, the 'ulama were offended by Mulla Sadra's philosophical ambition. This is shown by the apology offered by the publisher in the introduction to al-Asfar stating that the philosopher's ideas in the work represent nothing to do with religious essence.³⁹ It is also reported that Mulla Sadra was critical of the official 'ulama and attacked them for using their political position for worldly and material gains. He called them ignorant of the states and stations of the human soul. His relationship with and attitude towards the institution of the 'ulama can be described as aggressive and un-compromising.⁴⁰ He removed himself from public life for a decade, and focused on strengthening the foundation of his philosophical thought and spiritual life. This period of solitude and retreat from public life was the most fruitful time in the intellectual development of Mulla Sadra: 'He was, therefore, in search of a method that would give him certainty and would transform rational propositions into experienced truth.'⁴¹ His intellectual situation, as Fazlur Rahman describes it, was similar to that of al-Ghazali and also of Descartes (1596–1650) when the latter was writing the Meditations. The difference was in al-Ghazali's fierce opposition to philosophy and Descartes's reliance on rationalistic discourse. Mulla Sadra neither tried to base truth on dogmatic theology nor accepted the validity of rational principles beyond doubt and limitation. Not much is known about Mulla Sadra during his stay in Kahak, but it is obvious that, although he was forced to choose solitude, this period in his life was significant for the development of a new philosophical ground and for his breaking away from Suhrawardi's metaphysical tradition.⁴² He refers to this in al-Masha'ir, where he describes the shift from Suhrawardi's doctrine of the primacy of essence to the doctrine of the primacy of Being as turning away from the 'darkness of illusion' to the daylight:

In the past, I used to be firm on the defence of the principality of essence, making existence a [mentally dependent] abstract entity, until my God guided me and showed me his proof. It became clear to me that the issue is opposite of what has been conceived and determined. Thank God who took me out of the darkness of illusion through the light of comprehension, who removed from my heart the clouds of these doubts through the rise of the sun of truth, and who held me close to the true discourse in this life and the life after. Existences are genuine [determinate] realities and essences are the eternal 'thisnesses' which have never inhaled the perfume of real existence at all. These existences are merely the rays and reflected lights of The True Light and of the Eternal Existence. Exalted Be His Sublimity! However, each of them has essential predicates and contains intelligible concepts called essences.⁴³

This confession is the confirmation of Mulla Sadra's turn from the philosophical position of essentialism and his departure from Illuminationism, which affirms the primacy of essence and the nullity of being. It is the total conversion from the metaphysical position of Suhrawardi and his ishraqi followers to a position where being becomes primary. In this new philosophical position, essence rather than being is considered predicated or conceptual. This turn is seen by Mulla Sadra as a departure from the 'darkness of illusion' to the 'light of the day', which in my opinion has Platonic overtones. It resembles the journey of a liberated prisoner from the cave towards the light of the sun.

In 1625, at the age of fifty-three and having spent more than a decade in solitude, Mulla Sadra decided to return to his own city, Shiraz, on the request of the governor of Fars, Allahwirdi Khan (d. 1613) to teach in a religious school (madrasa) that he had recently established. The philosopher resumed teaching and writing and trained a number of notable disciples, among them 'Abdul Razzaq al-Husayn Lahiji and Muhammad al-Murthada, known also as Mulla Muhsin Fayd Kashani and Hakim Mulla Muhammad Aqa Jani. Lahiji is also known as Fayyadh. He married Um Kalthum, the eldest daughter of Mulla Sadra who was also a scientist and poetess. Lahiji studied in Mashad and travelled to Qum where he met Mulla Sadra and became his student. He has written on philosophy and theology. His main works include Shawariq al-ilham, Gohar murad, a commentary on Suhrawardi's al-Nur and Sharhi isharat. Faydh Kashani was an expert on Islamic jurisprudence, hadith (the Tradition of the Prophet Muhammad), Gnosticism and ethics. He also studied under the instruction of Mulla Sadra in Qum and travelled to Shiraz with his master and married his daughter (Zubaydah). Fayd Kashani returned to his own town, Kashan, where he established a school to teach philosophy and theology. He wrote Gnostic poems and a number of books in Arabic. Among them are Mafatih, al-Wafi, Usul al-ma'arif and al-Mahajj al-bayza. Mulla Muhammad Aqa Jani is known for his commentary on Mir Damad's book al-Qasabat.

Mulla Sadra's philosophical development can be divided into three periods: in the first period he studied in Isfahan with Shaykh Baha'i and Mir Damad and came under the influence of Illuminationism. Mulla Sadra describes this period in al-Asfar as a time of intensive research and investigation of the ideas of Greek philosophers, of Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic thinkers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, of Muslim philosophers from Spain (al-Andalus) represented by Ibn Bajja, Ibn Tufayl, Ibn Rushd and Ibn 'Arabi's theosophy, and of the wisdom of the Illuminationists.⁴⁴ In al-Masha'ir this period of his intellectual development is identified with disillusionment with the doctrine of the primacy of essence. It was also at this time that Mulla Sadra faced hostility from the 'ulama in Isfahan. The second period, in Kahak, is characterized by deep philosophical meditation and solitude. The third period was marked by his return to society and the commitment to write and teach in Shiraz, which he did until his death. Although these three periods are interconnected and equally important for understanding his philosophy, the second and the third represent Mulla Sadra's authentic way of understanding reality on a new philosophical ground and the maturity of his thinking. His metaphysical position designates not only a conversion but also a new beginning or a new episode in Islamic philosophical tradition in which 'Being' is not the needfulness of essence; rather, it is the ground without which nothing is thinkable.

Although no definitive chronological order has been established for Mulla Sadra's writings, a list of thirty-three treatises on religion and philosophy is provided by Shaykh Muhammad Rida al-Muzaffar in his introduction to Mulla Sadra's al-Asfar.⁴⁵ Nasr listed forty-six works of Mulla Sadra and six treatises whose authorship remains uncertain.⁴⁶ Professor S. M. Khamenei provided a list of thirty-nine works.⁴⁷ Abu Abdullah al-Zanjani also listed twenty-six philosophical works by Mulla Sadra in his Life and Main Philosophical Teaching of the Great Iranian Philosopher Sadr al-Din al-Shirazi.⁴⁸ Since Mulla Sadra's ontology is our primary interest, the present book deals with the writing of the third period of the philosopher's life. Nevertheless, it should be remembered that even his religious treatises, such as his commentaries on the Qur'anic verses, are related to his philosophical conviction. His major philosophical work and the fountainhead of his thought is Al-Hikma al-muta'aliyah fi al-asfar al-'aqliyyah al-arba'a, known also as al-Asfar (it is referred to in this book as al-Asfar).⁴⁹ This work was first published in four volumes in 1865, with a commentary by Mulla Hadi Sabzawari on three volumes. The most recent edition, by Rida Lutfi, was published in nine volumes in 1958. It was also published in Teheran with a Persian commentary by Ayatullah Abdulla Jawadi Amili in 1989. One of Mulla Sadra's early works before al-Asfar was Tarh al-kawnayn, which was written under the influence of Ibn 'Arabi's pantheistic philosophy and marked the beginning of Mulla Sadra's move away from Suhrawardi's philosophical tradition; this work was also branded as heretical by the institution of 'ulama in Isfahan. The book was later published under the title Risalat seryan al-wujud. Other important philosophical works include al-Masha'ir, which is a summary of Mulla Sadra's philosophical project in al-Asfar and was published in 1897. It was later published in Persian in 1964 by Dr Karim Mujtahidi, a professor at Teheran University, and was translated into English by Parviz Morewedge and published by the Society for the Study of Islamic Philosophy and Science (SSIP) in 1992. Other philosophical works, for example Al-Hikma al-'arshiyyah, al-Mazahir al-ilahiyyah fi asrar al-'ulum al-kemaliyyah, Risala fi al-haraka al jawheriyyah and al-Mabda' wa al-ma'ad, deal with various philosophical and theological issues. Mulla Sadra also wrote a treatise on subject-object dichotomy, Risala fi itihad al-'aql w al-ma'qul, and Hashiyyah 'ala sharih hikmat al-ishraq lil Suhrawardi. The latter was published in 1898. A treatise on Ibn Sina's philosophy, Sharih ilahiyyah al-shifa, was published in 1885. Mulla Sadra also wrote Mafatih al-ghayb, on metaphysics, cosmology and eschatology. Al-Mabda' wa al-ma'ad was revised and published by Jalal al-Din Ashtiani in Mashad in 1921. This book was also published in Tunisia in 1972 by Nur al-Din al-Ali, and by the Iranian Academy of Philosophy in Teheran in 1975. The book has two main sections: the knowledge of God and Resurrection. In the last part of the section on Resurrection under the title 'Prophecy', Mulla Sadra deals with the relationship between religion and politics. Al-Shawahid al-Rububiyyah is a summary of his teachings and was published for the first time in 1869. It is considered to be his last work.⁵⁰ The book was recently edited by Jalal al-Din Ashtyani and was published with Mulla Hadi Sabzawari's commentary in 1967. A collection of his treatises was published in 1996 under the title Majmu'a rasa'ile-falsafi Sadr al-muta'ahilin, with an introduction in Persian by Hamid Naji Isfahani. This collection includes important philosophical treatises by Mulla Sadra such as Risalat itihad 'aql e ma'qul, Risalat isalat ja'il al-wujud and Risalat shawahid al-rububiyyah.

Mulla Sadra's major philosophical work, Al-Hikma al-muta'aliyah fi al-asfar al-'aqliyyah al-arba'a, or al-Asfar (The Transcendent Philosophy Concerning the Four Intellectual Journeys of the Soul), stands as the most valuable philosophical product. It is a work that has remained unknown to a great extent in the West. This work not only contains Mulla Sadra's philosophical system but presents his rich understanding and evaluation of the earlier Muslim philosophical, theological and Sufi traditions. The title of this work indicates four intellectual journeys, which lead human existence from the lowest to the highest rank. These journeys complete one another and describe Mulla Sadra's philosophical system. The four intellectual journeys are:

- A journey from creation to the Truth or Creator
- A journey from the Truth to the Truth
- A journey that stands in relation to the first journey because it is from the Truth to creation with the Truth
- A journey that stands in relation to the second journey because it is from the Truth to the creation.

The first journey, from creation to the Creator, deals with general principles of philosophy or rather metaphysical questions in order to found the transcendent philosophy as a divine science. This journey also addresses philosophical issues such as the definition and meaning of philosophy, the primacy of Being over essence, the gradation of Being, the trans-substantial change (al-Haraka al-jawhariyyah), Platonic ideal forms, time, and the dichotomy of the subject-object relationship. The second journey represents Mulla Sadra's natural philosophy and his criticism of Aristotle's doctrine of the categories. It explains the existence of natural entities, matter and forms, substance and accident and the hierarchy of the natural beings in the world. It includes Mulla Sadra's views on the problem of the creation ex nihilo and the eternity of the world. It explores the views of the Greek philosophers such as Thales, Anaximenes, Empedocles, Pythagoras, Plato and Aristotle. At the end of this journey Mulla Sadra discusses the relationship between nature and its metaphysical principles. He advocates his own opinion of change as the continuous renewal of the world. In the third journey, Mulla Sadra constructs his own theological ideas or a divine science in a particular sense. It includes the nature of God's existence, divine unity and attributes, God's knowledge of the world, good and evil and the divine law. He also gives different proofs for the existence of God, God's knowledge of the world, the nature of divine will, and the role of love (ishq) in the evolutionary process of change. The fourth journey is the end of the intellectual progress of Mulla Sadra where he explains his own understanding of rational psychology and eschatology. It begins with a discussion on different types of the soul, the proofs for its existence, and the possibility of the separation of the soul from the corporeal world. Mulla Sadra also deals critically with the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul. He explains the condition of the human souls who reside in heaven and hell quoting from Ibn 'Arabi's al-Futuhat al-makiyyah at the end.

These four intellectual journeys in al-Asfar are not only descriptive of Mulla Sadra's philosophical ideas, but also critical of almost all views held by his predecessors. Fazlur Rahman describes this style of Mulla Sadra as hypercritical because all alternative solutions to the philosophical problems are rejected; meanwhile the new solutions he suggests seem not to be essentially different or in disagreement with those of his predecessors. For example, in his discussion on eschatology he rejects al-Ghazali's solution but his own solution on physical resurrection is not distinguishable from that offered by al-Ghazali. The only texts and thinkers that did not come under Mulla Sadra's critical scrutiny were the foundation texts of Islam, the views of the Shi'i imams, and Ibn 'Arabi.⁵¹

The third period of Mulla Sadra's intellectual development gave rise to a new type of ontology based on the doctrine of the primacy of Being. This ontology, although it had similarities with Ibn Sina's ontology and Ibn

'Arabi's theosophy, offered a new philosophical foundation distinct from that of Illuminationism. Although not recognized immediately by the intellectual circle of its time, Mulla Sadra's philosophical achievement gradually inscribed its effect in the Muslim philosophical tradition, particularly during the Qajar dynasty. Today it is almost impossible to understand the development of Muslim philosophy without understanding Mulla Sadra's ontological enterprise and his influence in the Persian-speaking world.

The influence of Mulla Sadra's transcendent philosophy and the doctrine of the primacy of Being was felt later in the post Isfahan era. This era is characterized by the political changes to Shi'ite Islamic power after the collapse of the Safawid dynasty in 1732 and the shift of the centre for Islamic philosophical studies from Isfahan, capital of the Safawids, to Teheran following the establishment of the Qajar in 1779 by Agha Muhammad Khan.⁵² The Safawid dynasty witnessed the culmination of the Shi'ite political and philosophical fusion, but it remained a target of sectarian antagonism by the Sunni neighbouring political hegemony and tribes. It is reported that Mir Vais, a Sunni Muslim leader of the Ghilzai tribe in Qandahar, travelled through Isfahan on his way to Mecca in 1707. He collected some material containing matters repugnant to Sunni Islam. After showing them to the Sunni 'ulama in Makkah he obtained a fatwa (religious verdict) from them authorizing jihad (holy war) against the Shi'ites and their dynasty in Isfahan. The holy war began with an attack on the Shi'ite minority in Qandahar and ended with the fall of Isfahan in 1722. In 1723 another fatwa was issued against the Shi'ites by the Shaykh al-Islam (of the chief 'ulama) in Istanbul,⁵³ in which it was stated that the blood of male Shi'ites was to be shed and even their women and children to be taken captive.⁵⁴ In 1743, in this hostile atmosphere, Nadir Shah tried to promote a revised form of Shi'ite Islam. He sponsored a meeting between Shi'ite and Sunnite 'ulama in Najaf and later succeeded in having the Shi'ites recognized as the followers of the Ja'afari School of law (mazhab), the fifth Islamic school of law, by the Ottoman empire. Unfortunately Nadir Shah was assassinated soon after this achievement.⁵⁵

The Qajar dynasty, unlike the Safawid, was characterized by constant internal tension between the political hegemony of the monarch and the institution of the 'ulama. The Qajar monarchs did not claim religious authority for themselves through alleged imamate descent. They, however, sought the favour of some 'ulama by patronizing the Shi'ite holy shrines of the imams and offering other services.⁵⁶ The Qajar monarchs' alienation of the official 'ulama from the political hegemony and the tenuous relationship between the state and religious authority made the 'ulama stronger as an opposition so that their religious actions were intensified politically in the community. Various religious schools were established for promoting religious studies. Sufi orders such as Shaykhism, Ni'mat Allahi, Zahabis and Khaksar gained popularity.⁵⁷ The Shaykhi order eventually became the birthplace of the Babi movement with its doctrine of the messianic return of the hidden imam, which later developed into Baha'ism.⁵⁸ The 'ulama stressed the external dimension and rituals of the faith in light of the instructions of the imams, while the Sufi movement justified the significance of the internal dimension of the faith, but again for its effectiveness turned to the teachings of the imams.

Parallel to this development in the Qajar period, the teaching of Mulla Sadra's philosophy added another element of diversity to the cultural progress of Shi'i Islam. The school of Isfahan, where Mulla Sadra studied under the direction of Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i, was dominated by the 'Essentialism' of the ishraqi metaphysical tradition of Suhrawardi. By contrast, the philosophical school of Teheran flourished under the sway of Muslim 'Existentialism' or the metaphysical tradition of Mulla Sadra. This metaphysical tradition became 'central to the intellectual life of Qajar Persia and was of great importance not only for those who considered themselves as his followers, but even by those who opposed him, as is seen in the writings of Shaykh Ahmad Ahsa'i, the founder of the Shaykhi movement and Sayyid Muhammad the Bab, the founder of Babism.'⁵⁹ Although the school of Teheran was founded at the end of the eighteenth century with the advent of the Qajar dynasty, the teaching of Mulla Sadra's philosophy actually began with Mulla Ali Nuri (d. 1830–1831) in Isfahan, the former Safawid capital of Persia in the early Qajar period. Mulla Ali Nuri was a great Islamic scholar and his teaching of Mulla Sadra's philosophy in that city continued without opposition from the official 'ulama.⁶⁰ Ali Nuri also wrote commentaries on al-Asfar, al-Masha'ir and Sharh usul al-kafi. His pupils included Mulla Muhammad Isma'il Isfahani, Mulla Abdullah Zunuzy, and his son Mulla Ali Mudarris Zunuzy, Mulla Muhammad Ja'afar Langarudi, Mulla Isma'il Khajaw'i, and finally Mulla Hadi Sabzawari, who studied philosophy for seven years in Isfahan and was responsible for the revival of the Existentialist school of Mulla Sadra in the Qajar period.⁶¹ The philosophical school of Teheran, however, became the centre for studying Mulla Sadra's philosophy on one hand and Islamic esotericism or Gnosticism on the other. The latter was advocated by Sayyid Radi Larijani, known also as Malik a-Batini (the Professor of the Esoteric).⁶²

Mulla Sadra's philosophy was also taught on the Indian subcontinent for the first time by Muhammad Salih Kashani, a disciple of Mulla Sadra who migrated to India. Indian Muslim scholars such as Muhammad Amjad al-Sadiqi (d. 1727), Mulla Hasan Laknawi (d. 1783), Muhammad A'lam Sindili (d. 1834) and Abdul Ali Bahr al-'Ulum (died in the nineteenth century) wrote commentaries on the works of Mulla Sadra.⁶³ As mentioned earlier, one of the most influential figures in the promotion of the philosophy of Mulla Sadra during the Qajar dynasty was Mulla Hadi Sabzawari. This Muslim thinker was born in 1797 in Sabzawar in north-eastern Iran. He studied metaphysics, logic, mathematics and jurisprudence in Mashhad. He then moved to Isfahan to study philosophy with Mulla Isma'il Isfahani and Mulla Ali Nuri, the interpreter of Mulla Sadra's philosophy of that time. Although he studied with Mulla Ali Nuri for about three years, Sabzawari hints in his autobiography at "illuminati" rather than Mulla Sadra's philosophy as the motive behind his inclination for philosophy and traveling to Isfahan:

I spent a total of ten years in the pious circle of the late Mulla [Mulla Husayn Sabzawari in Mashhad], until the time that my passion for learning was intensified. From Isfahan the whisper of the 'illuminati' reached my heart, at a time when, by the grace of God, I found great pleasure as well as competence in theological studies. I then left Khurasan for Isfahan leaving behind a considerable amount of property and goods. I stayed there for eight years gaining, with God's aid, an ascetic temperament, free of excessive passions, as well as success in my studies of the sciences and the shari'a; however, I spent most of my time studying philosophy of the illuminationsit school. For five years I studied with that supreme doctor of theology (glory of truth seekers, shining light of savants and teachers, possessing the virtuousness of the divines – nay the virtues of God, that knower of the Truth), Akhund Mulla Isma'il Isfahani (may al-Sharif (God) sanctify his heart).⁶⁴

After the death of Mulla Isma'il Isfahani, Sabzawari studied with Mulla Ali Nuri: 'When I returned to Khurasan, I continued my studies of fiqh (jurisprudence) and tafsir (commentary) for five years, for scholars (there) favoured these two subjects and offered deep understanding of hikmat (philosophy). For this reason I rely mostly on hikmat, especially ishraqi (Illuminationism).'⁶⁵ After returning from pilgrimage to Mecca, Sabzawari spent the rest of his life in his own town teaching philosophy and theology. He soon earned a reputation as a great thinker of the Qajar dynasty; even Nasir al-Din Shah (the Qajar king who died in 1896) visited him in 1867. Sabzawari died in 1873 and was recognized as the founder of the Sabzawar philosophical school. He was called, as Henri Corbin states, 'the Plato of his time', and was also said to be its Aristotle.⁶⁶ One of the most famous philosophical works of Sabzawari is Ghurur al-Fara'id, in which he gives a systematic account of Mulla Sadra's existential philosophy together with Sharh al-manzumah in poetic verses. Mulla Sadra's doctrine of the primacy of Being, modalities and the systematic ambiguity of Being are discussed in the first part of this work. Sabzawari wrote three other commentaries on Al-Shawahid al-rububiyyah, al-Mabda' wa al-mi'ad and Mafatih al-ghayb. Another work, Asrar al-hikma, deals in detail with the origin of being, eschatology and the esoteric meaning of liturgical practices. At the request of Nasir al-Din Shah (the Qajar monarch) Sabzawari produced a summary of this work entitled Hidayat al-talibin.⁶⁷

In modern times, Sayyid Muhammad Husayn Tabatab'i (professor at the theological University of Qum) is considered to be one of the philosophers and Gnostic thinkers of Persia who were inspired by Mulla Sadra's philosophy. He was born in Tabriz in 1903 and died in 1981. He wrote numerous books, one being a new edition of Mulla Sadra's al-Asfar. Tabatab'i was also engaged in a philosophical debate with Henri Corbin from 1958 to 1977. These debates were arranged by Sayyid Hossein Nasr (1933–) and conducted before a small audience. Among those who attended were Ayatollah Mutahari and Sayyid Jalal al-Din Ashtiyani.⁶⁸ Many other Persian Muslim thinkers have followed Mulla Sadra's philosophy. Among them are Sayyid Abu al-Hasan Rafi'i Qazwini, Sayyid Jalal al-Din Ashtiyani (1925–), a professor of theology at Mashhad who edited Mulla Sadra's Al-Shawahid al-rububiyyah, al-Mazahir al-ilahiyyah and Sabzawari's Majmu'ai i-rasa'il, and Sayyid Muhammad Kazim 'Assar (1885–1975), professor of theology at the University of Teheran, Mahdi Illahi Qumsha'i, professor of philosophy at the University of Teheran, and 'Allamah Muhammad Salih Ha'iri Simnani.⁶⁹ At present, Sayyid Muhammad Khamenei, the director of Sadra Islamic Philosophy Research Institute in Teheran, and Gholam Hossein Ebrahimi Dinani, a professor of philosophy at the University of Teheran, are working on Mulla Sadra's philosophy. Mulla Sadra's philosophy is also studied widely at the universities and religious schools (madrassa) in Iran.

The Doctrine of the Primacy of Being: An Ontological Turn

As a dedicated and critical thinker, Mulla Sadra investigated deeply into almost the entire corpus of philosophical, theological and mystical Islamic thought. Under the influence of his teacher, Mir Damad, he became one of the followers of Illuminationism.¹ Like his teacher, he was also interested in Ibn Sina's ontology and studied Ibn 'Arabi's theosophy. Suhrawardi, Ibn Sina and Ibn 'Arabi had a notable impact on Mulla Sadra's thinking and played a significant role in facilitating his ontological turn from the doctrine of the primacy of essence to the primacy of being and in his development of a new ontological system. Mulla Sadra's ideas were formed in the matrix of the dominant philosophy of Suhrawardi in the school of Isfahan. As discussed previously in Chapter Two, Suhrawardi held the metaphysical view that being was a mere mental concept and that essence was the only reality. Human knowledge of an object was also possible only through the revealing of its essence. A relationship was suggested between Suhrawardi's Illuminationism and Plato's metaphysics; this relationship was seen as important in comparing Mulla Sadra's ontology with that of Heidegger.

From the second period of his intellectual development, Mulla Sadra began to express dissatisfaction with the metaphysics of Illuminationism, in particular with the doctrine of the primacy of essence and declared, on the contrary, the doctrine of the primacy of Being. This ontological turn could not have occurred without the influence of Ibn Sina and Ibn 'Arabi. Mulla Sadra's teacher, Mir Damad, also tried to combine Suhrawardi's ishraqi thought with the Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophy of Ibn Sina. The philosophical tradition of the Isfahan school could not be characterized by blind imitation of Suhrawardi's Illuminationism. There was an inclination towards newly creative ideas and an attempt to amalgamate Suhrawardi's thought with that of Ibn Sina. Mulla Sadra, however, crossed the boundary set by the official interpretation of Islamic thought when he expressed his interest in Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being (wahdat al-wujud). In addition to the influence of this doctrine, another visible influence on Mulla Sadra was the psychological-eschatological role of the realm of images. In this realm, according to Ibn 'Arabi, images are as real as they are perceptible. The images in the human soul in the hereafter, since they are not attached to material objects, are more vivid and real than the images in the material world. This idea was used by Mulla Sadra to prove his view on bodily resurrection in his eschatological doctrine.²

For Ibn Sina, existence and essence were both real. Existence was of two kinds: necessary and contingent. He illustrated the difference between them in two ways. First, the necessary being is dependent on itself to exist and its existence is inseparable from its essence, or rather it is pure existence. By contrast, contingent beings are not self-dependent and derive from necessary beings. Their essences are also separable or are additional to them.³ Following Ibn Sina's ontological division and his distinction between existence and essence, the problem of whether existence or essence constitutes reality emerged in subsequent philosophical debates among Muslim thinkers. Suhrawardi, as one of the followers of Platonism, argued against Ibn Sina's ontology and insisted on the non-reality of existence and advocated the idea that essence was the only reality.⁴ Mulla Sadra contradicted Suhrawardi's doctrine and rejected the Platonic-Illuminationist metaphysical view that nothing in the real world corresponds to existence or nothing exists but ideas or essence. He, on the contrary, believed that nothing is real but existence.

In seeking to clarify the similarities between Mulla Sadra and Heidegger in relation to the doctrine of Being, it is important to note three points:

- Mulla Sadra and Heidegger stress the principality of Being and the reality of Being as a pre-ontological condition for the existence of all beings.
- Both thinkers argue against Plato's metaphysics, which reduces everything to ideas or their essences.
- They hold the view that Aristotle's logic and rationalist cognition are incapable of revealing the meaning of Being. As a result, a new cognitive instrument is required to apprehend the meaning of Being.

Mulla Sadra conceived of no more difficult task than marking a departure from the dominant philosophical tradition of his time and developing a new ontological system capable of rendering being meaningful. The task could be accomplished, however, by being essentially critical as well as creative through challenging Illuminationism. A new philosophical beginning was required, which should begin with a shift to the doctrine of the primacy of Being. In Chapter Three the shift in the direction of his thought from the second period of his intellectual development was described as a 'turn' from the core elements of Suhrawardi's metaphysics which neglected fundamental philosophical questions in favour of investigating the nature of something less fundamental or grounded that could not exist by itself. Heidegger, in Being and Time (1927), similarly sought a new ontological system based on understanding of the meaning of Being as the most fundamental philosophical concern. In order to prove this, Heidegger argues that the post Aristotelian thinkers accepted the dogma of negligence or the abandonment of Being. They withdrew themselves from the genuine philosophical question about the meaning of Being, for three reasons. First, they thought that Being was the most universal concept, and that its universality 'transcended' any universality of genus. Second, since Being is the most universal concept, and is not an entity, it is therefore indefinable and escapes all attempts to define it in accordance with the rules of 'definition' provided in Aristotelian logic. Third, Being is self-evident.⁵ Heidegger rejects these three presuppositions and argues against the post Aristotelian thinkers that the universality of the concept of Being does not guarantee the clarity of its meaning, and that the meaning of this concept is still the darkest of all. He also, like Mulla Sadra, says that Being is not an entity and is thus indefinable, and that Aristotle's definition by genus and difference, 'definitio fit per genus proximum et differentiam specificam' or connotative definition, which is the most important kind of definition, is not applicable to it but appropriate only for defining beings. Heidegger also believes that the indefinableness of Being does not invalidate the question of its meaning, and should not hinder us from investigating that meaning:

Being cannot be derived from higher concepts by definition, nor can it be presented through lower ones. But does this imply that 'Being' no longer offers a problem? Not at all. We can infer only that 'Being' cannot have the character of an entity. Thus we cannot apply to Being the concept of 'definition' as presented in traditional logic, which itself has its foundations in ancient ontology and which, within certain limits, provides a quite justifiable way of defining 'beings'. The indefinability of Being does not eliminate the question of its meaning; it demands that we look that question in the face.⁶

To clarify Mulla Sadra's view on the indefinableness of Being, Mulla Hadi Sabzawari states that even the positive attributes by which we try to define Being will neither render a definition nor a description, because whatever attribute is employed is not applicable to this reality. Sabzawari's argument is based on the notion of the 'simplicity' of Being. Since Being is simple, it has no differentia or genus on which its definition will become possible. Attaching positive attributes to Being cannot be a description because Being has no accidental properties to ascribe to it.⁷ As a result, Sabzawari suggests that the meaning of Being will be understood through negative attributes. Being, for example, is neither a substance nor an accident. Substance is essence and since it has no substratum cannot be an accident. Another way of understanding the meaning of Being is that Being has neither an opposite nor anything with similarity, because Being has no genus or differentia. It is not distinct or different from anything. That is why there is nothing to be opposed to it. Because Being also has no essence to share with another being, it is not possible to think of anything similar to Being. We can also say that Being is not a part and has no parts.⁸ The negative attributes listed here reveal some aspects of the nature of Being; but again, like positive attributes, these are neither definitions nor descriptions of Being.

Mulla Sadra describes the metaphysics of Suhrawardi in his book al-Masha'ir (the illusion of darkness, or the concealment of the truth):

Existences are genuine [determinate] realities and essences are the eternal 'thisnesses' which have never inhaled the perfume of real existence at all. These existences are merely the rays and reflected lights of the True Light and of the Eternal Existence—Exalted Be His Sublimity! However, each of them has essential predicates and contains intelligible concepts called essences.⁹

The 'darkness of illusion' is indicative of Suhrawardi's metaphysics. It is the state of untruth that reigns over the whole of reality in such a way that the meaning of Being remains unattainable and concealed. For Heidegger, the 'darkness of illusion' is the 'abandonment of Being', which led to 'nihilism' in the occidental thought of Plato, whom Suhrawardi considered the master of Illuminism, and finally of Nietzsche. It represents a history of negligence of the most fundamental philosophical question. In An Introduction to Metaphysics Heidegger states:

Where is nihilism really at work? Where men cling to familiar essents and suppose that it suffices to go on talking about essents as essents, since after all that is what they are. But with this they reject the question of being and treat being like a nothing (nihil) which in a certain sense it is, insofar as it has an essence. To forget being and cultivate only the essent – that is nihilism . . . By contrast, to press inquiry into being explicitly to the limits of nothingness to draw nothingness into the question of being – this is the first and only fruitful step toward a true transcending of nihilism.¹⁰

In Contributions to Philosophy (Enowning) Heidegger explains this metaphysical position in detail and points out four forms of nihilism: actual nihilism, the greatest nihilism, the most disastrous nihilism, and finally crude nihilism.¹¹ These forms of nihilism have no historical sequence as any one can emerge in one historical epoch together with the abandonment of Being. Nihilism is also described as the epoch of total lack of questioning in which problems will pile up and rush around, those types of 'questions', which are not really questions, because their response dare not have anything binding about them, insofar as it immediately becomes a problem again. This says exactly and in advance that nothing is immune to dissolution and that deconstruction [Auflösung] is only a matter of numbers regarding time, space, and force.¹²

The reconstruction of new metaphysical thought based on the principality of Being means destroying the foundation of nihilism; this should be the priority of this project for Mulla Sadra as well as for Heidegger. Ontology needs to become the foundation of philosophical thinking; even philosophy has to be defined as an inquiry into the meaning of Being: 'Initially and throughout the long history between Ahaximander and Nietzsche, inquiring into being is only a question concerning the being of beings.'¹³ Both Mulla Sadra and Heidegger developed, by revolting against the dominant Platonic tradition, a new ontology at two different times and against two different cultural backgrounds. At the end of this revolt, Suhrawardi for Mulla Sadra and Nietzsche for Heidegger represent the final stage in the development of an antagonistic metaphysical tradition. The 'darkness of illusion' or 'abandonment of Being' is not simply an effacement for these two thinkers, but a serious philosophical problem that reigns over the whole domain of thinking in such a way that the truth of Being recedes into the darkness or, as Heidegger states, into the 'disintegration of truth' and finally the thinking of Being as essence.¹⁴ Beginning with Plato, Being was understood as 'Idea' and was interpreted as mere representation in the domain of thinking. As a consequence, in Plato's metaphysics, the Being of beings as a whole was relegated to darkness. In Heidegger's view, the concealment of truth about the reality of Being in the history of occidental thought from the time of Plato is like 'the process in which the light of a star that has been extinguished for millennia will gleam but its gleaming nonetheless remains a mere appearance'.¹⁵ Overcoming this type of metaphysics is possible only by turning to, and not in a mere conversion of, the metaphysics of Being by positing the most fundamental philosophical question concerning the meaning of Being and its principality. It is possible to turn to the metaphysics of Being, as described by Heidegger in Being and Time and Contributions to Philosophy, by making Being the grounding question and by allowing the re-emergence of the truth of Being as the only inner reality of all ontic beings. For Mulla Sadra, as he writes in al-Masha'ir, this is a departure from the 'darkness of illusion' to the daylight of the Truth.

The theme of ontology in Mulla Sadra's philosophy is the sum of the multiplicities of being grounded on the principle of unity. In this kind of system, in which unity and multiplicity are taken into consideration, the relation of unity to multiplicity and of identity to difference is decisive. In this system of ontology, the principal reality, Being, unlike Plato's universal Forms in the ideal world, is not multiple. It is a unity or identity manifesting itself in multiple gradations (difference). In this case this unity in multiplicity or identity in difference is best understood in the light of Hegel's dialectic logic rather than Aristotle's, because it is not abstract identity. It is not a simple unity of Being with itself but a relation to itself. By virtue of this relation of identity, beings or the multiple modalities of Being exist, and Being becomes the unified ground for them. In identity, Being and the modalities of Being belong together. This metaphysical principle is one of the most general and encompassing determinations on which all modalities of Being depend. Precisely, it indicates that Being functions as the foundation on which we can grasp the nature of the relationship between unity and multiplicity. It shows that unity and multiplicity are two different aspects of the same reality. Unity contains multiplicity and vice versa. But taking Being as a unified ground of grounded multiplicity resembles to a great extent Aristotle's understanding of Being in the Metaphysics. For Aristotle, general ontology must study unity and its varieties. He insists that there is a unity beneath the diversity of phenomenal objects and that unity is Being qua being. There is also a single science known as 'general ontology', which investigates Being as well as its varieties. But the difference between Aristotle and Mulla Sadra arises with the doctrine of the categories and the rationalistic apprehension of this unified ground or Being qua being. Aristotle listed ten categories, of which the most fundamental was substance. The other categories, such as quality, quantity, relation, place, time, posture, state, action and passion, are dependent on substance to exist and cannot be by themselves. Meanwhile, these categories are classes or genera and their applications render our knowledge of the phenomenal world possible.¹⁶ In Mulla Sadra's ontology, Being, as the principle of the unity beneath the multiplicity of the phenomenal objects, is beyond the domain of the applicability of these categories. Hence Being remains indefinable. It is not a genus, differentia, species or a common and specific accident. In this case, understanding the meaning of Being cannot be based on anything other than itself:

It [existence] cannot be described [defined], because description is due to either a definition or a [distinguishing] mark. Thus, it cannot be described by definition. Since it has neither a genus nor differentia, it does not have a definition. Nor can it [be described] by a distinguishing mark, since its understanding cannot be supplied by anything more manifest and prevalent than it. It is a mistake to attempt to describe existence, for it would need to be described by something more hidden than the [entity] itself – unless the aim were to [approach it by] either an indication or a notification, or some description; the latter is merely a syntactical [lit. linguistic] inquiry.¹⁷

Being is then not conditioned by any sort of determination and limitation. If it is defined it is limited and conditioned by its determinations, for every affirmation is a negation. Kant, in the second and third part of the Critique of Pure Reason, draws a similar conclusion. He limits the application of the categories to the multiple forms of the phenomenal world, and the 'thing-in-itself' or noumenon is kept beyond the applicability of the categories of human understanding and hence remains unknowable. These two conclusions look similar as each recommends the employment of the categories for revealing beings rather than their inner reality; but Mulla Sadra and Heidegger disagree with Kant on the unknowability of reality. For them, the shortcoming in the application of the categories to the realm of Being does not hinder an investigation into the meaning of Being. The unknowability and indefinability of Being, as indicated here, refer to the inherent shortcoming of Aristotle's logic and rationalistic apprehension, which becomes an explicit problem in the epistemological inquiry of Kant. Nevertheless, this shortcoming does not negate the task of ontological inquiry. Mulla Sadra and Heidegger searched for a new epistemological tool and methodology that was different from the Aristotelian form of cognition. Mulla Sadra, in particular, relied on intuitive knowledge or knowledge by presence for investigating the meaning of Being. It is a cognitive tool associated with the mystic way of apprehending the reality:

As it has been stated, the reality of existence is neither genus, nor species, nor accident, since it is not a natural universal. Instead, its inclusion happens in another mode of inclusion, and no one has gnosis of it except the mystics; i.e. those who are firmly grounded in mystical knowledge. Sometimes it is interpreted as the spiritual soul [i.e., Holy Spirit], other times as the grace 'which extendeth to all things'. Sometimes [it is interpreted as the] 'Reality from which beings have been created', according to the mystics. [Also, it is] the expansion of the light of existence to the structures [lit. figures] of contingent beings, and the essences which are receptive to it; finally, [they speak of] its descent towards the abodes of inner-natures.¹⁸

For Heidegger, the universality of Being is also not a natural universal like the universality of 'whiteness'. Its universality 'transcends' any universality of genus. Those who follow Aristotle's rule for definition arrive at a negative conclusion in defining Being, simply because Being is not a genus and has no differentia. But does this mean that no further attempt should be made to understand the meaning of this indefinable reality? Indeed, if the horizon of thinking is limited by Aristotle's doctrine of the task and application of the categories, the answer to this question is in the affirmative. Mulla Sadra and Heidegger, although inspired by Aristotle's ontology, denounced his logic and his rationalistic apprehension of Being. An inquiry into the meaning of Being is not in the scope of rational epistemology or regional ontology, because Being is distinct from beings. Similar to Aristotle's First Principle, it is a prior condition not only for beings but also for all scientific inquiries, yet it cannot be studied scientifically. 'Fundamental ontology', which takes Being into account, is substantially distinctive and its subject matter is neither this nor that kind of being but Being per se: 'Basically, all ontology, no matter how rich and firmly compacted a system of categories it has at its disposal, remains blind and perverted from its own most aim, if it has not adequately clarified the meaning of Being, and conceived this clarification as its fundamental task.'¹⁹ Mulla Sadra also believes that the question of the meaning of Being becomes a prior condition and the foundation of all kinds of scientific discourse and knowledge:

The question of existence is the foundation of the principles of wisdom, the basis of philosophical theology, and the nexus of [concern] of those in the circle [lit. the millstone; i.e., the centre] of the sciences of unity, the resurrection of souls and bodies, and of much else that only we have developed and articulated. It gives them a synthesis [lit. a unity] through its explication. Anyone who is ignorant of the gnosis of existence is also ignorant of the major subjects and most significant quests and misses the refinements of gnosis and its subtleties, the science of the divine and the prophets, the gnosis of the soul, and its connection and return to the [primordial] source and destiny [i.e., telos].²⁰

As discussed earlier in Chapter Two, in Hikmat al-Ishraq, Suhrawardi acknowledges his debt to Plato and considers him to be one of his spiritual masters and a great Illuminationist sage and thinker. However, Mulla Sadra's attack on Suhrawardi's philosophy is a direct criticism of Platonism.²¹ In addition, while Mulla Sadra and Heidegger came from different cultural backgrounds, the similarity in their thought is within the framework of their ontology and criticism of Platonism; that is, represented by Illuminationism of Suhrawardi in Persia and the nihilism of occidental thought. These two philosophical traditions, one Eastern and one Western, belong to Platonism, which has led to the 'abandonment of Being'. They stand in opposition to the type of metaphysics founded and advocated by Mulla Sadra and Heidegger.

The new ontological enterprise of Mulla Sadra is explained in the first journey of al-Asfar and is continued in al-Masha'ir and al-Shawahid al-Rububiyyah. Mulla Sadra was convinced that Being is self-evident; in al-Masha'ir, in the Third Prehension, under the title 'An Analysis of the [Extra-Mental] Existence Having a Determinate [Concrete, Fully Determined] Status', he tried to prove the principality of Being in eight ways or by eight arguments that he called evidences.

The First Evidence

'The reality of anything is its existence, which ranks with its effects and implications. Existence, therefore, must be the most real of all things for it is the possessor of reality, because whatever possesses reality possesses reality only due to it.'²² Being in this evidence becomes an a priori ontological condition for the existence of all things. Everything finds its way into the light of being or the objective reality only through Being and by relying on Being rather than its essence.

The Second Evidence

In this evidence, Mulla Sadra states that when the principality or the reality of essence is affirmed there will be no distinction between external and mental realities, but that 'this however is absurd'. He also states that if something exists in the external world or intellectually, it does not signify that these two domains (external and intellectual) stand for that thing as containers in which the existence of that thing is established. It simply means that it has an existence from which some effects and consequences are derived.²³

The Third Evidence

If the reality of things is in their essences, then it is impossible to predicate essences of one another. Predication is the union of two concepts. This implies that when one thing is predicated of another, the two will be united in existence but be different from one another in their essences:

If things exist by their essences and not by the [mediation] of something else, it would not be possible to predicate them on each other, such as 'Zaid is an animal' or 'Man walks'. It is so, because the use and the truth of predication is a union between different concepts in existence. Thus the judgment made of something predicated on something else is an expression of their unity in existence, though they be diverse as concepts and in terms of their essences.²⁴

If the reality of a thing is its essence, then there will be no distinction between a subject and its predicate on the bases of unity and diversity.

The Fourth Evidence

Here Mulla Sadra supposes that if Being is non-existent then nothing has existed. Since the non-existence of things is false, the non-existence of existence is necessarily false. Also, if we think of essence as not in a union with existence, then it is non-existent in any mode. If there is no existence, then the predication of an essence is impossible, as affirming a predicate presupposes the existence of the subject. The adjunction of a non-existent thing to another non-existing thing has no validity.²⁵

The Fifth Evidence

This evidence is another version of the previous evidence. Before, Mulla Sadra states that without Being nothing can exist; here he holds the view that if Being has no concrete form or external actualization, then no species will have particulars or individuals: 'If existence is not realized in the individuals of a species, no one of the [individuals of the species] is realized in the external realm.'²⁶ For the actualization of an individual a species is required, which also relies on existence to be, and nothing (for example, another universal concept) other than existence can qualify as a necessary condition for this purpose.

The Sixth Evidence

Again, in proving the principality of Being, Mulla Sadra argues that there are two kinds of accidents: accidents of existence such as ‘whiteness’ for a body, and accidents of essence such as differentia for a genus. Some thinkers believe that the qualification of essences by existence, and the presentation of existence to the essences, is not a case of an external type of qualification or an occurrence of an accident to its subject, because this implies that the object of qualification enjoys a certain degree of reality. The occurrence of accidents of essences (differentia to genus) does not contradict their unity in the real world. This can be held true for the relationship between existence and essence. Existence as an accident of essence must be united with it, and this implies that existence as an objective reality should be realized: ‘Existence, therefore, must be something by the mediation of which an essence exists and with which it is united in [the externally determined realm of] existence.’²⁷

The Seventh Evidence

In this evidence, the reality of existence is explained through the relationship of an accident with its subject. It is believed that the existence of an accident is nothing in itself but is something for its subject; that is, the existence of an accident is ‘identical with its incarnation [i.e., instantiation] in its subject’.²⁸ This incarnation of an accident in its subject takes place in the real world. It is also clear that the subject of an accident is not included in its essence or its definition but in its existence. The category of accident depends on something other than itself, namely a subject, to be manifest. Keeping this in mind, we can conclude that if existence (the subject) is not real, then the accident is a mental concept. The existence of blackness, for example, would be a concept rather than an incarnation in a body, which is an actual base for the meaning of blackness. This also leads to the denial of the separation of existence from essence in the realm of accident, whereas the reality of this separation has already been agreed upon.²⁹

The Eighth Evidence

Again, if existence is a mental concept and not real, as stated by Suhrawardi and other ishraqi thinkers, then ‘an infinite number of species could be realized between any two limits’. There would be no specific number of specific essences, and no specific number of species would be realized between any two limits of intensity, which is necessarily false. According to Mulla Sadra, the doctrine of the primacy of Being offers a solution to this problem, because it advocates the idea that the structure of all essences stands on the foundation of a single unity (i.e., Being) and one incessant form. In this incessant form, the unity of being is actual and its multiplicities will be in the potential mode without opposing or negating one another.³⁰

It is worth mentioning that these evidences do not explain the meaning of Being but only its principality. Being, which reflects the reality of all things, cannot be known rationally or conceptually. It can only be experienced intuitively. Mulla Hadi Sabzawari also restated these evidences of Mulla Sadra for the primacy of Being, but reduced them to six. According to Dinani, there is a slight difference between Sabzawari and Mulla Sadra in the evidences. In reality, the material used by the former is same as that developed by the latter.³¹ Sabzawari also presented six arguments to prove the validity of Mulla Sadra's doctrine of the primacy of Being; some of them are not significantly different from those of Mulla Sadra's evidences. In the first argument, Sabzawari insists that the self-evidence of Being becomes the fountainhead of all values in human life because values are not attributed to concepts, which are mentally posited. The second argument is the realization of the distinction between external and internal (mental) modifications of Being: 'So if existence is not realized, and if what were realized were quiddity – and quiddity is kept in both modes of being without any difference – there would be no distinction between the external and the mental. But since this consequence is absurd, the antecedent must also be the same.'³² The third argument deals with the priority of cause to its effect in relation to the reality of Being. The cause, as we know, necessarily precedes the effect logically as well as in time. If we suppose that Being, as stated by the ishraqi thinkers, is not real but is mentally posited, then a specific quiddity of fire as a cause would be prior to the specific quiddity of fire as the effect, which becomes posterior. In this manner the generic quiddity of a substance as a cause would be prior to a posterior substance, which is caused by the former. This will necessitate a priority–posteriority relationship in the quiddities. In the doctrine of the primacy of Being, Being is considered to be real, and things, which are prior or posterior, are quiddities; yet only Being can confirm their priority or posteriority.

Arguments four and six of Sabzawari are similar. Each deals with the reality of Being as a unity beneath the scattered quiddities and multiplicities of beings. In the fourth argument, the primacy of Being is established on the gradual increase in the evolutionary movement of the world. This movement, in which various species with quiddities are posited, is both continuous and infinite. If the philosophical position of Illuminationism is true and Being is mental, then the species will be bound by the beginning and the end, because Being is one and many in accordance with the things from which the concept of being is abstracted. In this case, Being will not be present as a single reality and unity and the quiddities will be dispersed without a connection among them.³³ The sixth argument takes Being as uniting the multiplicity in the phenomenal world of beings. It argues that Being should be fundamentally real in order to be a unitary ground for all beings.³⁴ In the fifth argument, Sabzwari says that if Being is a mental reality, then ‘what could have made the quiddities leave the state of equality, and by what have they come to deserve the predicate “existence”?’³⁵

Being is the primordial reality on which everything stands; but the reality of all things cannot be described in common language as something that exists, because it is not an ontic existent but the Being of beings or ontological reality. It is simply existence par excellence.³⁶ What is real in everything is its being rather than its essence. In this sense, Being is equivocal, not univocal. It is a common characteristic of all things or the Being of them but with different intensity and weakness. The Being of beings and beings are not two different realities, but one and the same. The reality of Being is, therefore, objective or an ontological reality of all beings. It is what constitutes the very Being of everything. For Mulla Sadra, Being, unlike beings, and unlike the view of al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, is not something accidental occurring to its essence. Accidents are caused but Being is uncaused and nothing is prior to it. If we think of Being as something accidental, then it should have a cause. The cause must also be prior to it. If a being that is caused by another being is unified with it, the being that is caused is prior to itself as a cause, or is causa sui, which will lead to an infinite regress.³⁷

Since Being is not this or that ontic being, it has no describable property. Its abode is not the mind but outside the human mind; it has a dynamic character that creates all modalities of ontic beings, which results in the rise of essences in thinking. Essence, by contrast, is a mental factor and exists for the mind when beings are comprehended.³⁸ Although Being is that reality without which nothing is possible, its meaning is still obscure. It requires further investigation for Mulla Sadra as well as Heidegger. But in my opinion, Heidegger’s understanding of the meaning of Being is beset with ambiguity. It is for this reason that Heidegger’s commentators have discussed and understood the meaning of Being in different ways. Kockelmans interprets Heidegger’s Being as a process, an activity in which its self-manifestation becomes a truth:

As the clearing process which sheds light on itself and on beings by the very fact that it illuminates everything, Being may thus be correctly called truth. Yet the term truth here obviously does not mean “agreement”; rather, it means clearing, illumination, original self-manifestation, the emergence of Being and of all beings.³⁹

Kockelmans is convinced that Being, like the Geist in Hegel’s philosophy, is a dynamic ontological reality, which has the character of a happening that comes to manifest itself as a truth.

This interpretation can be supported by Heidegger's own understanding of the meaning of Being in On the Essence of Truth (1930), in which he states: 'The primordial disclosure of being as a whole, the question concerning beings as such, and the beginning of Western history are the same; they occur together in a "time" which, itself immeasurable, first opens up the open region for every measure.'⁴⁰ The interpretation by Kockelmans becomes adequate and reasonable when Heidegger's understanding of 'Time' and 'Temporality' is taken into account: 'In contrast to all this, our treatment of the question of meaning of Being must enable us to show that the central problematic of all ontology is rooted in the phenomenology of time, if rightly seen and rightly explained, and we must show how this is the case.'⁴¹ If Being is conceived in terms of time, then it should be dynamic and eventful; it only becomes concealed in this temporal character and its concealment is an active process through the ecstatic projection of Dasein. Dreyfus rejects Kockelmans's interpretation. He does not believe that Heidegger regards Being as a process or a happening: 'Heidegger must have been aware of this danger, since at the point where he says being is not an entity, he writes in the margin of his copy of Being and Time, "No! One cannot make sense of being with the help of these sorts of concepts". To think of being in terms of concepts like entity, or process, or event is equally misleading.'⁴² Richardson takes the view that in the early works of Heidegger, 'Being' and the world were considered to be equivalent.⁴³ At the same time he suggests that, in Kant and the Problem of Metaphysics (1929), Being is understood as the pure horizon of meaning, within which the process of the clearing described by Kockelmans takes place.⁴⁴ The notion of 'Pure', which is mentioned here and is used again by Heidegger in 'Letter on Humanism', can be understood in the Kantian sense. In the Critique of Pure Reason, Kant presents a list of pure categories of understanding within which all material collected by sensibility (Anschauung) becomes thought and acquires meaning.⁴⁵ For example, the sensuous notions of colour, taste and odour can be kept in the pure category of 'Quality'. Quality is called pure because it is independent of all empirical experiences. It is neither redness nor sweetness, but a category transcending all empirical notions.

When we say that Being is pure, we simply mean that Being transcends all empirical beings, and that the possibility of understanding the meaning of an empirical entity is conditioned by understanding the meaning of Being. Zimmerman has another interpretation: Being for Heidegger is history shaping ways in which beings can reveal themselves and become real.⁴⁶ Okrent tried to connect this 'shaping ways of Being in history' with the pragmatic signification of each kind of being that shows itself to us.⁴⁷ On the question of Being (Seinfrage), Heidegger claims that the question of the meaning of Being constitutes a philosophical inquiry about the meaning of what is asked about. It presupposes guidelines or knowledge, which are already available to us in some way or another. But raising this question is an indication of our intellectual dissatisfaction with available guidelines, and available knowledge. Being, at this stage, is known and yet not known, or it is obscure and concealed.

Heidegger explicitly states that the subject matter of this inquiry is the Being of beings, which is not an entity.⁴⁸ One cannot think of Being as an entity like a tree, a table, a horse or a mountain, and hence it cannot be grasped in terms of empirical concepts; meanwhile, it is also not the summum genus of Aristotle's First Philosophy. For this reason, Being is transcendent and a presupposition, for nothing can be presented to us without having been articulated in its Being.⁴⁹ As a consequence of this, in order to understand an entity, we need to look into its Being. Our philosophical knowledge is incomplete without apprehending the meaning of its Being. By saying that Being is not an entity, we draw an ontological distinction between Being and beings, but at the same time Being cannot be distinct because no entity can exist without it. In 'Letter on Humanism', Heidegger raises another meaning of Being, defining it as power: 'As the element, Being is the "quiet power" of favouring-enabling, that is, of the possible'.⁵⁰ He also tries to use Hölderlin's elegy "Homecoming" to interpret the meaning of Being. Finally, in An Introduction to Metaphysics, Heidegger states,

All things we have named are, and yet, when we wish to apprehend beings, it is always as though we were reaching into the void. The being after which we inquire is almost like nothing, and yet we have always rejected the contention that the essent in its entirety is not. But Being remains indefinable, almost like nothing or ultimately quite so.⁵¹

Elsewhere, Heidegger takes the view that our attempts to understand the meaning of Being are futile because Being is inaccessible and its meaning cannot be apprehended completely. The reason for this lies in the way Being reveals itself to Dasein:

Manifestly, it is something that proximally and for the most part does not show itself at all: it is something that lies hidden, in contrast to that which proximally and for the most part does show itself; but at the same time it is something that belongs to what thus shows itself, and it belongs to it so essentially as it constitutes its meaning and its ground.⁵²

In this paragraph, Heidegger clearly states that the meaning of Being is completely inaccessible, because it 'for the most part does not show itself at all'. This hiddenness of Being is not something insignificant or temporary that will not influence our philosophical understanding of reality; rather, it is essential and constitutes its meaning. The hiddenness of Being cannot be neglected, but at the same time we find ourselves helpless in our search for its meaning as the greatest part of it 'does not show itself at all'. In addition to this hiddenness, Being can be obscured. Further, a phenomenon that is uncovered at some point can deteriorate to the point of being obscured again. This deterioration or recovering of Being leads to disguise: 'and the most dangerous, for here the possibilities of deceiving and misleading are especially stubborn'.⁵³ Despite the perplexity of this issue, Heidegger suggests that the meaning of Being can be revealed in an existential analysis of an entity that has an ontic–ontological significance. That entity is the being of Dasein and has the power to question the meaning of its own being and Being as such. This inquiry into the meaning of Being, unlike Mulla Sadra's ontological inquiry, begins with a particular type of being. The hermeneutic circle of this inquiry moves from a part to the whole, or, more specifically, from the being of a particular entity, namely Dasein, to Being in general. This can be seen as the line of demarcation between the ontological inquiries of Mulla Sadra and Heidegger. No matter how similar the two inquiries are, they still differ in methodology and metaphysical conclusions. For Heidegger, the existential analysis of the being of Dasein reveals the structure of fundamental ontology. An investigation into the meaning of Being thus explains the existence of Dasein. The hermeneutic circle then moves from Dasein to Being and from Being to Dasein.

In rejecting the Cartesian analysis of human existence as a thinking substance, Heidegger describes human being as 'Dasein' (being-there), because res cogitans presupposes its own ontological ground and there can be no thinking without being. Dasein is an entity that intends itself and understands its own being. This attitude of Dasein is at the same time the realization of its own possibilities, and its existence is always towards these possibilities. For that reason, and in order to make a clear distinction between Dasein and other beings, Heidegger ascribes 'existence' (Existenz) to Dasein rather than 'Existentia', which describes the being of other beings. Existenz, not existential, captures the unique meaning of human existence because it is incomplete and dynamic and is a being towards possibilities. On the contrary, Existentia signifies the being of a static existence, a term used by medieval metaphysicians to describe something actual. With Dasein, its being is at issue; it has to decide about its own being and then comports itself towards that. In opposition to res cogitans, Dasein's authentic existence is possibility, not actuality. This terminology and subdivision of Being into Existenz and Existentia is not found at the beginning of Mulla Sadra's ontological inquiry. Instead he uses common philosophical terminology such as Necessary Being, contingent being, existence, essence, substance, cause, effect and accident. Unlike Heidegger, he did not try to invent a new philosophical language for establishing his new philosophical system and accomplishing his break away from the philosophical tradition of his time.

Mulla Sadra rejects the idea that Being is an entity; the being of an entity is not different from the entity itself. He is also against the description of ‘Being’ as a universal concept, because a universal concept cannot be used to represent the being of particular beings. This would be equal to saying that ‘whiteness’ is a white entity.⁵⁴ The reality of the relationship between Being and beings is not like that between universals and particulars. The reason for this, as explained earlier, is that Being does not stand as a genus or species for ontic beings. If Being is a genus, it will become an abstract universal concept which can then be apprehended rationally. Mulla Sadra argues from the very beginning of his ontology that Being is neither a concept (such as genus, species, differentia or accident) nor conceived rationally: ‘and no one has gnosis of it except the mystics, that is, “those who are grounded in mystical knowledge”’.⁵⁵ The reality of every ontic entity is in its being. Being is therefore the real ground of everything, including essences. Essences are determined not by their own inner structure but by Being.⁵⁶ This, at the same time, claims identity between Being and beings or between beings and their Being. The dynamic movement of Being in modifying itself and manifesting all ontic beings with their essences also determines its completion. The more we move towards Being, the less of essence is exhibited. Essence is then the negation of Being.⁵⁷ In my opinion, Mulla Sadra borrowed this idea from Ibn Sina, who described God (the Necessary Being) as an existence without essence. More specifically, we can say that God’s essence is inseparable from His existence. Only in case of contingent beings can essences be distinguished from their existences. Existence is positive and real while essence is negative and unreal. For this reason it is more correct to say ‘This is a tree’ than ‘Tree exists’, because essence does not exist by itself. It should be attached to existence.⁵⁸ However, this interpretation of the relationship between existence and essence should not be understood in terms of metaphysical dualism. For Mulla Sadra, essences are not real beings. They come into existence when Being creates its own modalities or ontic beings, and then essences arise as the result and are joined to them. In the downward movement of Being, when the multiplicity of ontic beings emerges, these beings exhibit diverse essences. With the upward evolutionary movement, this duality gradually disappears until, at the end, being can be grasped in its absolute positivity without essence. According to Fazlur Rahman, this view marks a distinction between Mulla Sadra’s ontology and that of the Aristotelian–Neoplatonic Muslim thinkers. The latter believed that a concrete being is the combination of existence and essence. Each of these two aspects of a concrete being is real and could exist by itself.⁵⁹ Mulla Sadra advocates ontological monism. For him, there are not two realities such as existence and essence, but only existence. It is worth mentioning that Suhrawardi is also a monist thinker, but for him the single reality is essence rather than Being.

Having established the principality and reality of Being, Mulla Sadra deals with the modality or individuation of Being in his philosophical system. This, in my opinion, should be seen as similar to Heidegger’s attempt to divide

Being into various ontological regions because every system of ontology requires this division. Generally speaking, in the ontological division of Mulla Sadra there are three modalities of Being: the realm of unity and simplicity includes the Necessary Being, heavenly spheres and the intellect in human existence; the modalities in the realm of diversity and multiplicity consist of the ontic beings and the perceptive soul in human existence; finally, at the lowest level of ontological division, there is the realm of matter with pure potentiality to receive forms. This realm also includes the human body. Human existence is shared by all three modalities. The human intellect is in the first realm, the perceptive faculty belongs to the second, and the body to the third.

The modality of unity and simplicity is the realm of Being, which is identified with God. Being, for both Mulla Sadra and Ibn Sina, is Pure Being because it is without essence and at the same time it is the Being of all beings in the two lower realms of existence. At the rank of Pure Being multiplicity is dissolved, and everything merges into a unity or into a 'simple' and 'One' mode of Being.⁶⁰ It is also important to mention that for Mulla Sadra ontology is not separate from theology because he thinks of Being as the highest ground above all beings, as the grounding ground and cause of all being without having a cause or a ground for itself. This grounding ground of all beings is also at the same time conscious of both itself and beings and determines their destination. This can be seen as the distinction between Mulla Sadra's ontology and that of Heidegger. Here, Mulla Sadra's ontology could be described as onto-theology, a Heideggerian term used to define this type of metaphysics.⁶¹ In Heidegger's ontology, Being is neither transcendent in this sense nor a rational cause for all beings. It is the Being of beings and their inner reality. God does not enter into Heidegger's metaphysics; his metaphysics remains as ontology.

In the second division, or the modality of diversity and multiplicity, there are ontic beings such as heavenly bodies, souls, animals and inanimate beings. This is the realm of individual beings.⁶² Every ontic being in this realm is in constant flux and evolutionary change towards a higher realm to achieve perfection. These beings reach perfection in human existence, as human beings are more intelligent than animals. Some human beings reach a higher rank of existence and become more perfect in their intelligence than others; this is the highest form of Being in the realm of multiplicity beneath the realm of unity.⁶³

The lowest degree of modality of Being is the realm of prime matter, which is nothing more than the potentiality to receive forms.⁶⁴ Following the doctrine of emanation introduced earlier by some Muslim thinkers such as the members of Ikhwan al-Safa (The Brethren of Purity), al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, Mulla Sadra believes that prime matter is emanated from Being eternally because Being is not in time. Prime matter represents the lowest level of existence and

becomes existent through receiving specific forms in the evolutionary process from potentiality to actuality. It is also the beginning of the movement towards perfection in the universe, which will be explained in Chapter Five in the discussion on trans-substantial change (al-haraka al-jawhariyyah). The two lower realms, namely the realms of potentiality and diversity, originated from the realm of unity and are dependent on that realm ontologically:

All contingent beings, whatever their distinctions and their ranks of [relative] deficiency and perfection, are existentially dependent, being indigent in their inner-realities towards It, and enriched by It. Thus, these contingent beings are contingent by virtue of their own inner-realities. Due to the First Necessity, The Exalted, however, they are [conditionally] necessary. They are inoperative and perishable only from the perspective of their own inner-reality [and thus are not categorically necessities]. They become a reality due to the Absolute Reality [aletheia], [being] the One and the Only: 'Everything that exists will perish except His own face'. His relation to other beings is like sunlight, such that [in itself] it depends on its own inner reality, [while other] bodies are enlightened by it; [they, however] are dark from [the perspective of] their own inner-reality.⁶⁵

Mulla Sadra's division of the ontological realms attributes principality and priority to the realm of unity. To clarify the principality of this realm, he explains three ontological positions, in each of which the nature of this principality is vindicated. He argues that the relationship between being and essence should be understood in three different ways: we think of Being as prior to essence or posterior to it or we state that both of them co-exist simultaneously. When Being is thought of as prior to essence, it simply signifies that Being is independent and can stand by itself without relying on essence. If the primacy of essence is accepted, as stated in the second case, then essence would exist independent of Being and be prior to it, but then for essence to exist it needs existence to rely on and this is a vicious regress. The third position is that essence co-exists with Being simultaneously, and not in it; therefore it relies on another existence for its existence. As a consequence of this, essence cannot be without prior existence:

If being exists [lit. if the being of existence were an existent], then either it is prior to the essence or posterior to it, or they are simultaneous. If the first is the case, its realization necessarily follows independently without the essence. This implies that priority of the attribute is prior to the subject of its attribution as well as its realization without it. If the second is the case, it necessarily follows that essence exists prior to it [existence] before being, which implies a vicious regress. If the third is the case, it necessarily follows that essence exists with it [i.e., existence] and not in it. Therefore, there would be another existence for it [i.e., for essence]; this [state] implies what has been mentioned. The falsity of the consequences always implies the falsity of the antecedents.⁶⁶

After arguing for the primacy of Being, Mulla Sadra stresses the view that essences belong to the realms of potentiality and multiplicity and are inseparable from beings ontologically. Their separation is only an intellectual fact, which occurs in the realm of thinking. Beings and essences are united in the world but separated in thinking:

What has been said earlier is sufficient to refute this claim, for, existence is identical with essence in the external [realm] but different from it mentally. Therefore, there is no relation between them except in intellectual consideration. In [such an intelligible] consideration, the relation will have existence which is in its inner-reality is identical with it, but is different from it in the realm external [to the mind]. This kind of ad infinitum is stopped when the intelligible consideration is ceased.⁶⁷

However, it is clear that the only ontological position accepted by Mulla Sadra is the affirmation of the primacy of Being and the intellectually posited status of essence. What he has argued here, then, or has tried to prove, is that Being, not essences, is the sole reality. Essences exist in the mind or only in thinking, not in the external world. The dualism of existence and essence arises only when we think to define a being or understand its nature. More precisely, essences emerge when Being modifies itself in the downward process of further diversified ontic beings. We can talk about essences when these ontic modes of Being are perceived or thought about. But gradually essences disappear when we move upwards to apprehend Being in its pure absoluteness. According to Fazlur Rahman, this view draws a line of demarcation between Mulla Sadra's ontology and that of the Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic thinkers.⁶⁸ The latter accepted the reality of existence and essence outside the domain of thinking and did not insist on the subjectivity of the latter.⁶⁹ In contrast, essence here is considered a mode of Being that exists only in thinking; that is, it has mental reality. It is the intellect that conceives essence and separates it from existence; otherwise, there is only existence and nothing else as an ontological reality and the foundation of all ontic modes. It may be possible to find a resemblance between this view of the ontological status of essence and the subjective categories in Kant's philosophy. Our knowledge of the phenomenal world, as described by Kant, is produced through the application of these subjective categories that define the essence of every phenomenon with the assistance of sensibility. This claim is an obvious contradiction with Suhrawardi's metaphysical conviction, in which essence has become real and Being a mere mental concept having no ontological reality of its own. Mulla Sadra, again in his arguments against the doctrine of the primacy of essence, insists that Suhrawardi's conviction can be taken into account when the dual reality of essence and existence is accepted.⁷⁰ For Mulla Sadra, Being is real and essence unreal; Being is positive, light, and makes all essences exist, whereas essence is negative, darkness, and imposes limitation on beings. The essence of each Being, which is other than Being, does not exist by itself. It exists by virtue of Being.

Being is, then, an ontological reality while essence lacks that reality and this rank of existence.⁷¹ The problem that arises in describing essence as subjective is with the possibility of understanding essence as something illusory. What does Mulla Sadra mean by insisting on the principality and reality of being? Is there a unity of being and essence in reality? Does that unity make them one real thing? Does that unity presuppose their previous ontological distinction? In answering these questions the ontological status of essences and their relationship to Being can be seen from two perspectives: first, the essences are illusory or images in the mind and have a mental existence like the subjective categories of the faculty of understanding in Kant's epistemology; second, the essences are real and their reality is of the second degree and is not equal with the reality of Being.

The first perspective is also found as a mystic point of view and analogous to the metaphysical position of some Indian thinkers who consider the world to be maya or unreal. Based on this type of metaphysical belief the essence of an entity or its being in the sensible world is seen as an illusion. But is this Mulla Sadra's position? Does this Muslim thinker say that the essence of the table I am now using for writing is only mental and has no reality outside my mind? In my opinion, Mulla Sadra's understanding of this problem belongs to the second perspective, which is similar to the view of Ibn Sina and to Hegel's interpretation of unity and diversity. Indeed, even explaining some similarities between Mulla Sadra's interpretation of the meaning of Being and its relationship with essence with that of Kantian metaphysical dualism will not be of great help here. The best way to approach this problem is through Hegel's analysis of the external reality and his interpretation of the world as the self-manifestation of Geist. In other words, we need to understand Being as an objective reality that exhibits itself in various forms and gives rise to the multiple beings and their essences. Being in this sense is a dynamic fountainhead of all things as well as their essences. This view is also shared by Heidegger, with the exception that Heidegger's ontology leaves no room for a rational teleology. Also, Hegel's concept of essence should not be taken for the Platonic Forms or the Kantian noumena. It is the negation of Being and is derived from the last category in the sphere of Being in dialectical logic. Essence, therefore, cannot exist by itself without relying on Being, but unlike Being, which is immediacy, essence is mediated and known through reflection or understanding.⁷² This discussion, in some ways, brings us closer to Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the unity of being. Mulla Sadra also wrote on the graded unity of being in order to justify his doctrine of the ambiguity of Being (tashkik al-wujud). In his discussion on the relationship between cause and effect he draws a conclusion on the personal unity of being in line with Ibn 'Arabi.⁷³ This discussion on the causal relationship also leads to the ontological division of Being stated by Ibn Sina, because Being that is a cause for its own multiple modality or the emergence of the effects becomes a Necessary Being as in Ibn Sina's ontology and the effects of possible beings. The existence of a cause does not rely on its effects, because it is independent and self-subsistent. Dependence and reliance on something other than itself is the character of the effects. The effects become both necessary when they are accompanied by their perfect cause and impossible in the absence of this perfect cause. When a cause produces an effect, that effect gives rise to its own essence in the mind, and in this way essence is derived from the existence of the effect. An effect, for example the world, is real when it is seen only in its relationship to its cause. This relationship is described as that of a speech to the speaker. The moment the speaker halts speaking, speech becomes impossibility.⁷⁴ The necessary relationship between a cause and its effect determines the existence of the effect but the cause (Being) remains without relying on anything for its existence. Can we say that Being causes essences? What is important to remember here is that essences have no reality for Mulla Sadra. They exist in the mind or intellectually. Being as a perfect cause gives rise to its effects or possible beings, and essences affect the possible beings and emerge only in the mind when the possible beings are thought about or conceived. Essences have no existence at all, either primary or attributive.

Essences belong to contingent beings in the realm of diversity and multiplicity. These contingent beings emanate from Being and give rise to essence in the mind.⁷⁵ Existence and essence, as mentioned in al-Masha'ir, are not separate in the external world; their separation is merely mental. This, however, does not mean that existence and essence are two different realities having a unity. Mulla Sadra plainly rejects the external reality of essences. For him, essences belong to contingent beings; if these beings have more essences they possess less being. Yet their being will never vanish, as nothing can exist as pure essence. The essences become 'concepts' through which we come to know about contingent beings. It is worth mentioning here that Suhrawardi is right in stating that what is known is essence not existence. But in Mulla Sadra's philosophy, knowledge is preconditioned by Being, or epistemology by ontology. Essences, as internal realities, are dependent on the external reality of Being. Although at the highest level of the hierarchy of Being there is pure Being, a kind of existence without essence, we cannot state that at the lowest level there is pure essence or essence without existence. Essences are always with ontic beings and do not exist in themselves. Their relationship as universal concepts to ontic beings (phenomena) remains; as long as one particular or ontic being exists, the essence will also exist. This can be seen as a one-to-one relationship.⁷⁶

The ontological division of Being in Mulla Sadra's philosophy does not depict the world as an aggregate of ontic beings or a container of them. Mulla Sadra sees the world as an organic body in which the evolutionary process of trans-substantial change takes place towards perfection. When an ontic being is described as something 'in' the world, this spatial relationship is not external like the case of a table in the room. The existence of the table is not dependent on the room, while its existence as an ontic being is unthinkable without its being in the world. Mulla Sadra's understanding of the relationship between Being and beings has similarity with Heidegger's existential analysis of in-der-Welt-sein, where being-in-the-world becomes an ontological condition for the existence of Dasein.⁷⁷ Yet this condition does not constitute the essence of this entity. This relationship between Being and beings is often elucidated metaphorically. As stated by John Quinn, for example, it is like the relationship of ink to written words.⁷⁸ One is usually not aware of the ink while reading the words. But in reality it is the ink that is seen and the words do not exist without it. Beings are similarly dual in nature. They have the character of identity as, like the words, they share the ink, but at the same time they represent multiplicity as the words are different from one another in form and meaning. Every being is then identical and different, eternal and temporal, divine and profane, because they are the intensive modifications of Being. By reflecting on this distinction and the ontological difference between the realms of Being we find a way to Being. This is Mulla Sadra's objective in al-Asfar. His aim is to move away from the 'darkness of illusion' to the daylight of the truth of existence.

The Systematic Ambiguity of Being and the Trans-Substantial Change in the World Order

All beings in the sensible world are actual in some ways or potential in others. In the former, they have been changed from potential to actual but do not possess perfection completely. Their state of actuality is not yet pure and final. It is merely a new state of potentiality for another actuality, without which they will remain immutable without transition from one rank of being to another. The change from potential to actual will be in a state of constant flux, with beings undergoing sudden or gradual change. The state of potentiality, which is prior to the state of actuality, is weak and imperfect. But in order to become more perfect and reach a higher rank, beings need to become actual again. To achieve this, they must be elevated to a higher mode of being where perfection is articulated or actualized.

In this discussion about change we encounter one of the most important philosophical issues in Mulla Sadra's ontology: trans-substantial change (al-haraka al-jawhariyyah). This is, in my opinion, the lynchpin of his cosmology and the key concept for understanding the world order. Mulla Sadra's interpretation of the meaning of the world is also based on understanding of trans-substantial change; hence his interpretation of the world is deeply rooted in his metaphysical system. In Mulla Sadra's philosophy, the world is not a mere material realm like that of Aristotle in which beings are causally and mechanically connected, but a world with integrated parts of a single system with a pre-given purpose. The world is not built on blind and aimless regulation and mechanical self-repetition. It is created by a perfect cause that has determined its meaning and destination.

In advocating this teleological metaphysics for understanding the world Mulla Sadra draws closer to Hegel rather than to Heidegger, and moves away from Aristotle. For Hegel, the world is the self-objectification of the Geist; it moves dialectically onward to accomplish perfection and overcome its alienation from Geist. The world is seen as an organic whole that changes itself for a purpose predetermined by Geist.¹ Geist is in a process of transformation in history through contradictions that determine the development of the world. Hegel elaborated this process in the Phenomenology of Mind as a temporal structure, which moves from idea to nature and then back to the idea in a better form and with richer content. This dialectical movement is carried forward by the triad of thesis, antithesis and synthesis. Synthesis, which is the union of thesis and antithesis, is richer than the previous movements in content because it supersedes both and becomes a new thesis for another antithesis, which unites to produce a new synthesis, which in turn becomes a new thesis in a new triad. This dialectic movement from thesis to antithesis and then to unity in synthesis is an irreversible process that continues until Geist, as the only sovereignty of the world, achieves self-completion at the final stage of historical development when the estranged world is appropriated by consciousness and transformed.

What Mulla Sadra explains in his doctrine of trans-substantial change can be separated from Hegel's description of the dialectical movement in three ways: first, Mulla Sadra does not advocate the idea of the dialectical movement of the world; second, although the emanation of the world is a temporal generation of the modalities of Being, time and change do not affect Being. Third, God is not immanent but transcendent, so Mulla Sadra's metaphysics should be understood in terms of panentheism rather than pantheism, the former being the metaphysical view that the world is part of God rather than being identical with Him. The world of multiplicity and God are in communion with each other because the former originated from the latter. But at the same time God is transcendent and separated from the world. Mulla Sadra, unlike Hegel, thinks of being in the world as temporality, but this temporality is external to the realm of Being. This is also in contradiction with Heidegger's description of Being as temporality. In Hegel's Phenomenology, as in Heidegger's Being and Time, temporality is the reality of Geist; for example Hegel states:

Time is just the notion definitely existent, and presented to consciousness in the form of empty intuition. Hence spirit necessarily appears in time, and it appears in time as long as it does not grasp its pure intuition, i.e. so long as it does not annul time. Time is the pure self in external form, apprehended in intuition, and not grasped and understood by the self; it is the notion apprehended only through intuition. When this motion grasps itself, it supersedes its time character, (conceptually) comprehends intuition, and is intuition comprehended and comprehending. Time therefore appears as spirit's destiny and necessity, where spirit is not yet complete within itself; it is the necessity compelling spirit to enrich the share self-consciousness has in consciousness, not put into motion the immediacy of the inherent nature (which is the form in which the substance is present in consciousness); or, conversely, to realize and make manifest what is inherent, regarded as inward and immanent, to make manifest that which is at first within – i.e. to vindicate it for spirit's certainty of self.²

The world is not separated from Geist, which functions as an immanent cause in the dialectical process of evolution. The actualization of Geist happens only in time through stages of development in nature and history. Since the essence of Geist is self-determined, history is the realization of freedom determined by Geist. It is a purposeful transition towards the absolute idea where all differences are united in absolute consciousness.

Another distinction between Mulla Sadra's ontology and that of Heidegger lies in the doctrine of emanation. Mulla Sadra, following the Neoplatonist Muslim thinkers such as Ikhwan al-Safa, al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, describes the creation of the world as emanation. From the realm of unity or Pure Being emanates the realm of prime matter (potentiality) and the realm of diversity (ontic beings). Accordingly, Being remains both transcendent and the origin and grounding of all that is grounded; in other words, the inner reality of all things. The emanation begins from Pure Being and moves downwards to the lowest level, where the ontic beings, although they do not vanish as beings, are dominated by their essences. Like the dialectic movement in Hegel's logic, this descending process of emanation is from the most general and indeterminate form to the most concrete, but it loses perfection on the way. Descendence is a gradual distance from perfection. At the abyss of this descending process there are beings with more essence but less existence.

In the light of the doctrine of emanation all ontic beings are the same and share identity because they spring from a single fountainhead. In all of them, Being becomes a common character and the inner identity. We can describe all beings in the three ontological realms as things that are. Meanwhile, emanation from Being downwards explains various stages of being with different degrees of perfection. In this case, all beings are not equal or the same in sharing the reality of Being. This unequal distribution of the character of Being with different gradations of the Being of their beings is called the systematic ambiguity of Being (tashkik al-wujud):

The relation between generated creatures and the creator is that of deficiency to perfection, and of weakness to strength. It has been established already that what is realized in a determinate manner are real existents and not essences. Moreover, it has been established that existence is a simple reality which has neither genus, nor a persisting difference, nor species, nor dividing difference, nor individuation. Rather, its individuation is due to its simple essence and the essential distinction between its units and identity [occurs] only by means of [their] being the strongest and being the weakest; and distinction into accidents happens only in bodies. There is no doubt that the Creator in existence is The Most Perfect and in realization The Most Complete [in encounter] with the created. The created is like an emanation of its Creator. In reality [the creature] is not even an effect, except in light of its unfolding [lit. modification] by the Maker, in light of Its Unfolding and Activities.³

The systematic ambiguity of Being is another way of expressing the principle of identity in difference and is determined by the descending process of emanation from Being to the lowest ontic beings. Being, as the reality of all ranks of ontic beings, is one and identical in its relation to them, but at the same time it becomes multiplicitous and different. From the perspective of this principle, there will be no distinction between diverse ontic beings and Being, as all of them belong together. They are only different in their perfection, deficiency, richness and indigence.⁴ It should be remembered that imperfection and deficiency infect only the realms of prime matter and diversity. These terms cannot be employed to describe the realm of Being because Being is a unity and pure and has no essence; otherwise, as Mulla Sadra states, 'It would not be the case that a Necessary Existent could exist.'⁵ Deficiency and imperfection are not the characteristics of the inner reality of Being. They are characteristics of its gradation in the rank of contingent and posterior beings. Deficiency, limitation and privation are the characteristics of beings rather than Being. They are generated during the process of emanation because 'It is necessarily the case that the created thing is not equal to the creator, nor does emanation equal the source of emanation in terms of rank of existence.'⁶ The gradation of Being is also systematic because it is purposeful, unidimensional and determined by Being. It does not leave the emanation of the ontic beings in the world to the caprice of blind chance.

The world of multiplicity and difference is a temporal occurrence and a gradation of Being, because everything emanates from Being and is grounded in it. The non-existence of a particular being precedes its existence in time, and is in the state of non-existence prior to its existence caused by Being. In this process of creation or coming into being of the non-being, an individual being requires a new identity constantly and its existence is not fixed.⁷ Mulla Sadra supports this view of the constant renewing of being in the world by quoting Qur'anic verses. He believes that the renewal of ontic beings is a necessary, autonomous or innate process, because all ontic beings are in a relation of identity to Being. Their existence is based on the reality of Being: 'The Maker, in virtue of His durability and endurance, created this creature which is self-renewal in terms of its essence and identity.'⁸

The systematic ambiguity of Being is the particularization of Being in which Being becomes manifest in its own individual modalities. It is not a process similar to the emanation of particulars from the universal Platonic Forms or to Suhrawardi's Lord of Species, simply because the Necessary Being or the source of this particularization is not a universal form but a single transcendent Being. This can be seen as a significant difference between Mulla Sadra's understanding of the Platonic Forms and Suhrawardi's. Although Plato thinks of the universal forms in the immaterial world as ideas or essences in the Suhrawardian sense, Mulla Sadra insists that they are beings rather than essences and placed at a higher rank of existence in the gradation of Being. Besides, he believes that they are not universal ideas but individual beings responsible for generating species at a lower rank of existence. Having discussed the gradation of Being briefly it is useful at this point to explain more precisely Mulla Sadra's interpretation of emanation for understanding his doctrine of the systematic ambiguity of Being. The process of emanation begins with Pure Being and proceeds to its own particularization, which gives rise to the creation of all beings. This pure Being, as stated before, is neither genus nor species, but a mere identity and simplicity. On the ground of identity, its relationship to beings is equivocal. From this transcendent single and simple Being emanates only one being; the diversity of the ranks belongs to the lower stages of emanation and has no direct contact with the transcendent source. At this stage in understanding Mulla Sadra's ontology, we can state that there are two regions of ontology: the region of Pure Being and that of becoming. The former is characterized by unity and sameness (identity) and the latter by difference, multiplicity and change. These two regions of being are necessarily connected as the former is an ontological ground for the latter. As a consequence of this necessary relationship between ground and grounded, we can conclude that there is no multiplicity without unity. The principle of identity in difference becomes an essential characteristic of the two regions of Being and becoming. Difference becomes possible only on the ground of identity. The presence of unity in emanation is an ontological condition of the equivocal ground for the multiplicity of the grounded.

The systematic ambiguity of Being brings us to the individuation (al-tashakhus) of Being, which is discussed by Mulla Sadra in the second volume of al-Asfar. The meaning of individuation as understood by him signifies the division of a species into undivided units. For example, Socrates as an individual human being is a member of the human species. The concept of human being can be applied to all members of this species, in which case the universal concept cannot become an individuation. On the other hand, an individual human being is not a universal concept, and cannot be applied to all individuals. The main characteristic of individuation is, then, its inapplicability, unlike a universal concept, to other or multiple things.⁹ The individuation of an ontic being is not in its quiddity and it is not something caused by its accident. It is in its existence, which constitutes the reality of its individual existence even in a material form:

The subsequent deficiency is not from the Principle of Existence. But, it is due to its actualization in [its being in] the second rank and thereafter. Deficiencies and privations happen due to the secondary [existence] due to the fact that they are secondary and posterior [in relation to the First Existence]. The First Being [exists], since its perfection is complete, [and thus] it has no limit. Privation and indigence are derived from the emanation and creation, because it is necessarily the case that the created thing is not equal to the creator, nor does emanation equal the source of emanation in terms of rank of existence.¹⁰ involved in this evolutionary process, but at the same time it is not detached from it because it is the ontological originator of the beings and their evolutionary movement. Being is a unity and a non-conditional origin of all things. Otherwise, it cannot exist necessarily without a beginning. Perfection is in contrast to individuation, and distancing of beings is in proximity to Being.

The notion of becoming gives rise to the idea of time or the temporality of the realm of multiplicity. As mentioned earlier, Being, as the origin and the cause of becoming, is not affected by time. Time belongs only to the world of multiplicity of ontic beings. Mulla Sadra's understanding of the concepts of time and change is different from that of Aristotle. In al-Masha'ir, he states that the concept of 'change' described by some philosophers as a mediation between the realm of Being and becoming does not suit our ontological enterprise, because they understand change to be .an additional intelligible affair, which indicates the transition of a thing from potentiality to actuality, rather than the means by which this transition is made.'¹¹ Change, for Mulla Sadra, is a constant transition of substance and time is the measure of trans-substantial change. With this kind of change we encounter an ascending process of evolution towards perfection. Becoming is, then, the reverse of the descending process of the individuation of Being. The descending process is a movement from Being to the lowest rank of beings with less of being and more essence. The universality of Being is reduced until it arrives at the stage of individuals where no universality is further possible. The ascending movement is from the lowest rank to the highest, from the least perfect to the most perfect rank of existence. The doctrine of the systematic ambiguity of Being is nothing more than the increase and decrease of the reality of Being and identity in all ontic beings. The beings are distributed among various ranks due to their being prior or posterior, perfect or imperfect, strong or weak. There is always less and more of Being in the real world. It should be remembered that Mulla Sadra is not the first philosopher to advocate the idea of constant flux. Before him Heraclitus held this view on change. This Greek thinker is known for sayings attributed to him such as 'All things are in a state of flux', and 'You cannot step twice into the same stream'.¹² Being, in this constant flux, particularizes itself and gives rise to multiplicity. Heraclitus also believed that reality was an eternal vital fire, kindled in measures and extinguished in measures. These philosophical views were in contradiction to the views of Parmenides and Zeno of Elea, who argued against the possibility of motion, multiplicity and difference. Parmenides thought of Being as consisting of the same stable reality. Zeno, the disciple of Parmenides, went further to prove the ideas of his teacher by arguments known as Zeno's paradoxes.¹³ The foundation of Heraclitus' ontology, however, has four principles: first, Being is one in many or unity in multiplicity; second, everything changes constantly; third, Being as a living fire is governed by logos; and fourth, Being includes non-being and both generate becoming. After Heraclitus, the notion of becoming became one of the pivotal categories in Hegel's logic. Being and non-being (Nothingness) in dialectical logic are identical because neither has determinations and both are abstractions and also different. But it is a contradiction for two things to be identical and different. This contradiction propels the dialectical progress further. As a consequence of this and as the synthesis of being and non-being, 'becoming' prevails when being passes into non-being and non-being into being. These two movements determine the coming to be and ceasing to be of the beings in the world. Although the notion of trans-substantial change was not used by Heraclitus and Hegel, their interpretation of change and motion, particularly where Heraclitus states that one cannot step twice into the same stream, might be interpreted as trans-substantial change because one cannot have the same kind of being at different times. In the case of accidental change, it is true that the substance remains the same without losing its own identity. For example, when water is cold it receives the form of cold. It becomes hot only when it receives the form of heat by throwing off its previous form; water cannot be cold and hot at the same time. In this kind of change, when a being receives a new form – a bud blossoms and becomes a flower – it does not throw away its previous form. The object becomes perfected and elevated to a higher level of existence by receiving a new and better form without negating the previous one. We can say, in the Hegelian sense, that the previous form is superseded (aufgehoben), preserved and elevated. The trans-substantial change consists of preserving the past forms and yet transcending them. But it does not leave 'substance' without affecting it like its accidents.

In Mulla Sadra's ontology, as in Heraclitus, change is a constant renewal and an evolutionary process towards perfection. It is not a movement from one place to another like the movement of an arrow in space or a train from one station to another. It is a substantial change that dominates all beings in the ontological region of becoming. The causal foundation of this change in beings is not something stable or unchangeable such as substance in Aristotle's metaphysics; rather, it signifies a being that is at the same time affected by change. There is in every accidental change a substantial change; to put it another way, change in accidents is caused by change in substance. This change is a fundamental transformation of a being from one rank of existence to another.¹⁴ All beings come under the influence of this change; nothing remains outside the domain of change and nothing remains the same for ever. If we think of time as the measure of change, then in this context time for Mulla Sadra becomes the measure of this trans-substantial transformation of beings. It is a dominant reality in the span of life of every ontic being and constitutes the ontological structure of the region of becoming.

Change in the four categories or accidents, an idea advocated by Aristotle and Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophers, is possible with change in substance. As a consequence of this, with the exception of change nothing remains durable in the region of becoming. For Mulla Sadra the cause of change is a self-moving substance called the inner reality of Being, which is equivocally shared by all beings. It is, as stated by Fazlur Rahman, the specific nature commonly supposed to create the species in the world.¹⁵ This nature is not stable; it is subject to constant change and brings about accidental changes with itself. The arguments developed by Mulla Sadra to support his notion of change are easy to understand. He states that, since the changeable accidents of beings are caused by their substances, substance itself should be changeable because a motionless cause cannot produce a moved accident. A change in accident should be caused by a change in substance. Otherwise there would be no causal relationship between substance and its accidents. In another argument, he insists that change is an evolution towards perfection. Perfection is achieved when there is a substantial change from a less perfect state to a more perfect state of existence, following which there will be no distinction between the accidental and substantial changes in the world because every accidental change is caused by substantial change. The moving being does not remain the same at the moment of change and throughout the change.

For Aristotle, substance is the primary category and is of two kinds: primary and secondary. Primary substance, such as individuals, is neither a predicate of a subject nor in a subject. Secondary substance, such as genera and species, which includes primary substance, is a predicate of a subject in a proposition but not in a subject. All other nine categories are present in the subject. Substance is also considered a stable nucleus. Changes occur only in the four categories of quality, quantity, place and position. For this reason, Aristotle talks about four kinds of change: in a being itself, in quality, in quantity and in place. A change involving the being of a thing is generation and corruption; a change in quality is alteration, in quantity it is increase and decrease, and a change in place is locomotion. These changes will be from a certain status in an entity to its contrary. Substance as the substratum presupposed by the categories has no contrariety so is not affected by change.¹⁶ Some Muslim theologians, such as the Mu'tazilites (with the exception of al-Nazzam), the Ash'arites, and Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina and his followers, agreed with Aristotle and accepted the interpretation of the possibility of change in accident. In rejecting the idea of change in substance, Ibn Sina, for example, states:

However, if it is claimed that motion occurs in substance, then this is a figurative expression. No motion occurs in substance because if a nature of a substance deteriorates, it will be sudden. And if it is originated, it is still sudden. There is no middle perfection between potency and mere act. Substantial form is not subject to increase and decrease, nor is it subject to intensity and weakness. The reason is that if it is subject to these factors, then inevitably either it will remain within the increasing or decreasing of its species, and the substantial form does not change.

Ibn Sina, in his discussion on the existence of the physical world in al-Shifa, insists that the archetype of the beings remains stable from the beginning to the end of motion in all situations. If we accept this point, then the substance will not require change. The resulting change and motion in beings occurs only in one or more than one of the four categories of substance indicated by Aristotle.

The question that arises here is how can we think of identity when everything is subject to constant substantial change? How can we think that a being which undergoes trans-substantial change is the same being or has an identity? These questions also remind us the problem of personal identity discussed by David Hume in his refutation of the Cartesian concept of self-substance. In criticizing the Cartesian theory, Hume argued that nothing remains the same in the world and that resemblance is the cause of the mistake in substituting the notion of identity: 'For when we attribute identity, in an improper sense, to variable or interrupted objects, our mistake is not confined to the expression, but is commonly attended with a fiction, either of something invariable and uninterrupted, or of something mysterious and inexplicable, or at least with a propensity to such fiction.'¹⁸ The notion of personal identity in this case is fictitious and a product of our imagination, because the changes that happen in a being are slow and gradual. In trans-substantial change, all beings (corporeal and non-corporeal) change constantly. They are originated and renewed at each moment. No single being remains permanently the same. Every being is different and new at every new moment. Mulla Sadra's view regarding this problem is in one respect similar to that of Hume. First, he states that trans-substantial change occurs unnoticed because it is gradual and slow. We think that the change has not occurred and that the being is the same. Second, we attribute sameness to a being because the mind employs universal concepts for describing the essences, which are static. Trans-substantial change is usually noticed when the being of a being arrives at a crucial stage of modification or undergoes a sudden change. In addition to this, Mulla Sadra believes that the identity of a person relies on the intellectual form of that person, which exists in the mind of God. For God, a person is the same; otherwise he or she is not the same.¹⁹ From this interpretation, we can conclude that the renewal process of the world is not externally caused or is not something in contrast to Being. Whatever goes through change is one of the modalities of Being, which has a temporal dimension and belongs to the region of becoming. Since change is the mode of beings, then Being, its modalities and the process of becoming are necessarily connected. Change does not take place in beings as an external event; instead, beings originate change internally, and the external conditions, such as being in the world and being an individuation, facilitate that change. If we understand the relationship between Being and its modalities without making a substantial distinction between them, all their differences on the ground of their ontological unity and identity disappear. A human being, as a combination of intellect and body, is nothing more than a modality of Being; or, more precisely, an individuation of Being aiming at its own transcendence through the gateway of self-understanding and approximation to Being. In this process of change, this modality of Being rises above the boundaries of its own finitude and limitation as it is capable of understanding the meaning of its own existence and seeks the Truth. It is on the foundation of this ontology and the gradations of the modalities of Being that the meaning of (humanity) within the intentionality of the upward movement should be understood. The way in which Mulla Sadra looks at the gradations of the modality of Being in the trans-substantial change from less perfect to more perfect can be used to address humanity in plurality. Within the development of this modality towards perfection, and by realizing the end in the 'perfect human being', we come across a range of human existence at different ontological-historical stages and different kinds of humanity. Particularly in the light of this kind of change, it is possible for us to talk about less or more humanity at different ranks of existence in the same way we describe a being as smaller or larger.

Mulla Sadra's ontology, in particular the doctrine of systematic ambiguity of Being, bridges the gulf between monism and pluralism. This can be elucidated in considering the principle of identity in difference. Identity is established on the ground of the reality of Being as a simple reality that contains the multiplicity of its own modification. The external reality as Being and the modifications of Being, which have less or more of being, are characterized by unity and diversity. Diversity is a mode of the single and simple reality of Being. The multiple modalities of Being do not exist in themselves as separate realities, as is the case in pluralism. Here, Being is one and all other things that exist are the modalities of this reality.

Since the systematic ambiguity of Being is nothing more than an increase or decrease in the intensity of Being, the trans-substantial change is an existential movement. It happens to Being as a change in the intensification of Being rather than a change in essence. Nor is change in the categories of quality and quantity a gradual or continuous intensification of quality and quantity in a particular type of being; it is their replacement by a new one. Here, Mulla Sadra is talking about the definite quality and quantity of a being.²⁰ Intensification of a quality, for example 'whiteness' in a body, is not an increase in intensity of the same quality of 'whiteness'. It is a replacement of the former 'whiteness' by another 'whiteness' with more intensity in its 'being' white. This kind of change can be seen as the mutation of the former definite quality and the emergence of a totally new quality. This is the case also with a definite quantity of ontic beings. In a quantitative change, a new quantity replaces the old quantity. As a result, beings in the world are in constant change and renewal until they reach their own perfection, where no further change is thinkable. What undergoes change but at the same time endures in this evolutionary process is Being as the being of all beings and their unity.²¹ Since beings are the modalities of Being, undergo through constant change we can conclude that all kinds of change occur in beings are also Being and by Being. Being is, therefore, in a self-evolutionary process that has no cause except Being itself. Being is the origin of change but still unchangeable.

The existential movement of Being begins with emanation or the descending movement from the realm of unity to the realms of potentiality and multiplicity, which are called the region of 'becoming'. We also call this downward process the particularization of Being. The second phase of change, by contrast, is the ascending movement of the particularization of Being through trans-substantial change upward towards perfection. This descending-ascending process can also be described as a movement from perfection to imperfection and then from imperfection to perfection; from Being to its own particularization and then from the particularization of Being back to Being. The distinctiveness of this two-fold movement of Being is that no accidental change takes place without substantial change. Furthermore, the existential movement of Being is both vertical and horizontal. In the vertical direction, the movement is from the lowest rank to the highest and is governed by the objective of achieving perfection or arriving at the highest rank of being. Here it seems that Mulla Sadra is in agreement with Proclus (410–485), a Hellenic philosopher of the Anaximander School of Neoplatonism who subdivides the process of emanation into horizontal and vertical. For both thinkers, the vertical movement ends with arriving at the most perfect state of existence.

In his discussion of the ascending process and the vertical movement of all beings towards the goal of perfection, Mulla Sadra understood the significance of human existence for the realization of this goal. The foundation of human existence, in the systematic ambiguity of Being, is potentiality. Human existence gradually fulfils itself by moving away from potentiality to actuality. At the start, there is only the realm of pure potentiality emanated from Being, but, in the evolutionary process of vertical trans-substantial change, human existence moves towards the realm of actuality. The journey ends with the emergence of the perfect human being (al-insan al-kamil), who attains unity with the Intelligences or divine attributes: 'These Intelligences themselves have little to attain by way of perfection, since all their perfections are already realized, for, as Divine Attributes, they are united with God's existence.'²² The other direction of change, namely horizontal movement, determines the transformation of the world through a succession of infinite forms. This movement is infinite in the sense that it has no end and, unlike the vertical movement, is not determined by the realization of the end. The trans-substantial movement also resembles the idea of the creative evolution advocated by Bergson, for whom the world is in a constant, multidimensional and vertical process of creative evolution.

Dissatisfied with the mechanistic explanation presented by Laplacean scientific theory and the Darwinian concept of natural selection, Bergson argued that 'mechanism' was inadequate for understanding reality as it neglected other aspects of reality such as duration and creative evolution. The mechanistic account of evolution was also directionless and an outcome of mere chance.²³ For Bergson, the directionality of evolution was a vital field of constant renewal and creativity in which 'duration' rather than physical time played a significant role in transforming life from a lower to a higher state. Evolution was conceived in terms of an unbroken continuation of life in multiple directions. Duration, as the temporality of life, was a single indivisible continuity in which all three elements of past, present and future became integrated parts. To explain this, Bergson presents the analogy of human personality. We are aware of the development in our personality and this development is not seen as a mechanical change in which one state of existence is replaced by another. The change persists and is secured by memory, which establishes the connection between past, present and future.²⁴ The dissimilarities between Mulla Sadra's trans-substantial change and Bergson's creative evolution arise with directionality and purpose. The former kind of change is unidirectional in its vertical movement and culminates in the perfect human being. The latter is multidirectional and infinite. Another dissimilarity is in the teleological conception of evolution in trans-substantial change, which is that evolution fulfils a predetermined plan of Being. In contrast, creative evolution in Bergson's philosophy is a constant growth, like a snowball rolling down a slope. This growth is also without a predetermined purpose and is thus an ontological foundation for free will.

Mulla Sadra's doctrine of trans-substantial change is directly related to the notion of time and the temporality of the ontic beings in the world. It leads at the same time to the problem of the creation of the world in time. In the history of Islamic thought the Qur'anic paradigm of 'creation ex nihilo', which is in contradiction to the Hellenistic principle of 'ex nihilo nihil fit', created a problem for some Muslim thinkers. Al-Kindi (d. 866) for example used Aristotelian principles and self-evident propositions in order to demonstrate the finitude of the world and to vindicate the Qur'anic paradigm of creation ex nihilo.²⁵ For al-Kindi and the adherents of the Qur'anic paradigm, the world had a beginning and was created in time by God. Al-Farabi and Ibn Sina found a solution to this contradiction between the Qur'anic paradigm of 'creation ex nihilo' and the Hellenistic principle in the doctrine of emanation provided by Plotinus, which enabled them to argue that the world was created neither ex nihilo nor from the eternal prime matter of Aristotle, but emanated from God eternally. In trans-substantial change, the creation of the world is viewed from the perspective of the doctrine of emanation, but at the same time this perspective is not void of problems. It is also important to understand that in Mulla Sadra's ontology the world is an event and is originated, which means that it is temporal. At the same time, the emanation of the world still appears to be a-temporal simply because God, who is the efficient cause and the source of the emanation, is eternal and not in time. God's time, as stated by Mir Damad, the teacher of Mulla Sadra, is eternal 'sarmad'.²⁶ In addition to this conception of time, Mir Damad refers to 'dahr' perpetuity and 'zaman' cosmological time as two different forms of time belonging to two different spheres of Being. Dahr describes the relation between the unchangeable divine attributes and the sensible world. Zaman is used for the temporality of the ontic beings in the sensible world. Zaman, therefore, cannot exist without the world and did not exist before the creation of material objects. The sensible world, which exists in zaman and depends on the divine attributes to exist, is outside the sphere of dahr and sarmad, whereas the divine attributes are in dahr but not in zaman.²⁷ Since the creation of the world is in zaman, and the sensible world is real, zaman should also have an objective reality. It cannot be a mere subjective notion in the Kantian sense. Mulla Sadra accepted the division of time by his teacher, but believed that it required further investigation. On one hand, time is said not to exist objectively. On the other hand, the relation of time to the existential movement in the world provides an ontological ground for the objectivity of time. One can claim that, since existential movement is objective, time as the measure of that movement is also objective. Even the notion of time, which is subjective and exists only in the mind, should be caused by something external and must have a connection with the objective existential movement in the world. This, however, does not mean that time is a quality of the existential movement. It should also be remembered that we cannot think of time without the existential movement in the world.²⁸ Since the emanation of the world from the divine attributes of God did not happen in zaman because zaman is not prior to the creation of the world, the world is, then, a-temporally originated.

In trans-substantial change, the only being not affected is Being, because Being is pure actuality and perfect. It can still be argued, however, that since the world is originated from Being and is part of it, then it is Being that changes and transforms itself by itself into its own modalities. This view is also the foundation of the mystic conviction held by some Sufis, who rejected the dichotomy of reality and appearance. From this understanding of time it should be clear that Mulla Sadra's concept of the temporality of the world is different from the concept of the creation of the world in time. Here the world is not in time but exists with time or is substantially temporal. The sensible world and time co-exist and belong together. Temporality is not an indication of the beginning and the end of the world because the world does not end in Mulla Sadra's ontological interpretation. Temporality is simply the measure of trans-substantial change, and the origination of the world should be understood as a consequence of this change. Every moment in this trans-substantial change is a beginning as well as an end, in this constant and endless process of change. The world is, therefore, endless or eternal but does not stay the same, since the creation of a new substance is the annihilation of the previous one. The world is temporal as it goes through change but is a-temporal because change is permanent and remains for ever; it does not fall into the abyss of nothingness. In each moment there is a being that did not exist before, and this determines the temporal dimension of existence.

Without the objective existence of the existential movement there will not be an objective space-time continuum. The objectivity of time is a logical requirement of the objectivity of the existential movement of Being. At this point, Mulla Sadra's view contradicts Ibn Sina's understanding of the subjectivity of the notion of time, which is derived from movement as continuity or passage from the beginning to the end as a whole.²⁹ But does this mean that time is something real? If it is real, we need to assert its objectivity just as the objectivity of the world is asserted. But Mulla Sadra insists that time is not independent of the existential movement of Being. It is not like a container in which all events occur. It is one of the dimensions of the world that cannot be separated from it.³⁰ Elsewhere he states that the existential movement of Being is not different from time because 'the measure and the measured are the same'.³¹ On one hand, Mulla Sadra believes that time is not independent of the existential movement of the world and not something real like a being; on the other hand, he identifies time as the measure of the trans-substantial change that accompanies the existential movement. In this way Mulla Sadra's interpretation of time is different from that of his predecessors. Time is neither subjective nor objective, because it is not a mere concept or a fancy that has no representation in the external world. nor can it be seen as something that exists outside human thinking. Time is, rather, a subjective-objective, existential and non-existential dimension of reality. It is the measure of an objective existential movement, and an inherent function of the world, which is conceived intellectually.

Time is also eternal. The temporality of time is eternity for two reasons: first is emanation, through which the world came into existence and which is eternal. Second, whatever is thought to be prior to time is necessarily in time, because priority involves time.³² Time, in this respect, is distinct from space, because the finitude of space does not involve space beyond space. The notion of time prior to time involves real time because, as Mulla Sadra believes, the reality of time is in the mind.³³ Here, Mulla Sadra thinks of time as something subjective. Does his notion of subjectivity prove time to be an essence because essence for him is an intellectual property? Time is not a mere subjective notion; it has a reality of its own as well. In this case, the status of time is not like that of essence. For this reason, Mulla Sadra insists that time is something positive and has a peculiar existence, and has an essence as well.³⁴ Time, therefore, has existence as well as essence. The existence of time is the reality of time inherent in the trans-substantial movement of Being, while its essence, or the mental concept of time, is the relational factor of the continuity.³⁵ Mulla Sadra does not claim that time is subjective or objective; it is only from his conceptions of the systematic ambiguity of Being and trans-substantial change that we arrive at this inference.

To return to the differences between Mulla Sadra's and Heidegger's ontology, one is that this Muslim philosopher accepted the doctrine of emanation. For Mulla Sadra, the world emanated or originated from Pure Being. Emanation can be seen as a temporal origination of the world, as everything in the world is determined by trans-substantial movement. All beings in the world go through change and are preceded by the temporal non-existence of their beings. Ontic beings continually come into existence and pass away. Every moment in this substantial change is death and rebirth of the same being with a new substance and a new form. Death exists only in this sense as a constant substantial change. Non-being, like being, becomes the reality of all beings. The world is, thus, a temporal surfacing of the reality of Being, which continues eternally. It is a temporal origination from a non-temporal origin. The temporal originality of the world and the notion of perpetual trans-substantial change seem to contradict one another. It is stated on one hand that the world is originated and on the other Mulla Sadra insists on the idea permanent change. Here, perpetuity does not mean that the world is eternal in the sense that it has no beginning, or that everything existed eternally without beginning. If the world is in a state of flux, nothing will remain perpetual, and only in this regard can we say that the world is in constant change and renewal. This interpretation is also doomed to failure, because the vertical direction of existential movement has a definite objective end. The trans-substantial change ceases when it reaches the highest rank of its existence and perfection. In addition, nothing attains or rises above the supreme level of the ontological rank of Being, and change does not govern beings, which are pure actuality. If we consider an immaterial being such as 'intellect' to be entirely actuality without potentiality, the intellect will not change. Change is a movement from potentiality to actuality but not in an Aristotelian sense because it includes change in substance. It is for this reason that Pure Being and the divine attributes are not affected by change. Potentiality is the state of imperfection while actuality is not. What does Mulla Sadra mean by perpetual change? Does he mean that the realm of potentiality and multiplicity remains eternally? Does this movement end by attaining perfection or the highest possible rank of existence?

Since emanation is thought to be eternal and constant, it seems that 'becoming', in Mulla Sadra's systematic ambiguity of Being, is endless. In their various ontological ranks, ontic beings differ in their intensity, priority, posteriority, perfection and imperfection. They succeed one another vertically as well as horizontally. There will be a beginning and an end for an ontic being that exists at a particular time and space but that is not the case with Being as the inner reality of that ontic being, because trans-substantial change will elevate this being from a lower to a higher rank of existence with a new substance and form. There is a constant substantial change, which gives a new identity to the existents at every moment. In the region of becoming, nothing remains the same and nothing resists the stream of this continuous flux and renewal. Finality can be achieved only in the realm of unity with Pure Being. In the ontological region of history truth, knowledge and moral values, under the impact of this flux of becoming, also change constantly. Nothing in the human world can be seen as eternally existent. Another important point is that, with this great novelty in the world, trans-substantial change, like the dialectical movement in Hegel's philosophy, is necessary and determines the progress towards perfection without leaving individuals room for free choice. This point can be challenged, however, on the same ground as in Hegel's philosophy: since trans-substantial change occurs in Being by Being, it is self-determined and hence a free existential movement. Freedom in this case is interpreted on the ground of necessity. The plausibility of this argument is, however, in the premise that the changeable world is not to be different from what determines the change. But what determines the change is not individual free will. It is something beyond that, which brings everything under its own determination. This argument is better understood in the light of Hegel's category of being-for-itself. In the sphere of 'Determinate Being' in his logic, there are two dialectical aspects: being-in-itself (positive) and being-for-other (negative). These two aspects unite and their union becomes True Infinite. The essential character of this new category is being-for-itself.³⁶ The new category is without external limitation and its otherness is not something other than itself. Consciousness, for example, as being-for-itself, is self-consciousness. It is aware of itself as well as the external world. The external world, at the same time, is nothing but the self-manifestation of consciousness. It is idea in its otherness. In this case the contradictions between consciousness and the external world (its otherness) are negated and consciousness becomes self-related and a being-for-itself. It has no otherness and no external limitation. This is thought to be a necessary ground for freedom in Hegel's philosophy. Similarly in Mulla Sadra's ontology being determines its own modalities and transforms them constantly.

The existential movement of the world is not blind or capricious. It is for a purpose. Being, which is identical with God in Mulla Sadra's onto-theology, has no direct causal relationship with this continuity or with the trans-substantial change of its own modalities. There is an intrinsic motive vehicle responsible for accomplishing this task. This motive is the mystic force of love ('ishq), which is present in everything and creates in lower-ranked beings the desire to long for beings in the higher ranks of existence. The notion of love as the main force in the world depicts a mystic (Sufi) influence on Mulla Sadra's metaphysical thinking. Before Mulla Sadra, Ibn Sina expressed similar views in Risala fil 'Ishq (A Treatise on Love), in which he stated that all entities in the world, including matter, move under the sway of cosmic love.³⁷ The relationship between the self and the Reality in Sufism is primordially emotional rather than theoretical. It is the emotional motive ('ishq) which leads to the rise of the mystic way of cognition (ma'rifah). The emotional motive is not only primordial; it is also the ontological constitution of the world, including the self. Ibn Sina also believed that the self was born with this intrinsic motive: 'Ardent love is innate' all things flow from God in a process of necessary emanation and return to Him in a process of necessary love.'³⁸ The primacy of emotion, however, does not nullify the significance of cognition. The self can approach Reality passionately without appropriating it epistemologically. It is also this emotional motive that elevates the self to the stage where it can experience Reality.

Mulla Sadra is in agreement with Ibn Sina that even prime matter is infected by love. His argument supporting this idea is based on the positivity of prime matter. Prime matter is the realm of potentiality and potentiality is something positive, or that which exists. Being is a reality commonly shared by all existents, including prime matter. To all beings, whether at the level of potentiality or actuality, the divine attributes (knowledge, will and power) function with various degrees of intensity. These attributes belong to Being or the inner reality of all beings. Prime matter, which is at the bottom of the descending process of emanation and is considered to be pure potentiality, is capable of receiving forms and becoming actual. More specifically, it has longing and affection for forms. This mystic love penetrates all modalities of being as a motive to assist their progress towards perfection. It prevails everywhere, and wherever there is existence there will be love and longing for perfection.³⁹ In clarifying this point, Fazlur Rahman remarks that the degree of intensity of 'love' is not only in consciousness, such as in human beings. It also exists equally in all beings. Matter, as the most deficient and lowly ranked of all beings, should have a high degree of intensity of 'love' for the higher ranks.⁴⁰ As a consequence, the world, including inanimate beings, can be seen as a loving body with various degrees of intensity of love and longing for perfection. When human beings attain unity with Intellects or divine attributes through the form of the perfect human being, their yearning reaches the point of satisfaction. They no longer yearn for a higher rank of existence, because their longing for perfection will no longer exist. The world is, therefore, characterized by renewal; the things and events of the past are in the past and those of the future are yet to come. Temporality is the progress of the world as a constant becoming and creation. Every new moment is a non-existence that comes into being through trans-substantial change.

The main consequences of the doctrine of trans-substantial change are religious; for example its impact on the notions of resurrection and divine retribution. They can also be philosophical. It cannot be denied that the doctrine expounded by Mulla Sadra changes our understanding of the two religious notions and also opens a discussion on the transmigration of the soul. The transmigration of the soul has been discussed in the history of Muslim philosophy by Muslim philosophers such as Abu Bakr al-Razi, Ibn Sina and Suhrawardi, in addition to Mulla Sadra. They raised the possibility of the transmigration of the soul from one species to another, for example the human soul to animals or plants. Of particular importance to Mulla Sadra's ideas is Suhrawardi's understanding of this question. Suhrawardi deals with the transmigration of the soul in several books, but in Hikmat al-Ishraq he argues that human bodies are in a position to receive a managing rational soul or managing light, while animals receive only imperfect human souls:

Whatever moral habit captures the commanding light, whatever dark state becomes established in it and becomes its support, the commanding light must transfer its attachment after the corruption of its fortress to a fortress corresponding to that dark state: a fortress of one of the brute animals. When the commanding light departs from the human fortress, it is darkened and desirous of darkness. It does not know its source or the world of light. Wicked states have become fixed in it, and it is drawn to the brute fortress of other animals, and the darkness beckons to it.⁴¹

Suhrawardi argues for the transmigration of the soul by insisting that the condition of life after death is dependent on the balance of knowledge and action in the previous life. With regard to the new form obtained by the human soul, he puts forward the notion of 'suspended forms' (suwar al-mu'allaq). These forms, like the Platonic forms, are transcendent but are not in the immutable rank of existence. Some are dark (evil) and some luminous (good). After death, the wicked souls, those that failed to live a balanced life between knowledge and action, are gathered in hell and deprived of their suspended form in accordance with their character in the previous life.⁴² Shahrazuri, the disciple of Suhrawardi, clarifies the position of his master by saying that Suhrawardi accepted the transmigration of the human soul to an animal body, but rejected the transmigration of the human soul into plants and they will be given bodies of the lower rank of existence.⁴³ When we come to discuss transmigration in Mulla Sadra's philosophy, particularly in the light of trans-substantial change, we expect him to argue against it. Trans-substantial change is an irreversible progress and cannot be seen as a movement from a more perfect or developed to a less perfect and undeveloped rank of existence. A being, like a human soul in a developed human body, is not expected to take an animal body, which is less perfect than a human body and is at a lower rank of being. In other words, demotion in trans-substantial change is not only absurd but impossible.⁴⁴ Mulla Sadra's denial of the transmigration of the soul, according to Fazlur Rahman, is beset with a problem. In Islam, the notion of bodily resurrection implies the transmigration of the soul in so far as it is thought to be a reunion of the soul with a new body.⁴⁵ Mulla Sadra's treatment of this matter takes the middle position between the views of those who believe in the survival of the intellect after death, and those who accept the survival of the body as well. He explains that in the afterlife the human intellect is able to apprehend the general ideas in the rational realm in the way it apprehends and perceives different physical objects in this world. But the apprehended general ideas are not mere concepts without a reality of their own. They are real, ontological and identical with actual existence, and are experienced by the human intellect. What then happens to the human body at death? Is it disjoined from the soul and does it then decay? Will the human soul be given a new body? To answer these questions Mulla Sadra, like Suhrawardi, talks about the World of the Images ('alam al-khayal). The bodies of the undeveloped souls, the souls that have committed sins, deteriorate at the time of death and are not reassembled as before. In order to survive physically, they create a material body for themselves by externalizing their inner psychic states in the form of a body in the World of the Images. Thus a human soul that is guilty of committing a sin will imagine itself as an animal.⁴⁶ The important questions that arise here are: what is the destiny of the human soul that has gone through trans-substantial change? Am I the same sinner of yesterday who committed a sin to be punished or substantially transformed into another human being? If I am not the same person, why should I be punished for the sins committed by me in the past? There is, no doubt, a problem here. But Mulla Sadra provides two different answers to these questions. On one hand, he believes that the identity of a person relies on the intellectual form of that person, which exists in the mind of God.⁴⁷ On the other hand, the soul is thought to survive throughout the evolutionary changes, and that this helps the person to retain an identity.⁴⁸ This solution, which has similarity with Descartes's view on the human soul as the self-substance, is in my opinion in contradiction with the implication of the trans-substantial change.

The philosophical consequences of trans-substantial change can be summarized in three points: the temporal contingency of the world; the infection of being by non-being or nothingness; and the relativity of truth and values.

Mulla Sadra demonstrates that the world is in constant substantial change. This ontological view is an indication of the non-being of beings that have not yet come into existence. Non-being or nothingness is at the heart of the world. That is to say, an existent is preceded by its own non-existence.⁴⁹ The passage of being into non-being and of non-being into being is 'becoming', which was also demonstrated by Hegel and discussed earlier, and in contradiction of Aristotle's understanding of Nothingness. In Aristotle's ontology, non-being is neither in motion nor at rest, because for non-being to move it should be in a place, which it is not, and if it were it would be somewhere.⁵⁰ Mulla Sadra seems to have borrowed the idea of coming-into-being from Mir Damad. Sabzawari, in explaining the relationship between eternities and becoming in time, states that becoming through perpetual duration or constant creation was proposed by Mir Damad. He further maintains that, for Mir Damad, the coming-into-being of the world by way of becoming through perpetual duration is a temporal coming-into-existence, or 'the precedence of "preceding non-existence" over the existence of a thing by way of separable precedence of it, i.e., of the non-existence'.⁵¹ This is an interesting point in Hegel's logic as well as in the phenomenological interpretation of the structure of consciousness in Sartre's Being and Nothingness. Being, for Hegel, is an undeduced beginning and pure because it has no determination or qualification. It is the most abstract category in his dialectical logic. It is nothing more than a simple 'isness'.⁵² Since this undeduced beginning has not passed over into another or its opposition, it is self-identical. When it produces its opposite it undergoes change and becomes different. But saying that Being is an immediacy and has no determination except 'isness' implies mere emptiness and the equivalent of 'Nothing' or non-being.⁵³ Being, therefore, becomes the birthplace of nothingness, and the two categories become the first two oppositions in Hegel's logic holding the relationship of identity in difference. When 'Being' and 'Nothingness' pass over into one another they produce the category of 'becoming'. When understood in the light of the dialectical interpretation in Hegel's logic, the meaning and significance of becoming as an important category in Mulla Sadra's ontology can be grasped. It is a process that involves being and nothingness. Being of a being is subsequent to its nothingness; this is the temporal origination of the ontic being in the realm of potentiality and diversity. Sartre also deals with the problem of Nothingness in detail. But, unlike Mulla Sadra and Hegel, he insists that Pure Being cannot become the source of Nothingness and that the only being responsible for bringing nothingness into the world with itself is consciousness. This is described by Sartre in Being and Nothingness as follows:

We perceived that nothingness can be conceived neither outside of being, nor as a complementary, abstract notion, nor as an infinite milieu where Being is suspended. Nothingness must be given at the heart of being, in order for us to be able to apprehend that particular type of realities which we have called négarités. But this intra-mundane Nothingness cannot be produced by Being-in-itself; the notion of Being as full positivity does not contain Nothingness as one of its structures. We cannot even say that Being excludes it. Being lacks all relations to it.

Hence the question which is put to us now with a particular urgency: if Nothingness can be conceived neither outside of Being, nor in terms of Being, and if on the other hand, since it is non-being, it cannot derive from itself the necessary force to 'nihilate itself', where does Nothingness come from?⁵⁴

To prove his point, Sartre gives the example of finding Pierre in the café where Sartre tries to say that Nothingness is experienced by consciousness. Sartre also argues with Kant's view that negation is the quality of a judgment (proposition), and Nothingness is logically prior to negation; that we experience Nothingness and negation before making a judgment.⁵⁵ The distinction between the existentialist views of Mulla Sadra and Sartre is in the origin or birthplace of Nothingness. Mulla Sadra insists that all contingent beings, including the human intellect, are preceded by their own non-existence in the world. For Sartre, Nothingness is a characteristic of the ontological structure of consciousness. The being of non-conscious being is not infected by Nothingness.

As far as the distinction between Being and Nothingness is concerned, it is clear, at least for Sartre, that both can be experienced intuitively as two realities. In Hegel's dialectical logic, they pass over into one another and their causal relationship can be recognized. But what is the distinction between one non-being (nothingness) and another? Is there a causal relationship between them? Mulla Sadra does not engage in this discussion, but Sabzawari, one of the followers of Mulla Sadra, says that the distinction between non-beings is imaginary and they have no causal relationship: a non-being cannot be a cause for another non-being. Is it possible, then, to say that the non-being of clouds is a cause for the non-being of rain? Or that the non-existence of oxygen is a cause for the non-being of human life? Sabzawari would say that such statements, which show the causal connection between two non-beings, are only the realization of the absence of beings such as the non-presence of clouds and rain, and that in reality we are not dealing with non-being or nothingness.⁵⁶ But when we study read Sartre we find out that the realization of the non-presence of a being, as in the case of searching for Pierre in the café, is a legitimate ground for experiencing the non-being of Pierre. It is the non-being or non-presence of Pierre that produces a negative proposition such as 'There is no Pierre in the café'. If we go back to the causal relationship between the non-existence of oxygen in space and the non-existence of human life and say that 'Such a void is the cause of death', we are making an affirmative proposition that explicates the causal relationship between two non-beings in an affirmative way. Meanwhile, we cannot deny that every affirmation is a negation. Void, here, can be understood as the absence of oxygen; so that the non-being of oxygen in space causes death or the non-being of life. Sabzawari's argument for the non-existence of the causal relationship between non-beings can thus be refuted.

Another philosophical consequence is that trans-substantial change leads to the relativity of truth and values. The doctrine of trans-substantial change deconstructs the metaphysical foundation of universal truth and values, as nothing is considered to be eternal and stable in the world. Everything is in constant change, including human society and our understanding of reality. As a consequence of this, no system of belief can claim to be absolute and final, because the novelty prevails. This consequence also had a profound impact on Mulla Sadra's understanding of politics, in particular political Islam, which proclaims the divinity and universality of its discourse. Mulla Sadra made a vivid distinction between religion and politics or between religious laws and political laws and rejected the identity of the former with the latter. Religious laws are characterized by generality and necessity, and political laws by particularity and dependence on the human situation.⁵⁷ This distinction between religion and politics in Mulla Sadra's philosophy stands in contradiction to Shi'ite political thought, which claims a necessary link between religion and politics, and states that no true Islamic political system is established without religious laws. A true Islamic political system is possible on the foundation of the religious laws and the presence of an imam (a spiritual leader and a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad) to implement the law. Although Mulla Sadra is a Shi'ite thinker and accepts the doctrine of the imamate, he still believes in constant change in nature and history. For him, however, trans-substantial change rules over both nature and history; ontology and social system are necessarily interconnected. It is not possible to understand Mulla Sadra's political philosophy without understanding his metaphysics. For him, as for Hegel, metaphysics is the foundation of all natural and historical phenomena.⁵⁸

Any socio-political system existing at any stage of human history is not final and should be superseded by a social system richer and more perfect in content. According to Mulla Sadra, in a perfect society all members live together in harmony and cooperate to achieve the highest good and the full realization of Truth. In contrast, in an imperfect society the members cooperate to execute evil.⁵⁹ Since change is the essential characteristic of the world, the imperfect society should also be seen in the light of the evolutionary process of the existential movement of the world. The evolutionary process of the world is towards perfection rather than deterioration. Mulla Sadra's view on political leadership in a perfect society is similar to that of al-Farabi in Mabadi Ara Ahl al-Madina al-Fadila. Al-Farabi, like Mulla Sadra, makes his metaphysical interpretation of reality the foundation of his political philosophy. The socio-political system in a 'perfect society' needs to function in harmony with the system of the universe designed by the First Cause. For al-Farabi, this interconnection is founded on the doctrine of emanation. Following this doctrine, al-Farabi places his view of the relationship between the state and civil society in the hierarchy of the system of the universe, in which the emanation of various forms of being flows from the First Cause. This metaphysical structure is a political model.⁶⁰ The diversity of emanation represents varying social groups and political institutions, which are subordinated to the authority or to the will of the supreme statesman. Mulla Sadra, like al-Farabi, holds the view that a leader of the perfect society should be someone of sound mind and body who has attained the rank of actual intellect:

That man [the leader] is a person over whom nobody has any sovereignty whatsoever. He is a man who has reached his perfection and has become actual intellect and actual being thought (intelligized), his representative faculty having by nature reached its utmost perfection in the way stated by us; this faculty of his is predisposed by nature to receive, either in waking life or in sleep, from the Active Intellect the particulars, either as they are or by imitating them, and also the intelligibles, by imitating them. His Passive Intellect will have reached its perfection by [having apprehended] all the intelligibles, so that none of them is kept back from it, and it will have become actual intellect and actual being thought.⁶¹

The leader of the perfect society is not the lawmaker but the executor of the law, which is divine and pre-given. Like the ruling organ in the human body, the leader is chiefly responsible for the rise and fall of state and society. The bearer of such responsibility must further possess two kinds of qualities: natural (inborn) and acquired. Natural qualities are beyond one's capacity to choose or acquire after birth. For example, the statesman cannot choose which family or situation to be born into. The prime inborn quality, which precedes all other qualities, is that a statesman is born as an imam; in the Shi'ite context, he should be a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad, a male from his household, ahl al-Bayt:

This is the sovereign over whom no other human being has any sovereignty whatsoever; he is the imam, he is the first sovereign of the excellent city, he is the sovereign of the excellent nation, and the sovereign of the universal state (the oikumene).⁶²

Although al-Farabi does not mention in Ara that the leader should be from ahl al-bayt, it is clear that the notion of the imam, which is explicitly expressed in Ara, logically presupposes this understanding of leadership. The imam is the only statesman qualified to lead a perfect society, politically as well as spiritually. He is a leader who is granted revelation or is in contact with God, receiving inspiration from the First Principle to guide his perfect society. For Mulla Sadra, the leader should be a theosopher (hakim) who, on attaining perfection in all intellectual faculties, becomes a prophet.⁶³ This view seems incompatible with Mulla Sadra's idea of the distinction between religion and politics. The leader as theosopher and prophet in a perfect society has religious as well as political authority. His rule becomes the execution of the divine will and law. The compatibility of religion and politics belongs to the realm of becoming, where nothing remains stable, or where politics, like religion, becomes universal. But since nothing escapes trans-substantial change, religion and politics must each go through change from a less perfect to a more perfect stage of existence.⁶⁴ The purpose of political life, in the perfect society, is spiritual salvation, so the political order will be divinely oriented and the state will be based on the divine creeds. Mulla Sadra's analysis of politics is, in the light of his metaphysics, an intellectual attempt to explain the place of human beings in the world for achieving collectivism and divinity. He believes that politics is the social sphere where the individual soul experiences belonging to a social system and works with other individuals for a better form of collective life.⁶⁵ He also believes that the leadership in the perfect society is the real guardian of social justice and the divine laws.⁶⁶ Political life is, therefore, imperative in the evolutionary process of existence. The achievement of perfection and the realization of Truth are possible in history. The worldly life is a ladder to ascend to another form of living in the Hereafter as another aspect of existence.

As mentioned earlier, Muslim philosophers before Mulla Sadra, under the influence of Aristotle, tended to acknowledge the reality of change only in the form of accidentality. For Mulla Sadra what was foremost in his mind was change in the form of becoming, with substantial and accidental changes. His novel interpretation of the world is a genuinely innovative philosophical project which involves the development of a new intellectual outlook, conceptual framework and values. The task of philosophy is to actively interpret reality rather than give a mere conceptual translation of it. To achieve this, the creative interpretation should break from tradition and prepare the way for the future. Next, in the light of this innovative interpretation, Mulla Sadra's existential philosophy proves to be far from infected by dogmatism and prejudice, because for him every philosophical conviction remains transitory. Virtually everything about the world, human society, truth, values and knowledge, becomes a prey to change and nothing is immutable in the world except novelty.

Mulla Sadra and the Problem of Knowledge

This chapter contains an account of Mulla Sadra's theory of knowledge. From the outset, it should be remembered that the problem of knowledge in Mulla Sadra's philosophy developed out of his ontological system. I also argue that his epistemology should be understood in the light of his interpretation of reality. The doctrine of the primacy of Being is the foundation of the possibility of knowledge. It suggests that in order to know something we need to begin with its existence. Being becomes an ontological condition for knowing. To make this issue more adequately appropriated, our task will be at the start to trace the notion of intuitive knowledge in the history of Muslim philosophy, which plays a significant role in Mulla Sadra's epistemology, and then continues with an explanation of Mulla Sadra's understanding of knowledge and its source.

Before Mulla Sadra, Muslim philosophers such as Ibn Sina, Suhrawardi and the Sufis advocated the idea that reality should be apprehended directly by intuition rather than by rationalistic discourse. Because Mulla Sadra's treatment of the problem of knowledge is so similar to Suhrawardi's, it is difficult to make a distinction between them. Nevertheless, what is apprehended by intuition for Mulla Sadra is the reality of Being rather than essence. Being and knowledge are not two different things, but are intertwined. Being, by revealing itself or being revealed, renders knowledge possible and knowledge makes the truth of Being comprehensible.

Intuition is the source of knowledge for Ibn Sina. Knowledge is obtained intuitively by the human mind when it comes into contact with the external reality; the active intellect responds by providing the content of intuition. The content of intuition, as Kant also states in his Critique of Pure Reason, is provided from outside. However, Kant does not deal with the external source of knowledge in a mystical way. For him, the faculties of sensibility and understanding are limited and determined by the external content of the phenomenal world and by the subjective necessary conditions or forms such as space and time, in the case of sensibility, and the table of the categories in the case of understanding. Also, for Ibn Sina and Kant, the human mind is empty without the given external content, and knowledge is possible as the result of the interaction between internal and external conditions. To clarify this point, Ibn Sina uses the metaphor of a mirror, saying that the human mind before acquiring knowledge is like a tarnished mirror, which can be polished by knowledge if it is turned to the light of the sun (the active intellect).¹ The human mind then acquires knowledge by intuition and does not rely on the phenomenal world as do sense-experience or rationalistic discourse for obtaining intuitive knowledge. This kind of knowledge, as Majid Fakhry remarks, 'stems from that supernatural or supermundane agency, which governs all the process of generation and corruption, including the process of cognition, in this world, i.e., the active intellect'.²

Acquiring knowledge by intuition varies from individual to individual. Those who get closer to the active intellect are enlightened by attaining the intelligible forms stored in the active intellect, and rely totally on intuitive knowledge rather than discursive knowledge to reach the rank of the prophethood.³ Intuitive knowledge is, therefore, not the product of the human intellect but springs from a divine source. It is the radiation of the active intellect upon the intellect of the seekers of the truth. Here, Ibn Sina makes a distinction between four types of human beings: the highest are those who have acquired prophecy and can create miracles due to the development of their intuitive and their imaginative power and their contact with the active intellect. The second type includes those who have developed their intuitive but not their imaginative powers. The third type is those who have developed their theoretical power but not their practical power. Finally, there are the human beings who have developed only their practical power.⁴

Another important thinker after Ibn Sina is Suhrawardi, to be discussed here, whose epistemology had a significant impact on Mulla Sadra. As mentioned in Chapter Two, this Muslim thinker is critical of discursive knowledge and, like Ibn Sina, relies on intuition or knowledge by illumination (ishraq); Nevertheless he does not discard discursive knowledge. He even finds sense-perception necessary for acquiring knowledge as he believes that there are certain things which can be known only by perception.

Suhrawardi's epistemology, discussed in Hikmat al-Ishraq and al-Mutarahat, begins with a critical evaluation of Aristotle's analysis of knowledge by definition. Against Aristotle, he argues that knowledge by definition does not necessarily include the essential characteristics of an entity. Other non-essential qualities or attributes should also be taken into account. He develops an argument against the definition of definition as 'definitio fit per genus proximum et differentiam specificam', or connotative definition. His argument, however, is grounded on the idea that certain things cannot be defined in accordance with this rule in Aristotelian logic. To render definition possible, Aristotle insists on the point that a genus plus a differentia are required. When human beings are defined as 'rational animals', rationality becomes a differentia and animal a genus. But 'colour', for instance, cannot be known by definition because it is a genus without differentia. It is a simple idea and a simple truth that has nothing other than itself to become a predicate for.⁵ This view of Suhrawardi is reminiscent of G. E. Moore's argument against the definition of goodness. In Principia Ethica Moore states:

My point is that 'good' is a simple notion, just as 'yellow' is a simple notion; that, just as you cannot, by any manner of means, explain to anyone who does not already know it, what yellow is, so you cannot explain what good is. Definitions of the kind that I was asking for, definitions which describe the real nature of the object or notion denoted by a word, and which do not merely tell us what the word is used to mean, are only possible when the object or notion in question is something complex. You can give a definition of a horse, because a horse has many different properties and qualities all of which you can enumerate. But when you have enumerated them all, when you have reduced a horse to his simplest terms, then you can no longer define those terms.⁶

Mehdi Amin Razavi believes that Suhrawardi's criticism of knowledge by definition is a 'radical departure from Aristotle.'⁷ In my opinion, Suhrawardi's point of view, which is similar to that of Moore, was originally from Socrates (Socrates' view on definition is discussed in Plato's Meno). In this dialogue, Socrates presents the ground for definition as a response to questions such as 'What is excellence?' or 'What is health?' In answering these questions, Socrates tries to define a term first by stating what is common to it. In this case, Aristotle's later definition of genus with differentia is one of the possible ways but not the only way of defining a term:

Well, is it only concerning excellence that you think this, Meno, that there is one excellence of a man, another of a woman and so on; or do you think the same about health, too, and size and strength? Do you think health is one thing in a man, another in a woman? Or is it the same pattern everywhere if indeed it is health, whether it is in a man or in anything else whatever?⁸

Socrates also remarks that in some cases there are other ways of defining the same thing. For example, in defining figure, colour, smell or taste, we cannot follow the previous rule of definition, because no differentia is involved in defining these terms:

What then is this which has this name 'shape'? Try to say. Suppose you said to the person who asked you in this way either about shape or colour, 'I don't even understand what you mean, sir, nor yet do I know what you are saying'; perhaps he would be surprised and say, 'Don't you understand that I am looking for what is the same in the case of all these?' Or would you not even be able to answer in this case, Meno, if someone were to ask you 'What is it that is the same in the case of all these, the curved and straight and all the other things that you call shapes?' Try to say, so that you can indeed practise for the answer concerning excellence.⁹

In defining figure or colour, Socrates thinks of the second alternative, that of assuming the definition of terms such as figure or colour not by a genus and differentia because they do not have differentiae. Suhrawardi also, like Socrates, believes that colour is pure genus without differentia, and therefore should be known by another cognitive tool directly, namely perception rather than definition. This introduces the role and significance of sense-perception in Suhrawardi's epistemology.

According to this Muslim thinker, knowledge by definition is not free of shortcomings. All aspects and qualities of a term are not revealed in a definition. There will always be unknown aspects of the entities defined that are not given in a definition. The human mind, therefore, will not be able to cognize the truth of an entity completely by definition. In order to surmount the shortcoming of knowledge by definition, Suhrawardi also talks about innate ideas. He insists that every kind of knowledge begins with a sort of knowledge about the object of inquiry. It is not possible to begin an investigation into the nature of an entity without having any idea about it at all. It is true that an inquiry begins with a conviction that we do not know enough about the object we inquire about. For this reason the inquiry is carried out. Meanwhile we do know something about it. Knowledge always begins with presuppositions and pre-given ideas; these presuppositions are not produced by previous experiences but are innate:

Knowledge is either innate or not innate. When an unknown thing cannot be made known by pointing it out or bringing it to mind and it is something that cannot be attained by the true visions of the great sages, then knowledge of it must depend on things leading to it that are in an order and that are ultimately based on innate knowledge. Otherwise knowledge of anything that man desires to know will depend on previously obtaining an infinite number of things, and he will not even be able to obtain the first step in knowledge – which is absurd.¹⁰

In another argument, Suhrawardi states that the process of defining a term will continue ad infinitum, because if a term is defined by an attribute, that attribute needs to be defined by another attribute, and so on. In this case, nothing will be known, which is also absurd. There must be a first principle or a beginning against which our definition of a term and innate ideas can be measured.¹¹ The possibility of knowledge by definition stands on pre-given knowledge. Pre-given knowledge can be seen as a priori in the Kantian sense or as a condition that renders knowledge possible. The last and most reliable source of knowledge for Suhrawardi, after knowledge by sense-perception, definition and innate ideas, is intuition or knowledge by illumination (al-ishraq). Intuitive knowledge, like perception, is direct and non-representational. There is no mediation between the knower and the known. It is knowledge by 'presence' in which the distinction between the known and the knower is abolished. One object that is really grasped by intuition, as stated by Suhrawardi, is the 'self'. In self-knowledge, which is knowledge by illumination, the object (the self, which is known) is present in the self, which is the knower. Self-knowledge, like the Cartesian Cogito ergo sum, goes beyond doubt and is undeniable. If I doubt, for example, the status of my existence, then I need to exist in order to experience the doubt about my own existence.

Intuitive knowledge is also not confined to the apprehension of the self. It is vital for knowing the intelligences or the inner reality of the world; it is a different way of knowing and does not require intermediate concepts. The intelligence (whether God's or the human mind) knows its object directly. Cognition is, therefore, not necessarily conceptual but the outcome of illuminative intuition, which requires the 'presence' of its object and direct apprehension of it.

Mulla Sadra's epistemology deals extensively with knowledge by intuition (al-idrak). This Arabic term has been translated as 'perception', but the term semantically means the act of comprehending, apprehending, attaining, grasping, and then finally perceiving in the sense of knowing something directly without mediation.¹² It is used to describe the process of directly apprehending and attaining the quiddity of objects outside the human mind in order to make it intelligible. It is a direct epistemological encounter with the external world through which the potentiality of knowing becomes actuality. This definition also includes sense-experience. For this reason, Mulla Sadra thinks of sense-perception as the first and the lowest modality of intuition (al-idrak). William Chittick and S. M. Khamenei (director of the Sadra Islamic Philosophy Research Institute in Teheran) have translated al-idrak as perception.¹³ Perception, then, rather than apprehension, is a unique cognitive power; due to various levels or degrees of intensity of existence cognition also has different modalities and cognitive stages. These stages of cognition in Mulla Sadra's theory of knowledge are in some ways similar to the hierarchy of knowledge in Hegel's Phenomenology of Mind, with the exception that Hegel's epistemology does not go beyond rational knowledge. According to Hegel, reason can be applied to solve the contradictions between the known and the knower, and in rational knowledge the truth for consciousness becomes consciousness itself.¹⁴ To reach this form of cognition, it is essential for consciousness to move from sense-certainty to perception, and from there to understanding and finally to reason, which is the birthplace of absolute knowledge.¹⁵

For Mulla Sadra, attaining the highest stage of cognition for knowing the Truth does not rely on rationalistic discourse. It is the task of intellectual perception, a cognitive power that transcends the power of reason. How does Mulla Sadra arrive at this conviction? How does he deal with the unity of the known and the knower in his epistemology? When we understand Mulla Sadra's epistemology in the context of his metaphysics we realize that, in his view, knowledge deals mainly with the problem of the relationship between existence as an external reality outside the human mind and the transformation of external reality into mental existence, which is another form of Being.¹⁶ In this way, his understanding of knowledge as the conceptualization of external reality for the sake of unity between the known and the knower is in agreement with Hegel's dialectic process of consciousness described in the Phenomenology of Mind. It is also important to investigate the nature of this relationship between external and mental existence because it resolves the dichotomy of subject and object and the appropriation of the latter by the former. The transformation of external existence into mental existence is accomplished by conceptualizing the modalities of Being. But Being, unlike its modalities, cannot be known conceptually as it has no essence or universal determinations. Whatever is known through the revelation of universal determinations is a modality of Being. The human mind knows various modalities of Being, which are different in their degrees of perfection and proximity to Being. The possibility of knowing, whether acquired by our sense-experience or intellect, is based on the 'presence' of Being in one form or another. The reality of knowledge is inseparable from the reality of existence. The variety of levels of the modalities of Being is revealed to different levels of perception (al-idrak). Since there are three levels of existence there will be three levels of perception: sense-perception, imaginal perception and intellectual perception.¹⁷

In sense-perception, the human soul reflects upon the external object using five senses. Each of these senses is given a specific task and receives a particular form of the sensuous quality of the external object. This passive attitude of the human soul in sense-perception is followed by attention and awareness.¹⁸ These two activities of the soul are interconnected and the former leads to the latter; unless we pay attention to sensuous quality such as sound we will not be aware of it. What is acquired by the five senses is at the same time a confirmation of the 'presence' of the external object for the soul. Awareness, which is the result of the presence of the object to the senses, is direct and necessary: direct because it does not require the conceptualization of its object and is not mediated by representations; necessary because sense-perception will not be able to receive its object unless the object is present. After receiving the sensuous qualities and being aware of the external object, the human soul endeavours to create the sensuous form of this object and to reveal its quiddity. Here, it seems that the passive act of receiving the sensuous qualities of an object is transformed into the activity of constructing the notion of the object by apprehending its quiddity. This stage, in Kant's epistemology, is in the domain of the faculty of understanding rather than sense-perception (sensibility). Understanding and not sense-perception is responsible for constructing the quiddity of a phenomenal object through the application of the subjective categories.¹⁹ The question that arises here is whether the sensuous qualities of the known object exist externally. The answer, for Mulla Sadra, is in the negative. Sense organs are mere instruments and channels required for perception; otherwise it is the human soul not the sense organs that experiences sensation. The eyes do not see colour. They are only organs through which the soul becomes aware of the colour. They are sense organs for seeing but strictly speaking they see nothing, because seeing is perceiving and perception is a faculty of the human soul and not the sense organ. If we think of the human body as an accidental fact, then the body plays its role in perception as an instrument; it is not intrinsic to this kind of knowledge. Mulla Sadra also believes that the human soul can still perceive if separated from the body without being assisted by sense organs. To return to the question, the sensuous qualities are neither in the senses nor present externally in the object. They are subjective forms and are displayed by the soul when an external object is presented to the sense organs. Empirical cognition is produced as the result of this relationship and the interaction between the subjective forms and the presence of the external object to the senses.²⁰ This view of Mulla Sadra is incompatible with the idea of perception as a passive acceptance of the qualities of an external and independent object. The human soul does not abstract the empirical determinations of an object but transforms the object into something mental. It imposes another form on it, which is pre-existent in the soul. The corporeal form of the object creates only an occasion for revealing the subjective forms that exist in the human soul.

What I understand from this account of perception by Mulla Sadra is that the human soul does not rely completely on the external object for empirical cognition. Rather, the external object stimulates the soul through the mediation of the sense organs to yield the cognized forms that transform the object into a new kind of being, a mental being, or a being that is known by the soul. If we think of cognition as the appropriation of the estranged object by the intelligence, then the material existence of the object cannot become the subject matter of cognition. In perception, the human soul experiences a form that belongs to the material object. This form has a mental character and is internal and subjective. For this reason, cognition is possible by distancing the intelligence from matter. Meanwhile, the cognitive form that becomes explicit at the time of presenting a material object to the senses is not the 'essence', as thought by Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophers and the ishraqi thinkers. It is another aspect of being that exists internally in the mind. Since the possibility of epistemology is grounded on ontology, whatever is perceived and known is nothing but another form of Being. In perception, the human soul transforms an object that exists externally (al-wujud al-'aini) into mental existence (al-wujud al-dihni) after this interaction between the intelligence and the external form of existence.

Although it is difficult to accept that sense-perception in Mulla Sadra's epistemology is mere passivity or acquisition, we can still state that imagination, unlike sense-perception, requires some skilful activity. The human soul creates its own images without relying on the external world to produce them. The power of imagination at the same time is not limited to the creation of these subjective images; it transcends the realm of subjectivity and attains the 'World of Images' ('alam al'khayal), which is held by thinkers such as Ibn 'Arabi and Suhrawardi to be a real world beyond the world of corporeal beings.²¹ In this case, there will be two kinds of images: subjective images, which are created by the power of imagination, and objective images, with their own ontological reality outside the human soul.

The human soul, after becoming aware of the form of the external object by sense-perception, is able to recall that form and reflect upon it by imagination (takhayul), even when the object is not present.²² This power of imagination is conditioned by the sensuous forms, and relies on them. Not having the sense-perception of an object means not being able to imagine what it looks like. Mulla Sadra talks about another kind of imagination between sense-perception and intellectual perception. He calls it tawahum or wahm.²³ The literal meaning of this term in Arabic is 'illusion', 'delusion', 'fancy', 'misapprehension' or 'imagination'. But for Mulla Sadra, the philosophical meaning of this term is far from illusion or delusion. He uses it to designate the creative power of imagination in individuals. William Chittick translates this term as 'sense-intuition' and adds that the medieval scholars translated it as 'estimatio'.²⁴ This type of imagination is for the apprehension of the intelligible universal forms without relying on a particular being. In this way, tawahum is more significant than takhayul for three reasons: first it is not conditioned by the objects of sense-perception; second, it is closer to the intellectual intuition as it apprehends the universal forms disjoined from the corporeal objects; and third, it is a creative power in the human soul.

Ibn Sina has also written on this cognitive tool before Mulla Sadra. He believes that wahm functioned as a faculty in the human mind and was mainly responsible for apprehending particular ideas in particular corporeal objects. The realization of love, for example, in a particular person, or being fearful in facing a particularly dangerous phenomenon, is the task of wahm. Mulla Sadra, however, says that Ibn Sina's form of realization is the function of reason attached to imagination. A person, for example, is afraid of an external threat because he/she reasons about it. Mulla Sadra's view was rejected by Sabzawari, one of the followers of the metaphysics of Mulla Sadra who remarks that, since animals become fearful in the face of danger, wahm should not be attached to reason, because animals do not have reason yet experience fear.

It is important to mention here that the idea of tawahum as a type of imagination was not originally Mulla Sadra's. Thinkers before him, such as Suhrawardi and Ibn 'Arabi, endorsed it in their epistemology. Each believed that imagination is an important faculty of the human mind for grasping the realm of ideas between the physical and intellectual worlds. As we see, and as also stated by Oliver Leaman, Mulla Sadra employed the technical language of Ibn 'Arabi in dealing with the problem of cognition. That language also influenced Mulla Sadra's understanding of the mystical implications of knowledge.²⁵ According to Ibn 'Arabi, imagination is in the domain of the human soul and a faculty between sense-perception and intellect.²⁶ The knowledge produced by imagination is of the Barzakh and the world of the corporeal bodies through which spiritual entities manifest themselves.²⁷ The world of imagination is an intermediary realm between the corporeal and non-corporeal worlds. It is divided into unbounded or absolute imagination (al-khayal al-mutlaq) and bounded imagination (al-khayal al-muqayyad). In the unbounded abode of imagination between the being of God and nothingness, all beings come into existence. The bounded imagination is the creative power of individuals that functions as an intermediary power between the corporeal and the spiritual worlds.²⁸ The bounded imagination is further subdivided by Ibn 'Arabi into contiguous (al-muttasil) and discontinuous (al-munfasil). The former lies in the individual soul's production of images with the aid of perception, while the latter lies between the corporeal and spiritual worlds and has no relation to perception or images produced with the aid of perception. For Ibn 'Arabi, Barzakh is the world of creative imagination and he describes it as ('alam al-mithal), the ideal world, where all opposites become self-manifest.²⁹ This task of imagination, namely bringing the opposites together, is inherited from the creative nature of imagination. When two opposites meet, as in Hegel's dialectic, their synthesis, or the third element, emerges. The emergence of this new element takes place in the realm of Barzakh.³⁰ The world of imagination plays a significant role ontologically in the rise of new entities in the corporeal world. Mulla Sadra himself is aware of the influence of Ibn 'Arabi on his theory of knowledge and discusses the views of his predecessors in detail in al-Asfar. But, unlike Suhrawardi or Ibn 'Arabi, he does not think of the world of imagination as something ontological that exists independent of the human mind. It is subjective and is created by the mind, but when the created ideas of imagination are externalized, for example in works of art, they become objective realities.

Moving away from the realm of sense-perception is not a venture into the realm of abstraction. It is an endeavour towards grasping the higher levels of existence until the human mind is able to attain utmost proximity to Being.³¹ With intellectual intuition, another source of knowledge, the human mind tries to realize its spiritual ambition. At this stage, epistemology becomes a vehicle for the human mind to obtain its ultimate goal by moving away from the philosophical and scientific boundaries of cognition to the mystical and theosophical. This shift is determined by trans-substantial changes in the world and in the human soul. The aim of epistemology is, then, not cognition or understanding of external reality, but, as in Plato, the transformation and elevation of the human soul from a lower rank of existence to a higher where it can unite with the Active Intellect. The position of seeker of knowledge at this level of being resembles the position of the freed prisoner in the allegory of the cave in the Republic. It is liberation of the human soul from the bondage of shadows and material existence, that is, from a less perfect level of existence. When the freed prisoner sees the light of the sun and arrives at a higher level of existence, he or she does not reject other faculties of knowledge such as perception and imagination. The freed person is perfected and substantially changed from a lower to a higher level of existence. Hence the journey through trans-substantial change means that the soul is changed through acquiring knowledge and has become a better (higher-rank) human being.

In intellectual intuition, the human intelligence becomes aware of the transcendent forms that exist ontologically in a Platonic sense. These transcendent forms, however, are not universals; each is seen as an individual, non-corporeal being. The forms also unite and become identical with the intelligence when they are grasped by intellectual intuition. This awareness of the non-corporeal forms and their unity with the intelligence is determined by the spiritual station of the human soul. The intelligence is unable to apprehend these forms unless it moves away from obsession with the material world. This epistemological development is also a dynamic process based on the dynamic nature of its object. Since everything in the world is in constant substantial change, the knower and the known never remain the same. Also, the nature of the reality of being and of trans-substantial change cannot be grasped fully by rationalistic discourse, or by representation. The rationalistic discourse is incapable of understanding the true nature of reality. This view is similar to that of Henri Bergson in his understanding of reality and 'duration'. In making a clear distinction between analytic or scientific knowledge and metaphysical knowledge, Bergson concludes that 'duration' as a restless continuity in the evolutionary process of life, and consciousness can be attained by intuition. In intuition, consciousness comes in direct contact with reality without being mediated by representations. This kind of knowledge, which is not representational or translated into concepts, is absolute and perfect in comparison with knowledge by representations or scientific knowledge.³²

The realm of intellectual intuition contains the transcendent Platonic Forms. It is also the realm of the Active Intellect. The human intelligence becomes one with the forms through its union with the Active Intellect. This union between the Active Intellect and multiple individual souls does not affect the simplicity in the nature of the former. The Active Intellect and its knowledge of the realm of the Platonic Forms remain simple and identical, because this rank of being is perfect and remote from the abode of multiplicity and the influence of trans-substantial change.

Knowledge by presence has characteristics of its own that distinguish it from knowledge by representation. It is direct and unmediated by concepts, and indubitable. Since it is neither representational nor non-propositional, it is neither false nor true. Its truth is beyond empirical verification and assertion in propositions. Furthermore, in knowledge by presence the distinction between intelligent and intelligible disappears. The knower and the known object unite as one being. Finally, this type of knowledge is beyond the domain of demonstration by reason. The intellectual intuition as the source of knowledge by presence becomes a mystical tool of cognition (al-kashif), or in the Bergsonian sense it becomes the fountainhead of metaphysical knowledge beyond the reach of scientific analysis.

Mulla Sadra deals with 'knowledge by presence' and intellectual intuition in another work, Se Asl ('Three Principles'), written in Persian. He explains in this work that there are three hindrances in the human mind to obtaining knowledge by presence and experiencing intellectual intuition. These hindrances are not related to the nature of knowledge obtained and verified by the human soul. They are simply conditions influencing the soul and become impediments to the spiritual progress of the individual. These hindrances are the non-realization of the inner nature of the self on the part of individuals, seeking lust and wealth, and the temptation of the commanding self to pursue evil as excellence and excellence as evil.³³ These three principles, which are not epistemological and are not in the quality of knowledge obtained, are necessary conditions of the spiritual path of the human soul towards the realization of Truth.

Generally speaking, intellectual initiation is successful when the individual soul realizes its own reality and knows itself as a spiritual entity rather than a material body. This is the first station of the spiritual guidance for attaining the Truth by gnosis (irfan) or knowledge by presence. The second hindrance is inherited from the relationship between the soul and the material world. This relationship becomes a hindrance when the soul is attracted towards entertaining the body and seeking lust and material possessions. 'Allamah Tabataba'i, who adheres to the existentialist school of Mulla Sadra, believes that lust and material interest conceal the love and passion for divine beauty and perfection. This love manifests itself in the heart of the seeker of the Truth only through regular and persistent self-control (muraqabah) and the renunciation of desire for the material world.³⁴ It is worth mentioning that Mulla Sadra's advocacy of intellectual intuition and knowledge by presence is not the negation of knowledge by representation and demonstration. In his epistemology, all sources of knowledge have their own function and participate in unveiling the truth of Being. His position, like Hegel's in the Phenomenology of Mind, is to accommodate various cognitive sources at different levels of the revelation of Being because the gradations of Being are known by different cognitive tools. Yet it is intellectual intuition not reason that is able to grasp reality fully and directly. Science, philosophy and theosophy (hikmah) are interconnected in the sense that they are ontologically conditioned by the presence of Being, and each deals with one aspect of Being, with the exception of theosophy, which relies on intellectual intuition to attain the truth of Being.³⁵ This antagonism with the rationalist philosophers in respect of demonstrative knowledge is grounded mainly on the intrinsic limitation of discursive knowledge for understanding the meaning of Being directly. Mulla Sadra, under the sway of Sufism in general and the ishraqi epistemology (Illuminationism) in particular, does not allow this limitation to curtail the endeavour of the human mind to 'un-conceal' Being. By insisting on knowledge by presence, Mulla Sadra transcends the limitation of reason and the boundaries of discursive knowledge. The unlimited power of intellectual intuition compensates for that constraint and goes beyond the power of reason.

Another important point to be mentioned here is the union of the intelligent (al-'aqil) and the intelligible (al-ma'qul). In the history of Muslim philosophy this epistemological matter is also discussed by Peripatetic Neoplatonic thinkers such as Ibn Sina. The truth of the external reality for Ibn Sina and other Peripatetic Neoplatonic thinkers was based on correspondence between the external object and its representation in the mind. Although this idea is ascribed to Aristotle, it is difficult to claim that Aristotle made a clear distinction between intelligent and intelligible at all levels of cognition in his epistemology. In Metaphysics and De Anima, Aristotle refers to the incorporeal intelligible substances as intelligibles that unite with their intellect.³⁶ This Aristotelian notion of unity was later expressed by Alexander of Aphrodisia (active c. 200 AD) in De Intellectu and by Porphyry (c. 232–304) as the unity of the intelligible with the intelligent. Mulla Sadra also discusses the ideas of these thinkers in al-Asfar when he argues against the Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic thinkers.³⁷ Ibn Sina considers this unity a poetical nonsense and meaningless.³⁸ However, in Al-Mabda' wal-ma'ad, particularly in the discussion on the nature of knowledge of the Necessary Being, Ibn Sina, like Aristotle, holds the view that in the Necessary Being intelligent and intelligible are one and united.³⁹ In criticizing Ibn Sina's position, Mulla Sadra claims that Ibn Sina was under the sway of Aristotle's cosmology. He does not accept the emergence of a new element resulting from a unity at the expense of terminating the two opposing elements.⁴⁰ Mulla Sadra also discusses this problem in Risala fi Ittihad al-'aaqil wal-ma'qul ('Treatise on the Unity of the Intelligent and the Intelligible').⁴¹ How does Mulla Sadra solve this epistemological problem? On what ground does he demonstrate the unity of the intelligent and the intelligible? Mulla Sadra's solution can be divided into two parts. The first is based on his ontological system of the primacy of Being and the understanding of the meaning of Being as the principle of unity beneath the multiplicity of the phenomenal world. The second part is an exposition argued from correlativity or correlation.

I will begin with the argument based on the doctrine of the primacy of Being and explain how the intelligent and the intelligible become one ontologically. It is apparent, and we may agree with Ibn Sina in his criticism of this unity, that it is not possible for two different things to unite but that there can be a connection between them. Mulla Sadra's ontology makes it clear that the different elements are all bound together by their inner reality. Difference is only one aspect of reality; there is a unity beneath this interconnection. All elements are gradations of Being; they are only different in their intensity of perfection due to their distance and proximity to Being. There is neither being for itself, nor is there anything that can stand by itself alone. All beings including intelligence are taken as real on the ground of the reality of Being as their ontological foundation. What appears for intelligence as intelligible is at the same time nothing other than a modality of Being as the ontological foundation. The intelligent and the intelligible might be conceived as two different things phenomenologically, but, ontologically, they are the same in existing.⁴² As Fazlur Rahman says, the external world is not a different reality that contains entities distinct from mental existents; it merely denotes a status or level of existence, i.e., a level where things operate with their natural properties. When, again, something is said to be 'in the mind', the mind cannot in this use be conceived of as a 'container', but it simply means that the mind has a set of properties or essences, which is able to apply to the external reality and to classify things.⁴³

The outcome of this view is that truth does not reside in the object known externally, but is defined in terms of its being known internally. This epistemological interpretation of the mental existents is reminiscent of Kant's analysis of the application of the table of the categories in the faculty of understanding. The categories also exist in the mind and their application renders knowledge of the external world possible. Mulla Sadra also tried to establish the unity between the intelligent and the intelligible by focusing on the point that these two elements are not substantially dissimilar. They both belong to the reality of Being. In order to elucidate this point it is helpful to mention Hegel's view of cognition as a process of conceptualization or idealization of the external object by consciousness in which consciousness transforms the object into something mental which then becomes the property of consciousness and unites with it. The external object, after being conceptualized, no longer posits itself as something external and different.⁴⁴ The experience that consciousness undergoes brings consciousness to know itself through knowing its object. The object known to consciousness is thus another aspect of consciousness. It is posited and developed by consciousness. Cognition, which is always relational under the transformation of the known object, becomes consciousness of consciousness or self-consciousness. In self-consciousness all distinctions between consciousness and its external object disappear and the object is reduced to mere concepts and hence is inseparable from consciousness. The difference between Hegel's view and that of Mulla Sadra is that Mulla Sadra does not intend to transform the object into mere concepts, nor does he deny its external reality of it. He insists on this unity through his understanding of the doctrine of the primacy of Being, a significant ontological doctrine that considers intelligent and intelligible to be two sides of the same coin. Therefore, there is no distinction between intelligent and intelligible and between mental and external existents, as both belong to Being.

In the second part of his argument, Mulla Sadra proves the truth of this unity by arguing from correlativity. He demonstrates that there is an inherent correlation between the intelligent and the intelligible. By this he means that their joint occurrence is not accidental but is essentially connected. This correlation, like that between cause and effect, is necessary and undeniable. Whenever there is a cause, that cause has an effect, and an effect is always produced by a cause. Likewise, the 'existence' of the intelligible is possible through the 'existence' of the intelligent.⁴⁵ To explain this correlativity, Mulla Sadra makes a distinction between two kinds of intelligible: the first kind is accidental and dependent on the material existence of the object; the second is essential and does not depend on the material existence of the object. It is a separate intellectual form that relies on the mind. The essential intelligible, which is at the same time the actuality of a being, is inseparable from the intelligent.⁴⁶ In this case the intelligent, in intellectualizing the intelligible, intellectualizes itself, and their complete unity is established as they depend on each other to exist.

Another important philosophical issue discussed by Mulla Sadra within the problem of knowledge is God's knowledge of particulars. Generally speaking, there are two opposing views in Islamic thought on understanding God's knowledge of particulars: philosophical and religious. The religious viewpoint, which is not the subject of our discussion here, relies on the authority of the foundation text of Islam, the Qur'an, and asserts God's knowledge of the infinite number of particular beings created by Him. Muslim philosophers have put forward different views on this. Some reject it and others assert God's knowledge of Himself as well as of the world. The Peripatetic Neoplatonist Muslim philosophers, in particular Ibn Sina, held the view that God's knowledge is not derived from the external objects outside His mind; otherwise His knowledge would be conditioned by and dependent on them. To Ibn Sina, God's mind should be creative rather than receptive, active and not passive. He also states that God knows particulars not as particulars but in a universal way. Other thinkers identified God's knowledge with Platonic Forms and discussed the relationship of these Forms with the essence of God. The problem which arises here is that of the nature of God's knowledge and the way He knows the world. Is God's knowledge dependent on the world? Is it prior to the creation of the world? Or, more specifically, should we ask how God knows the world?

In Ibn Sina's ontology God is the Necessary Being and identical with His essence. From the Necessary Being emanates the first intellect alone, because the Necessary Being is absolutely simple. Only one thing emanates from its existence. The first intellect, which is the first possible existence and is actualized by the Necessary Being, is no longer absolutely simple. It has a dual nature and gives rise to two entities: the second intellect and the highest sphere. This dual process of emanation continues until the tenth intellect and the sublunary world are emanated. The Necessary Being remains absolutely simple and aloof from the domain of multiplicity. But how does the Necessary Being know the world of multiplicity without having multiplicity in its essence? Before answering this question it is worth mentioning that for Ibn Sina God knows Himself as well as the world, because He is the originator of the world, but His knowing of the world is different from the way human beings come to learn about external objects and is at the same time unique. For example, Ibn Sina says:

It is necessary to know first that the knowledge ('ilm) of the Necessary Being is not like our knowledge nor is it analogous (qiyas) to our knowledge. The first [kind of knowledge] requires multiplicity, and the second does not. That which requires multiplicity is called 'psychological' knowledge and that which does not require [it] is called 'intellectual' knowledge.⁴⁷

The uniqueness of the Necessary Being's knowledge is due to the ontological status enjoyed by this being. Its being is unlike the being of the ontic beings in the world: it is absolutely simple and disjoined from matter. For this reason, God's knowledge also does not happen in time (history) and is not related to the changeable world.⁴⁸ Time, multiplicity and change belong to the sublunary world and not to the realm of the Necessary Being. Accordingly, the knowledge possessed by the Necessary Being does not change because it neither happened in time nor is empirical:

It cannot be that the knowledge ('ilm) of the Necessary Being happens within time, so that it could sat that now it is so and tomorrow it is not so, and [so that] its judgment is according to how It exists today and It will be tomorrow, and then afterwards how It is tomorrow [and] It is not [any longer] today.⁴⁹

In contrast to the human way of obtaining knowledge, the Necessary Being becomes aware of the particulars not empirically by perception but in a universal way. He knows, for example, that there is war in the world and knows all the antecedents and consequences of war. He knows that wars will happen and how to differentiate war from peace or distinguish war by conventional weapons from war by non-conventional weapons; but where and when a particular war will occur is not known to the Necessary Being, because this happens in a particular space and at a specific time in the human history.

Those who affirm God's knowledge of particulars argue that God's knowledge is either identical with His essence or separate. The first view was advocated by the Mu'tazilites, a group of Muslim rationalist theologians in Basrah and Baghdad.⁵⁰ They claimed that there was a new relationship between the essence of God and the divine attributes by saying that God neither possessed the attributes nor were they in His essence, but the divine essence and the attributes were identical and the same. For example, God's knowledge is eternal and not something other than God; otherwise knowledge becomes another independent eternal being. First, in the sense of numerical unity or absolute unity, this denies the existence of more than one God, or polytheism. This meaning of unity (al-tawhid) is in agreement with the Qur'anic notion of monotheism. Second, it is used in the sense of internal unity and simplicity, meaning that God's essence is free from essential plurality and composition.

If we go back to the history of Judeo-Christian theology, we find that the argument for the unity of God was propounded by Judaeus Philo (20 BCE–40 CE) and restated by Spinoza (1632–1677) in his pantheistic philosophy. For Philo, eternity is an essential quality of God; no other being but He can be eternal. This view represents the established Judeo-Christian and Islamic principle of monotheism. Its denial constitutes the rejection of monotheism in these three Semitic religions.

Spinoza espouses the Philonic principle by putting the argument into another logical form, saying that if there are two substances such as incorporeal God and the corporeal world, they should be absolutely different or absolutely the same. If there were two substances having nothing in common and being absolutely different, one could not become the 'cause' of the other. If the existence of two different substances is not logically possible, then we must consider the case of the existence of two similar substances which are absolutely alike. Such substances cannot be distinct, that is two, unless, in addition to their common qualities, they possess some other quality in which they differ. As Spinoza concludes, 'Two substances would be granted as having the same attribute, which is absurd.'⁵¹

The Mu'tazilites also claimed that 'essences' are known by God in the state of their 'subsistence', in the state of non-existence, or before coming into the realm of existence. Ibn 'Arabi shares this view and argues that the essences were in God's mind prior to their actual existence in the real world. Some Muslim thinkers also identified God's knowledge with the Platonic Forms, which were considered separate from God with their own ontological reality. This approach, which was taken by some Sufis, was in agreement with the Hanbali School, the followers of which argued for the reality and eternity of the divine attributes. Knowledge as one of the attributes was considered both non-identical with the divine essence and eternal.⁵² Suhrawardi had a different idea. He insisted that God's knowledge was separate and its objects included all things emanated from Him. The emanated objects are multiple and under the sway of change, but God's knowledge is not.⁵³ Suhrawardi also thinks of God's knowledge of the world in the context that God is perfect and the knowledge of His perfection cannot be denied.

In Mulla Sadra's ontology, essences belong to the realm of the contingent beings, which are finite. By contrast, God is pure Being and the finite attributes of the contingent beings or essences cannot be ascribed to Him. Here, Mulla Sadra distances himself from the views of the Mu'tazilites and Ibn 'Arabi. His criticism of those who think of God's knowledge as a Platonic Form is based on two points. First, he states that if knowledge is separate from God and is not something in the mind of God, it is essential to find out how God knows this separate and distant form. Second, the Platonic Forms are posterior to God's existence, so how can we say that God's knowledge, which is identical to the Platonic Forms, is eternal? Also, if God's knowledge is a separate form, a priori knowledge is required for knowing that form, which will become an endless process.⁵⁴

Mulla Sadra's main confrontation on God's knowledge of the particulars is with Ibn Sina. While he agrees with him that knowledge does not affect God's simplicity, he is critical of Ibn Sina's indifference towards the union of the intelligent (al-'aaqil) and the intelligible (al-ma'qul). According to Mulla Sadra, on the ground of this union it is possible to conclude that Being is the only reality and that knowledge is derived from Being. Since Being produces a systematic ambiguity of gradation or its own modalities, knowledge should be seen in this way. Another difference between Mulla Sadra and Ibn Sina is on God's knowledge as 'accident', in which God's knowledge is described as a posteriori, conditioned by and dependent on the objects known outside God's mind. Hence the mind of God remains receptive rather than creative.⁵⁵ Against this, Mulla Sadra developed three arguments. In the first argument, he maintains that knowledge, as one of the divine attributes, can be neither mental nor non-existential. To prove this point, Mulla Sadra classifies the attributes into three types. The first two are subjective, existing only in the mind, and existential, meaning ontological, and attributes as properties of their accidents' 'essences'. For him, it is impossible to think of the divine attributes as subjective or mere properties of the mind. The third type of attributes become existential reality when the essences emerge in the world or come into existence with the ontic beings. As a consequence of this, knowledge as one of the divine attributes cannot be described as something mental. Therefore, it must be an existential reality.⁵⁶

The second argument deals with the principle that obtaining perfect knowledge of an effect is acquired only through its cause. This principle appears to be self-contradictory, because it does not mean that the effect is known only through knowing its cause. In thinking of the primordialness of Being in Mulla Sadra's ontology, we should insist that this principle stand on the ground of 'existential' cause and 'existential' effect. The proposition 'Whenever there is p, then there will be q' should be modified into 'This is p, hence there is q'. The second is an existential proposition, and an indication of existential q, which is directly caused by p. Hence the forms, which are caused by God's mind, are directly known by Him as existential realities rather than a posteriori concepts.⁵⁷ In the third argument, Mulla Sadra, in rejecting the idea of God's knowledge as mental or subjective, disagrees that something at a lower rank of existence can become the source and the cause of an entity at a higher rank of existence. Since God's knowledge is the cause of the contingent world, it is not mental but a real existence. Otherwise, God's knowledge as the cause of the contingent world will stay at a lower rank of existence and the contingent world at a higher.⁵⁸

Having critically evaluated the views of his predecessors, Mulla Sadra relies on his own ontological understanding of reality to solve this problem. As is mentioned in Chapter Four, Being is the primordial reality on which the multiplicity of the contingent world stands. But Being itself, as the reality of all things, is simple: what is real in everything is its being rather than its essence. Being is, in this sense, equivocal and not univocal. It is the reality and a common ground of all things or the Being of them, but with different intensity and weakness. The Being of a thing and a thing are not two different realities, but one and the same. The reality of Being is, therefore, objective or an ontological reality of all things. The multiplicity of the contingent world does not affect the simple nature of Being. The principle of unity for them as well as their diversity is something grounded on the unified ground because nothing grounded exists without its own ground. This understanding of Being and its relationship with the contingent world of beings helps us to understand God's cognitive relationship with multiplicity. All things are present in God's simple being. When God thinks about Himself and this self-knowledge does not involve duality of the intellect and the intelligible, God comes to know about everything, including all particulars, without suffering multiplicity.⁵⁹ Although Being or God is the cause of multiplicity and all contingent beings are modalities of the systematic ambiguity of Being, Being is not affected by them. God's knowledge of particulars or His modalities is nothing more than self-knowledge; this does not infect the simplicity and infinity of His existence with multiplicity and finitude. God, which is pure Being for Mulla Sadra, has no essence, but His being is inclusive of all forms and knows them in an order as His affects. He knows all of them simply by contemplating Himself. The self-knowledge of God passes through three stages. In the first stage, God realizes His own absolute unity. In the second, various attributes become manifest in His knowledge, but since all of them belong to the same source they have an underlying unity. Finally, at the third stage, God's knowledge gives rise to the Platonic Forms in the non-corporeal world. Here every Platonic Form stands by itself as a unique form; for this reason it is called the stage of distinction.⁶⁰ At this stage the contingent modalities of Being such as different corporeal entities come into existence. As a consequence of this, the self-knowledge of God is the knowledge of the world, because the world is the self-manifestation of God.

In Conclusion

The significance of Mulla Sadra's philosophy should not be seen in the light of its role in the continuity of the intellectual and philosophical tradition in the Muslim world. Its task was not to replicate what was produced before; instead, it represented a break with the philosophical tradition and the emergence of a new philosophical system based on a new ontology. This new development was antagonistic to the dominant philosophical thought of its time and stood against the 'essentialist' intellectual persuasion of the school of Illuminationism of Suhrawardi.

From the very beginning of this book it was argued that Mulla Sadra's philosophical 'turn' or shift from the philosophical position of the primacy of essence to the primacy of Being and to thinking of Being as the primordial metaphysical reality is similar to the ontological enterprise of Being and Time by Martin Heidegger. To elucidate this claim I have tried, first, to suggest a commonality of philosophical tradition against which Mulla Sadra and Heidegger communicate their discontent. Second, the similarities between Mulla Sadra's ontology and that of Heidegger are explained in the stream of thought in this work where the need for comparison arises.

Similarities between the ontological enterprises of these two thinkers are discussed mainly on the grounds that Mulla Sadra and Heidegger advocated the primordialness of Being and held the view that Aristotle's logic was incapable of revealing the meaning of Being. Both thinkers also argued against Plato's metaphysics as a foundation of the philosophical tradition on which the essentialism of Suhrawardi and the nihilism of Western thought relied.

Mulla Sadra's new ontological system begins with the primordialness of Being. Unlike Suhrawardi, who thought that 'essences' were real, Mulla Sadra argued for the primacy of Being. This shift from the primacy of essence to the primacy of Being is described as a 'turn' from the core elements of Suhrawardi's metaphysics towards a contrary ontological view. The essentialism of Suhrawardi, according to Mulla Sadra in al-Masha'ir, led to the 'darkness of illusion' and neglected the fundamental philosophical questions concerning the meaning of Being in favour of investigating the nature of something less fundamental. It sacrificed the ground for the grounded.

Mulla Sadra's description of the dominant metaphysical tradition of his time as the 'darkness of illusion' is reminiscent of Heidegger's notion of the 'abandonment of Being' or the 'concealment of the truth' in his understanding of the Platonic and the post-Platonic traditions in the West. Both philosophical traditions (Illuminationism and Platonism) abandoned or shrouded in darkness the Being of beings as the inner reality and the ground on which all beings stand. This led to the oblivion of Being and to the thinking of Being as 'essence'. In Heidegger's view, the oblivion of Being is a process in which the truth of Being is concealed; as described by Mulla Sadra it is the state of untruth or 'darkness of illusion'. Suhrawardi's metaphysics is, therefore, like that of Plato, in that it represents 'nihilism' or the thinking of Being as nothing or un-real. Overcoming the 'darkness of illusion' or 'nihilism' is possible only through turning to Being as the sole fundamental metaphysical reality. In Contributions to Philosophy, Heidegger describes this turning as another beginning, a new epoch, and a transition from the withdrawal of Being to its re-emergence behind the appearance of beings. In insisting on similarities between Mulla Sadra's and Heidegger's metaphysics I do not intend to neglect their differences. It is clear that Mulla Sadra describes Being as a conscious transcendent reality that has a purpose in manifesting itself. It is the first principle beyond the gradations of its own modalities. For this reason, Mulla Sadra's metaphysics, unlike that of Heidegger, should be seen as an onto-theological system with a metaphysical objective and a realized end.

In his critical evaluation of essentialism or the illuminative philosophy of Suhrawardi, Mulla Sadra examines three ontological positions: Being is prior to essence, posterior to it, or Being and essence co-exist simultaneously. Thinking of Being as prior to essence signifies that Being can stand by itself without its essence. This ontological position at the rank of Pure Being is accepted because Pure Being is without essence; but a problem arises if we think of essence as prior to being, or conversely of being as posterior to essence. If the primacy of essence is accepted by Mulla Sadra as true, it implies that essence exists without Being. But for this, essence has to exist or needs another being to rely on, which leads to a vicious regress. The third position is that existence and essence co-exist simultaneously. This ontological view involves the notion that essence is in existence. In this case, essence again needs another existence to rely on for its existence. As a consequence of this, essence cannot be without prior existence.

Mulla Sadra concludes that the qualification of essence by existence is an intellectual operation. Neither existence nor essence is prior to the other, nor do they have a state of simultaneity, since nothing can be prior, posterior or simultaneous to itself. Both are ontologically inseparable in the ranks below the rank of Pure Being and are different only in thinking when the human mind apprehends an ontic being.

What, then, does the primacy of Being mean if these three positions are refuted? How can we talk about the primacy of Being? In my opinion Mulla Sadra's argument against the second and the third ontological positions should be understood with reference to the existence of the ontic beings. There is no doubt that Pure Being is without essence and we cannot talk about the priority or posteriority of its essence. Mulla Sadra believes that Being and essence, like the ground and the grounded, are ontologically inseparable, and are different realities in the ontological region of becoming only in thinking and for thinking. When a being is conceived and analysed into its determinations, the Being of this being appears in thinking to be distinct from these determinations. This intellectual apprehension does not coincide with the inner reality of Being, because essence is not distinct from an ontic entity, nor is existence an addition to essence. It is only in thinking that the priority of one over the other, in particular of essence, becomes evident, because thinking analyses each entity into existence and essence. Essence appears as the prior factor due to its nature as a universal determination apprehended by the intellect, whereas existence is not apprehended. Here, the primacy of essence becomes a mental factor, and Being remains as an ontological ground inaccessible to rational thinking. Mulla Sadra elucidates the distinction between Being and beings in a number of ways: as the division of Being into unity and multiplicity (modalities), as necessary and contingent; and then as independent and dependent (connective). In these divisions, multiplicity, contingent and dependent are understood in their relationship with Being, which stands as their unity or necessary and independent reality. For example, multiplicity is possible only on the ground of unity, because the beings are nothing more than the self-manifestation of a single, simple reality in its own modalities. Whatever exists and the human intellect becomes aware of in intellectual experience, including the 'self', is nothing but a modality of Being.

The distinction between beings (phenomena) and their essences arises when beings are analysed intellectually into categorical determinations. In the world external to the intellect, these beings are not separable from their essences. The case with Being is completely distinct, because Being (or Sein in the Heideggerian sense) is Pure Being and has no universal determinations. This description of Being as a reality without universal determinations retains Being beyond the domain of Aristotle's logic and rationalistic apprehension. All beings are grounded on Being and are known by it, but at the same time Being cannot be defined. Being, then, is the ontological as well as epistemological precondition for the world and our cognizance of beings, but the logical definition of genus and specific difference is not applicable to it. In this traditional way (by relying on Aristotelian rule for definition), Being is indefinable.

Another important point is the systematic ambiguity of the gradation of Being (tashkik al-wujud). In this process, Being manifests itself vertically as well as horizontally. It begins with the most perfect rank of Being to the least perfect, such as prime matter. The other direction of tashkik determines the transformation of the world horizontally through successive and infinite forms. This is analogous to the gradation of light in Suhrawardi's metaphysics, but for Mulla Sadra it is Being rather than light (essence) that creates its own modalities. Being is viewed as equivocal and not univocal. This is a common characteristic of all things or the Being of beings, but it differs in its intensity and weakness. The Being of a thing and a thing are not two different realities but one thing and the same at the same time. Being is a single reality but with ranks and grades of its own modalities. All beings are but ontic coagula of a single ontological reality. This reality should not be understood as this or that being but as the Being of beings and something transcendent and grasped intuitively.

I have interpreted Mulla Sadra's concept of the 'transcendence' of Being in two ways: ontologically and epistemologically. Ontologically, Being is the Being of all beings and their source. All things emanate from Being. The relationship between Being and beings in terms of the doctrine of emanation is that Being, as the fountainhead of all emanated beings, is not immanent but a reality that transcends them. Epistemologically, Being can be seen as a precondition for our knowledge of the world as well as our own existence, because it is a reality on which the existence of all beings relies. Our experience and knowledge of beings is possible only by virtue of their 'Being', and Being at the same time is beyond the domain of perception and rationalistic discourse. It is neither this nor that being of our experience but something transcendent.

Mulla Sadra's ontology, in particular the doctrine of systematic ambiguity of Being, as analysed in Chapter Five, bridges the gulf between unity and multiplicity. This bridging is realized on the ground of the principle of identity in difference or unity in diversity. Being as a unity and identity contains the multiplicity of its own modification. The external world is characterized by unity and diversity. Diversity is a mode of the single and simple reality of Being that exists only on the ground of unity.

The systematic ambiguity of Being is an increase and decrease in the intensity of existence. For this reason, I conclude that it is not a change in the 'essence' of a being but an existential movement in the core of its existence. The qualitative and quantitative change in a being is not seen as a gradual intensification of a particular quality, i.e., whiteness, but rather a replacement of a former quality by a new one. This is also the case with a definite quantity of an ontic being: a new quantity replaces the old quantity. As a result, the world is in constant change and Being is in a pattern of renewal and evolution until it reaches its own culmination where no further change is thinkable. What undergoes change and at the same time endures in this evolutionary process of the world is Being. All changes occur in Being and by Being, which is called trans-substantial change. This doctrine is the keystone of Mulla Sadra's ontology and the ground for developing other aspects of his philosophy. It is the ground for our understanding of the world and of human knowledge. Being is, then, in a self-evolutionary process and it is the only cause that determines this process. Nor does Mulla Sadra see this existential movement of the world as blind or capricious. It has a purpose and a realized end. The inner motive for accomplishing this task is a mystic force of love ('ishq), present in all beings and causing the lower-ranked beings to long for beings of the higher ranks of existence to obtain perfection. The vertical direction, in contrast to the horizontal direction of the systematic ambiguity of Being, is one from potentiality to actuality for the sake of perfection. It finally reaches its goal in human existence with the rise of the perfect human being (al-insan al-kamil), who apprehends the divine realm and attains unity with the Intelligences or divine attributes. I also argue that the vertical direction of this movement is similar to the dialectical movement in Hegel's philosophy and to the idea of creative evolution in Bergson's thought.

I have also mentioned that the concept of trans-substantial change has religious as well as philosophical consequences. It can change our understanding of the notions of resurrection and divine retribution and initiate discussion on the transmigration of the soul. All these notions deal with the identity of the human existence that undergoes trans-substantial change. On one hand, Mulla Sadra believes that the identity of the self depends on the intellectual form of a person, which exists in the mind of God. On the other hand, he states that the self will survive throughout the evolutionary changes, which will help the self to retain its own identity. This position is, however, similar to that taken by Descartes in developing his theory of self-substance in the second and third meditations and is in contradiction with Mulla Sadra's doctrine of trans-substantial change.

The philosophical consequences of trans-substantial change are summarized in three points: the temporal contingency of the world, the infection of being by non-being or nothingness, and the relativity of truth and values. Trans-substantial change is an indication of the non-being of beings that have not yet come into existence. Every being is preceded by its own non-being. The passage of being into non-being and non-being into being is 'becoming'. Based on this understanding of the reality of beings, two new regions of being and becoming arise. The region of becoming is the result of the passage of non-being into being and vice versa. It is also argued that Mulla Sadra's interpretation of the relationship between being and nothingness is closer to Sartre's than Hegel's. Mulla Sadra and Sartre agree that nothingness is in the world due to the existence of the ontic beings, but for Sartre, more specifically, the ontic being means the human consciousness. Mulla Sadra insists that all contingent beings, including the human consciousness, are preceded by their own non-existence in the world. In the region of becoming, where the evolutionary process rules and changes in substance as well as accidents take place, there is no room for deterioration or corruption. All beings strive to move upwards from a lower to a higher rank of existence. Change, as we have discussed, in Mulla Sadra's ontology is evolution and an irreversible progress.

Another philosophical consequence of this doctrine that can have a significant impact on the intellectual development in the Muslim world is that trans-substantial change leads to the relativity of truth and values. The application of this doctrine deconstructs the metaphysical foundation of universal truth and values. Relying on this doctrine for understanding the structure of the world means that nothing can be considered eternal or stable. Everything is in constant change, including human society and our understanding of reality. A consequence of this is that no system of belief can claim absoluteness and finality for itself because novelty prevails. This consequence also had a profound impact on Mulla Sadra's understanding of politics, in particular political Islam, which proclaims divinity and universality in its discourse. Mulla Sadra makes a vivid distinction between religion and politics and between religious laws and political laws, and rejects the identification of the former with the latter. I have also attempted to explain that trans-substantial change encompasses both nature and history. Ontology and social systems are necessarily interconnected. It is hard to understand Mulla Sadra's political and social philosophy without understanding his metaphysics. For him, metaphysics is the foundation of history and nature.

Mulla Sadra's interpretation of the world is an innovative philosophical project and a clear departure from Illuminationsim. It involves the development of a new intellectual discourse in the Muslim world that might have a strong influence on Islamic socio-political and theological theories, conceptual frameworks and values. The task of philosophy, for Mulla Sadra, is initially an active interpretation of the world and the realization of substantial change in all beings. This realization also leads to an antagonistic stand vis-à-vis tradition and leaps towards future possibilities in the vertical movement of evolution.

In Chapter Six, I explained Mulla Sadra's analysis of human knowledge, the unity of the intelligent and the intelligible, and God's knowledge of the world. Although Mulla Sadra's metaphysics is characterized by strong opposition to Illuminationism, his understanding of the human knowledge of the world was greatly influenced by Suhrawardi's theory of knowledge. Nevertheless, it is undeniable that Mulla Sadra departs from Suhrawardi in believing that anything that is in reality is a 'being' (Suhrawardi called it 'essence'). Without being, it is impossible to think of knowing.

Mulla Sadra, like Suhrawardi, advocates the priority of knowledge by 'presence' rather than 'representation'. Knowledge by presence has the advantage of apprehending the known object directly without mediation by concepts. The human intellect does not only know the object, it also experiences it. Knowledge by presence in Mulla Sadra's epistemology is neither subjective nor objective. It is the product of the application of some innate cognitive forms and the presence of the objects apprehended by perception. The gradation of being is seen at different ranks and levels of perfection (al-idrak), and this conditions human knowledge. Accordingly there are different stages and kinds of knowledge. Also, since whatever is known is 'being' and being undergoes change, our knowledge of the world is also in constant change and is always both relational and temporal, with the exception of the objects of intellectual perception such as the divine attributes, which are perfect and remain the same.

The unity of the intellect and the intelligible occupies an important place in Mulla Sadra's philosophy. This problem has been discussed from antiquity, including by some Muslim philosophers before him, but Mulla Sadra expressed dissatisfaction with their positions and sought to solve this problem on his own metaphysical foundation of the primacy of Being. In Chapter Six I discussed two possible ways to understand Mulla Sadra's solution: ontological and epistemological. Ontologically, whatever is known by the intellect is neither a distinct reality nor different. The intellect and the intelligible are both beings and modalities of the same reality. They are identical because they share the principle of identity, but are separate in belonging to the same reality in different ways. Their difference, which cannot be understood without their identity, is due to their proximity to and remoteness from Being. As all beings are modalities of Being, the intellect and the intelligible enjoy a unity. Epistemologically, the object known after being apprehended by the intellect is conceptualized and becomes a mental property. It is also important to understand that in Mulla Sadra's metaphysics it is not possible to think of the separation of the intellect from the intelligible. His metaphysics can also be seen as the unity of Being; but that unity, which is the ontological condition for the existence of the intellect and the intelligible, remains transcendent.

Although Mulla Sadra was a Muslim philosopher who developed a new philosophical system for interpreting the structure of nature and history, the influence of his thought on intellectual life was felt mainly in Persia in the Qajar era. At present, his philosophy is widely read and studied in Iran but little is known about him in Western academic circles. I hope that this book will serve by encouraging discussion of Mulla Sadra. This great thinker deserves wider attention for his place in Eastern and Western civilization and thought.

Finally, this presentation of his transcendent philosophy is a modest attempt to project the main ideas of Mulla Sadra. If my book has value it is in starting a discussion on him. I am hopeful that this beginning will lead to further fruitful research and debate on the ideas and contribution of this thinker to the intellectual life of our civilization.

It flourished particularly during the reign of Shah Abbas (1571–1629), who attempted to establish a new centralized administration and to revive the economy. In the process, he created the new Safawid city of Isfahan. After the death of Abbas I, the Safawid state declined, and its rule effectively ended in Iran in 1732.

This was followed by Henry Corbin's edition of a selection of Mulla Sadra's writings in French. In 1981 James Morris translated Mulla Sadra's al-Hikma al-'Arshiyyah ('The Wisdom of the Throne') into English. Seyyed Hossein Nasr, Hossein Ziai and Muhammad Abdul Haq have published articles on Mulla Sadra's life and aspects of his philosophy. However, the only systematic work to date in English is Fazlur Rahman's The Philosophy of Mulla Sadra (1975). This applies modern philosophical terminology to Mulla Sadra's philosophical system. In 1992 Parviz Morewedge translated Mulla Sadra's al-Mash'ir into English. This work summarises Mulla Sadra's metaphysical system.

Chapter Two

1. The Seljuqs were a Turkish Sunni dynasty controlling large parts of the Middle East from 1038 to 1092. Seljuq forces captured Baghdad and gained control of the caliphate in 1055, thus becoming an empire stretching from Khurasan to Iraq. Their forces then entered Armenia, Azerbaijan and Anatolia, where in the battle of Manzikert in 1071, the Seljuq leader Alp Arslan defeated the Byzantine army and captured Emperor Romanus IV Diogenes. This dynasty fell apart following the death of Malik Shah in 1092.
2. Mulla Salih Ibrahim is a professor of Islamic Studies at the Faculty of Religious Studies at the University of Teheran. When I met him at his home in Teheran he gave me a photocopy of his published monograph on Suhrawardi and his Kurdish origins. Ibrahim has also investigated this matter in Jiyaneway Zanayani Kurd le Jihani Islami, published by Meharet in Teheran in 1974 (p. 880). See also Shahrazuri, Nuzhat al-arwah wa rawdat al-afrah. 'Suhraward' or 'Suhrabard' is neither Persian nor Arabic but Kurdish. 'Suh' means red and 'bard' rock. The rocks in this area are red and the village is called Surabard (or Redrock); it is populated by Kurds.

5. Sayyed Hossein Nasr, Three Muslim Sages (Cambridge, 1964), p. 56. Shams al-Din Muhammad b. Mahmud al-Shahrazuri (date of birth and death unknown) was an illuminationist thinker of the thirteenth century AD. His book Nuzhat al-arwah wa rawdat al-afrah is a biographical account of a number of philosophers including Suhrawardi. Another book by him, Risalat al-shajara al-ilahiyyah, is an encyclopaedia of philosophy. He expressed his own illuminationist ideas in two commentaries on Suhrawardi's philosophy.

7. The Ayyubid Sunni Dynasty was founded by Salah al-Din Ayyubi (1138–1193). He was a military leader of Kurdish origin who became sultan of Egypt and all Muslim lands between the Nile and the Tigris. He declared jihad against the Crusaders and the substitution of Sunni for Shi'i Islam in Egypt. He defeated the Crusaders in the battle of Siffin in 1187 and captured Jerusalem. In the same year he seized most of the remaining Christian strongholds in Syria and Palestine.

11. Hermes (Hermeticism) was considered the founder of the natural sciences by many and of the philosophy of Illuminationism by Suhrawardi. He is known by Muslim thinkers as Idris, one of the prophets whose name is mentioned in chapters 19, 21, 96 of the Qur'an. He is also known as the Thoth of the Egyptians, the Enoch of the Hebrews and Hushang of the Persians.
12. Shahab al-Din Yahya Suhrawardi, Hikmat al-Ishraq, translated by John Walbridge and Hossein Ziai (Utah, 1999), p. 2. Hikmat al-Ishraq is one of the major philosophical works of Suhrawardi and provides a profound account of the philosophy of Illuminationism. The three philosophical works written before Hikmat al-Ishraq, Talwihat, Muqawamat and Mutarahat, deal with Aristotle's philosophy. All four works are written in Arabic. The shorter treatises of Suhrawardi are written in Persian with the exception of some, which are partly in Arabic.

16. It is important to mention that even the Qur'an in one place describes God as light: 'Allah is the light of heavens and the earth. The parable of His Light is as a niche and within it a lamp: the lamp is in a glass as it were a brilliant star, lit from a blessed tree, an olive, neither of the east nor of the west, whose oil would almost glow forth, through no fire touched it. Light upon Light! Allah guides to His Light whom He wills. And Allah sets forth parables for mankind, and Allah is All-Knower of every-thing.' See the Qur'an, 24:35.

7. Naqshabandiyyah and Khalwatiyyah were two popular Suuni Sufi orders in Persia and Anatolia. Both were influenced by Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being, at least until the time of Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624), who brought radical changes into the mystical doctrine of this order. Naqshabandiyyah was also hostile towards Shi'i Islam. Sirhind, as one of the spiritual masters of the order in India, declared holy war against Shi'ism and the eclectic system of religious belief endorsed by Akbar, the Mughal Emperor (r. 1542–1605), and branded them heretical.
8. According to Lapidus, the Safawid rulers were less hostile towards the Armenian Christians in Persia because of their conflict with the Greek Orthodox Church, whose base was in the territory of the Ottoman Empire. See Lapidus, A History of Islamic Societies, p. 297.

Prof. Dinani held the view that perhaps Mulla Sadra went to Kahak because he had connections with Isam'ilis in this region and was invited to stay there by some Shi'i Isma'ili family.

52. The Qajar dynasty was founded in Iran in 1779, following the death of Karim Khan Zand, the head of the Zand dynasty of southern Iran. Agha Muhammad Khan, the founder of this dynasty, defeated numerous rivals and brought all of Iran under his rule, establishing the Qajar dynasty with its territory from Georgia and the Caucasus to the Persian Gulf. The Qajars established their capital at Teheran, a village near the ruins of the ancient city of Rayy. In 1796 Agha Muhammad Khan was formally crowned as a new king. This dynasty was destroyed by a military coup in February 1921 by Reza Shah, who ousted Ahmed Shah, the last Qajar king. Ahmed Shah was officially removed from office by the Iranian national assembly in October 1925 while he was in Europe and the Pahlavi dynasty was established.

58. Babism is a religious sect founded by Mirza 'Ali Muhammad (1819–1266/1850), who was born in Shiraz and executed in Tabriz. He claimed to be the bab, the 'gate' or the intermediary between the hidden imam and the Shi'ite community. His followers came to believe that he was the new Messiah or the imam, which he himself did not deny. His new movement was regarded by the official 'ulama as a threat to authority and dangerous. He was summoned to Teheran, where he was arrested then executed. One of his followers, Mirza Husayn 'Ali Nuri, developed Babism further, establishing a new sect called Baha'ism, after which he assumed the name Baha'ullah. Baha'ullah was arrested in 1852 and imprisoned in Teheran. Later, in 1853, he was deported to Baghdad and claimed to be a new prophet. He was subsequently confined by the Ottomans in Adrianople and then in Acre in Palestine (now 'Akka, in Israel). The followers of Baha'ism were mainly Iranians; today many of them live in Western countries such as the United States of America, Canada and Australia.

42. Hubert. L. Dreyfus, Being-in-the-World: A Commentary on Heidegger's Being and Time, Division I (Massachusetts, 1991), p. 11. Professor S.M. Khamenei has mistakenly used the Heideggerian term Dasein for the particularization of Being. He states that 'although existence is indivisible and even indefinable reality, its degrees of radiation upon objects could create several existences, each different from the other, and each possessing a specific definition and some features such as time and space. We might call each of them a Dasein'. See S.M. Khamenei, Mulla Sadra's Transcendent Philosophy (Teheran, 2004), pp. 57–58. In Heidegger's ontology the term Dasein is used to describe human existence only and not the particularization of Being in all ontic beings. Heidegger clearly states that 'Being which is an issue for this entity in its very Being, is in each case mine. Thus Dasein is never to be taken ontologically as an instance or special case of some genus of entities as things that are present-at-hand. To entities such as these, their Being is "a matter of indifference"; or more precisely, they "are" such that their Being can be neither the matter of indifference to them nor the opposite. Because Dasein has in each case mineness

[Jemeinigkeit], one must always use a personal pronoun when one addresses it: 'I am.', 'You are.'" See Heidegger, Being and Time, pp. 67–68. Elsewhere, Heidegger also states that 'Dasein is not a "thing" like a piece of wood not such a thing as a plant—nor does it consist of experiences, and still less is it a subject (an ego) standing over against objects (which are not the ego). It is a distinctive being [Seiendes] which precisely insofar as it "is there" for itself in an authentic manner is not an object-in formal terms: toward-which of a being-directed toward it by mean-ing it.' 29. Ibn Sina makes a distinction between two concepts of time derived from two different types of movement. The first type of movement is not observable, such as continuity or motion from beginning to the end. This movement for him is subjective and a mental image. The second type, such as the movement of a body from one point to another in space, is observable. The first movement gives rise to the idea of time as an extension because the observation in this case is concerned with time-instances. He also refuses to call time an extension or subjective. Time is continuity like the measure of the moving body in space. See Fazlur Rahman, The Philosophy of Mulla Sadra, p. 95.

50. Mu'tazilite was a rationalist theological school founded in Basrah by some pupils of Hasan al-Basri (642–728) who had seceded from him. The Mu'tazilites interpreted the dogmas of faith in the light of human reason. They believed in the unity of God and the notion of divine justice, which led them to reject the idea of predestination and advocate the doctrine of free will or al-qadariyyah. A branch of this school was founded by Bishr b. al-Mu'tamir (d. 825) in Baghdad and was patronized by the 'Abbasid caliph al-Ma'mun (r. 813–833), who began an 'Inquisition' under the influence of the Mu'tazilites against those who believed in the uncreatedness of the Qur'an.

52. Hanbalis were the followers of the Hanbali School of law, which was named after its founder Ahmed b. Hanbal (780–855). Before the 'Inquisition' of caliph al-Ma'mun, Ahmed b. Hanbal denied that the Qur'an was created, for which he was imprisoned. In 848, the caliph al Mutawakkil reversed this policy, abandoned the Mu'tazilite doctrine and accepted the idea of the uncreatedness of the Qur'an. The traditionalist theology of Ahmad b. Hanbal was subsequently revived. Ahmed b. Hanbal was a great scholar of Hadith and his main work is the Musnad.

Mulla Sadra's Transcendent Philosophy

Muhammad Kamal

MULLA SADRA'S TRANSCENDENT PHILOSOPHY

Sadradin Shirazi (1571–1640), known also as Mulla Sadra, spoke of the primacy of Being and promoted a new ontology, founding a new epistemology. Mulla Sadra's ontology is an important philosophical turn and contribution to the understanding of the development of Muslim philosophy and thought.

This comprehensive study of Mulla Sadra's philosophical thought explores his departure from tradition; his turn to the doctrine of the primacy of Being; the dynamic characteristics of Being and the concept of substantial change; comparisons with Heidegger's fundamental ontology; and the influence of Mulla Sadra's ontology on subsequent Muslim philosophy. Of particular value to students of philosophy, Islamic and Middle Eastern studies, philosophy of religion, and general readers who seek to understand Muslim philosophy, this book explores the significance of the doctrine of Mulla Sadra and its impact on subsequent debates in the Muslim world.

Ashgate World Philosophies Series

The Ashgate World Philosophies Series responds to the remarkable growth of interest among English-language readers in recent years in philosophical traditions outside those of 'the West'. The traditions of Indian, Chinese, and Japanese thought, as well as those of the Islamic world, Latin America, Africa, Aboriginal Australian, Pacific and American Indian peoples, are all attracting lively attention from professional philosophers and students alike, and this new Ashgate series provides introductions to these traditions as well as in-depth research into central issues and themes within those traditions. The series is particularly designed for readers whose interests are not adequately addressed by general surveys of 'World Philosophy', and it includes accessible, yet research-led, texts for wider readership and upper-level student use, as well as research monographs. The series embraces a wide variety of titles ranging from introductions on particular world philosophies and informed surveys of the philosophical contributions of geographical regions, to in-depth discussion of a theme, topic, problem or movement and critical appraisals of individual thinkers or schools of thinkers.

David E. Cooper, University of Durham, UK

What is all about beauty in the world? The image,
Like quivering boughs reflected in a stream,
Of that eternal Orchard which abides
Unwithered in the hearts of perfect men.

Jalal al-Din Rumi

Introduction

In the post Ibn Sinan period, the primacy of essence (asalat al-mahiyah) was one of the prime philosophical issues for Muslim thinkers. The school of illumination, headed by Suhrawardi, held the view that ‘essence’ not ‘existence’ was the only reality. Nothing in the external world corresponded to ‘existence’, and hence ‘existence’ remained an empty concept and an intellectual property, whereas ‘essence’ was real and primary. By contrast, Sadr al-Din Shirazi (1571–1640), known also as Mulla Sadra,¹ spoke of the primacy of Being (asalat al-wujud) and promoted a new ontology.

From the twelfth century CE, the school of illumination occupied a focal place in the intellectual life of Muslims, particularly in the Persian-speaking world. The philosophical thought of this school marked a vivid departure from rationalism to Gnosticism, or knowledge by illumination (al-ishraq). Shahab al-Din Suhrawardi (1171–1208), the founder of this school, believed that knowledge of an object in the world came only through revealing its essence or quiddity. The Being of the object, unlike its essence, was a mental concept and had no external reality. To prove this point, Suhrawardi developed the argument that there were two possible ways of understanding the meaning of Being: either as a universal concept shared by all existent beings or as a particular being. In the first case, Being remains a mental concept, but in the second it depends on its essence to exist because a particular being is equivalent to its essence, which makes the being the way it is.²

A universal concept such as ‘blackness’ is conceived only in respect of a particular black object; existence, then, as a universal concept, reveals itself through a particular being. Thinking of existence as a universal concept, and then of its reliance on a particular type of being for its existence is similar to Aristotle’s understanding of the relationship between universals and particulars. Aristotle, in rejecting the Platonic view of reality, argued for the dependence of universal determinations on particular beings and against the ontological status of universal determinations. In projecting his own views, Suhrawardi, on one hand, relied on Aristotle’s argument, and, on the other, reversed the argument. He came closer to Plato by insisting on the dependence of particular beings on their universal determinations, not vice versa.³

Suhrawardi’s thought influenced the dominant philosophical tradition in Isfahan, where Mulla Sadra studied. Mulla Sadra’s teacher, Mir Muhammad Baqir al-Astarabadi (d. 1630), also known as Mir Damad, was one of the leading figures of the doctrine of illumination. But it seems that Mir Damad was not a blind follower of Suhrawardi, because he tried to reconcile the Gnostic ideas of Illuminationism with Ibn Sina's ontology, or, as Nasr remarks, he provided the illuminationsit interpretation of Ibn Sina.⁴ Mulla Sadra, at the beginning of his philosophical career, and under the influence of Mir Damad and this dominant philosophical trend in Isfahan, advocated the doctrine of the primacy of essence and was one of the followers of Illuminationism. To understand his turn from or criticism of Suhrawardi's metaphysics it is also of the utmost importance to take into account the influence of Ibn Sina (979–1037) and Ibn al-'Arabi (1163–1240) in Mulla Sadra's project of a new type of metaphysics based on the primacy of Being. This project meant destroying the foundation of essentialism in pursuit of a serious ontological investigation into the truth of Being. To achieve this, Mulla Sadra had to admit his disillusionment with essentialism and abandon the notion of the primacy essence.

Mulla Sadra belonged to the ishraqi philosophical tradition. He changed his position and became a defender of the doctrine of the primacy of Being under the influence of 'spiritual inspiration' rather than a rationalistic discourse and logical investigation. He clearly states 'until my God guided me and showed me his proof', which expresses the occurrence of a mystical experience for Mulla Sadra. From then on, Mulla Sadra devoted his time to defending his ontological position and the general principles of his transcendent philosophy. The 'darkness of illusion' described here is indicative of the domain of Suhrawardi's metaphysics, in which a state of untruth reigns over the whole of reality so that the meaning of Being becomes unattainable. It is reflected in the 'abandonment of Being' or 'nihilism' discussed by Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), and is a philosophical position from Plato to Nietzsche representing a history of negligence of the question of Being.⁵ In both the Western philosophical tradition and Suhrawardi's metaphysics, what is lost or abandoned is the being of beings as a whole, which has led to the 'disintegration of truth' or the 'forgottenness' of truth and the thinking of Being as 'essence'.⁶

Turning from this type of metaphysics became a serious philosophical enterprise for Mulla Sadra after his departure for Kahak, a village near Qum, and his choosing a solitary life for more than a decade. The overcoming of the 'darkness of illusion' would be achieved by deconstructing Suhrawardi's metaphysics and in reconstructing an ontology based on the primacy of Being. The new ontology dealt with the primordial philosophical question of the meaning of the being of beings, rather than with familiarity with beings or essence. Overcoming Suhrawardi's metaphysics meant a radical change to recognizing the priority of the question of the meaning of Being.

The reason for Mulla Sadra's self-imposed exile was reportedly political. His fame in Isfahan had met with jealousy on the part of a group of religious scholars who were politically ambitious and determined to gain patronage from the rulers of the day.⁷ There was, however, more to this opposition than jealousy. Fazlur Rahman stated that, in addition to his sympathy for Ibn al-'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being, Mulla Sadra's ideas were too radical for the religious circle of the time.⁸ The political position of his father at the Safawid court played an important role in saving him, but he was forced to make a choice between defending his views and turning to seclusion. He chose the latter, with a sense of disillusionment with the rational method of the Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophy and essentialism of the school of illumination. After his time in solitude, he returned to Shiraz, where he founded a school, where he taught thinkers such as Mulla Muhsin Fayd Kashani and 'Abd al-Razzaq al-Husayn al-Lahiji. In later centuries, Persian Muslim thinkers such as Mulla Hadi Sabzawari, Mulla Ali Nuri and Mulla Ali Mudarris Zunuzi came under his influence. Today, Muslim thinkers such as Abdul Hasan Qazwini, Muhammad Kazim Assar and Muhammad Hussain Tabatab'i adhere to Mulla Sadra's philosophy.⁹

As mentioned earlier, the turn from the primacy of essence to the primacy of Being in Mulla Sadra's thought belonged to his period of solitude and to his teaching in Shiraz. During that time the question of Being rather than essence proved to be 'the foundation of the principles of philosophy'.¹⁰ For him, the primacy of Being was fundamental in the sense that Being and not essence was the only reality on which the multiplicity of beings (essents) stands.

Certainly, what Mulla Sadra tried to prove in his ontological enterprise of discovering a unified ground had been discussed earlier by Aristotle in the Metaphysics, Book VII. For Aristotle, the diversity of the modes of Being leads to the question of its underlying unity. But the difference between Aristotle and Mulla Sadra arises with the doctrine of the categories and the epistemological significance of this doctrine for knowing reality. Aristotle proposed ten categories, of which the most fundamental was substance, with others, for example quantity, quality, relation, place, time, posture, state, action, and passion, dependent for their existence on substance. These categories are classes or genera, the application of which makes possible knowledge of every mode of being and reality. Mulla Sadra's metaphysics asserts the realm of this principle of unity beyond the domain of the categories. For this reason, Being remains indefinable.¹¹ It is neither a genus for another entity, differentia, or species, nor a common or specific accident. Understanding its meaning cannot be based on anything more prevalent than itself.¹² This negative approach, however, does not mean that nothing about Being or this unifying principle can be known. The indefinability of Being points out the inherent shortcomings of Aristotle's logic and rational apprehension; meanwhile the inability of this type of logic and epistemology should not eliminate the question of its meaning. The failure of the rational apprehension of Being was not an obstacle to Mulla Sadra's ontological enterprise or to inquiry into its meaning. He denounced pure rationality, and relied instead on intuition or mystic experience for knowing the inner reality of Being:

As it has been stated the reality of existence is neither genus, nor species, nor accident, since it is not a natural universal. Instead, its inclusion happens in another mode of inclusion, and no one has gnosis of it except the mystics, i.e. 'those who are firmly grounded in mystical knowledge' [3:7]. Sometimes it is interpreted as the spiritual soul [i.e. Holy Spirit], other times as that grace 'which extendeth to all things' [7:156]. Sometimes [it is as the] 'reality from which entities have been created', according to the mystics. [Also, it is] the expansion of the light of existence to the structures of contingent entities, and the essences, which are receptive to it; finally [they speak of] its descent towards the abodes of inner natures.¹³

The rationalist preoccupation with epistemology does not constitute a reawakening of the question of Being because it presupposes a subject–object dichotomy. It depends on having turned away from Being to beings. Mulla Sadra's epistemology is significant for eliminating the subject–object dichotomy and reawakening the question of Being. According to Fazlur Rahman, it also shows a resemblance to the epistemological positions of Plotinus (205–270) and Henri Bergson (1859–1941). The latter, for example, insists on the point that 'duration' as an experience cannot be rationally apprehended and is a matter of intellectual intuition.¹⁴ It is worth mentioning that, in inquiring into the meaning of Being, Mulla Sadra agreed with Suhrawardi that Being was not apprehended rationally and that the Aristotelian logic failed to reveal its truth, whereas essence was conceived rationally. Essence did not exist by itself but arose in thinking when a particular mode of Being was conceived. For this reason, essence should be thought of as a mental phenomenon that exists in thinking and for thinking and not as an external reality or something with its own ontological status.

Mulla Sadra's criticism of Suhrawardi's metaphysics became explicit in his philosophical turn when he formed the contrary philosophical view that Being was not a mental property but an objective reality outside the domain of rational thinking. For this reason, Being could be perceived and understood through its illuminative presence by a new cognitive tool. Only in this way was doubt about the inner nature of reality superseded. Based on such intuitive experience, Being appeared the most evident of all things. It was the principle without which even 'non-being' was unthinkable.¹⁵ This ontological enterprise parallels in some ways that of Martin Heidegger, except that Mulla Sadra's ontology is entangled with theology. Otherwise, both thinkers advocate the primacy of Being. Heidegger, in interpreting the history of metaphysics, thinks that the abandonment of Being is rooted in Platonism; for Mulla Sadra it was inherited in Suhrawardi's thought. Meanwhile, they share the view that Aristotle's logic is incapable of revealing the meaning of Being.

Reliance on the Aristotelian system of logic brings shortcomings into our ontological inquiry. According to Heidegger, for instance, this reliance led the post-Aristotelian thinkers to neglect Being and to turn towards studying ontic entities instead.¹⁶

For Mulla Sadra, the doctrine of the primacy of essence led to the concealment of the truth. Its advocates neglected fundamental philosophical questions in favour of investigating the nature of something less fundamental or grounded that could not exist by itself. The reason for this, as explained by Mulla Sadra, lay in the reliance on the rational apprehension of Being.¹⁷ Heidegger, in Being and Time (1927), concurs, arguing that the post-Aristotelian thinkers accepted the dogma of negligence, and withdrew themselves from the genuine philosophical question about the meaning of Being, for three reasons. First, they thought that Being was the most universal concept, and that its universality 'transcended' any universality of genus. Second, since Being is the most universal concept, and is not an entity, it is therefore indefinable and escapes all attempts to define it in accordance with the rules of 'definition' provided in Aristotelian logic. Third, Being is self-evident.¹⁸ Heidegger rejects the three presuppositions and argues against the post-Aristotelian thinkers that the universality of the concept of Being does not guarantee the clarity of its meaning, and that the meaning of this concept is still the darkest of all. He also, like Mulla Sadra, says that Being is not an entity and is thus indefinable, and that Aristotle's concept of definition 'definitio fit per genus proximum et differentiam specificam' is not applicable to it. Heidegger also believes that the indefinableness of Being does not invalidate the question of its meaning, and should not hinder us from investigating that meaning.¹⁹

There are, however, three ontological positions in dealing with the primacy of Being or essence. Either Being is prior to essence or posterior to it, or they co-exist. When Being is thought of as prior to essence, it signifies that Being can stand by itself without, or prior to, its essence. If, however, the primacy of essence is accepted as true, it implies that essence exists without Being. But for this, essence has to exist or needs another existence to rely on, and for Mulla Sadra this is a vicious regress. The third position is that existence and essence co-exist. This ontological view involves the notion that essence is with existence and not in it. In this case, essence again relies for its existence on another existence. As a consequence of this, essence cannot be without prior existence.²⁰

In arguing against these three ontological positions, Mulla Sadra concluded that the qualification of essence by existence, unlike the qualification of a body by colour, is an intellectual operation. Neither existence nor essence is prior to the other, nor do they have a state of simultaneity, since nothing can be prior, posterior or simultaneous to itself. Both are ontologically inseparable and differ only in thinking:

What has been said earlier is sufficient to refute this claim, for existence is identical with essence in the external [realm] but different from it mentally. Therefore, there is no relation between them except in intellectual consideration. In [such an intelligible] consideration, the relation will have existence which in its inner reality is identical with it, but is different from it in the realm external [to the mind]. This kind of as infinitum is stopped when the intelligible consideration is ceased.²¹

What, then, does the primacy of Being mean if these three positions are refuted? How can we talk about the primacy of Being? In answering these questions, we can think of the primacy of Being over essence and its modes like the primacy of a ground over the grounded. Mulla Sadra believes that Being and essence, like the ground and the grounded, are ontologically inseparable; they are different realities in thinking only.²² When a being is conceived and analysed into its determinations, the Being of this being appears in thinking to be distinct from these determinations. This intellectual apprehension does not coincide with the inner reality of Being, because essence is not distinct from Being, nor is existence an addition to essence. It is only in thinking that the priority of one over the other, in particular of essence, becomes evident, because thinking analyses each entity into existence and essence. The latter appears as the prior factor due to its nature as a universal determination and something apprehended by the intellect, whereas existence is not apprehended. Here, the primacy of essence becomes a mental factor, and Being remains an ontological ground inaccessible to rational thinking. The distinction between Being and essence in the intellectual sphere is not similar to that between an object and its accident. Instead, it is like the connection that exists in the species between a genus and its differentia.²³ Being is a being of an object; when we abstract an essence from it that essence will not subsist. Although an accident seems to be identical to the existence of an object, it is not the being of that object. Mulla Sadra supports this view by relying on Ibn Sina's ontology, agreeing with him that an accident needs an object to become existent, whereas the case with existence and essence is different.²⁴ Being for Mulla Sadra has four characteristics:

- i Being stands as a unitary ground for its own modifications or the grounded.
- ii Being is separated from essence in thinking.
- iii Being is equivocal or systematically ambiguous.
- iv Being is dynamic and changes itself substantially.

In arguing for the primacy of Being and searching for a unitary ground, Mulla Sadra holds the view that essence is what distinguishes all entities from one another and limits them. When we say 'p' is 'q', the predicate 'q' distinguishes and limits 'p' by excluding other possibilities that can be predicated of it. Once the implication of this view is taken into account and Being is thought of as a mere mental concept, as advocated by Suhrawardi and his followers, we realize the following. First, there will be limitation in reality. Second, God's existence as pure Being will not only suffer limitation by His essence but will also become a mental concept that has no ontological status but is 'unlike everything, which is other than it [lit. non-existence i.e., essence], because every other thing, to be existent requires that existence be taken into consideration and joined to it'.²⁵

According to the first characteristic, Being stands as an ontological reality for all kinds of ontic entities or modes of Being. This relationship between Being and its ontic modifications is also similar to that between phenomenon and appearance in Heidegger's ontology. Heidegger makes a distinction between phenomenon and appearing. Phenomenon is something that shows itself or is manifest.²⁶ This showing itself is the way in which a phenomenon appears and is apprehended. The relationship between these two ontological spheres is illustrated in the metaphor of 'Krankheitserscheinungen' (symptoms of illness). The symptoms of influenza, such as high temperature and bodily pain, indicate a phenomenon that does not show itself, namely influenza. The phenomenon of this illness announces itself through its symptoms or signs. Appearing is, therefore, not a phenomenon but an announcing of a phenomenon, and a phenomenon is that which announces itself through its appearance.²⁷ In understanding the ontological division of Being into the ground and the grounded, or Being and its modes when it is understood in the light of emanation, we arrive at the conclusion that existence requires the grounded or its manifested modes to announce itself and to make itself intelligible, while the grounded depends on the ground for its existence.²⁸ Being, in this regard, is not one but many. The multiplicity of the grounded is based on the oneness of the ground. This describes Being as equivocal, as something used ambiguously in more than one sense (tashkik al-wujud).²⁹

The systematic ambiguity of Being represents the truth of Being as becoming and is also systematic and a perpetual progression without repeating itself. It is an intentional progress from the more indeterminate to the more determinate or concrete mode of Being. Thus, Being is a unitary ground that manifests itself in a variety of modes and gradations, vertically as well as horizontally. The modes of Being are different from one another in terms of prior and posterior, perfection and imperfection, strength and weakness.³⁰ As a consequence, Being is neither unity nor diversity, but unity in diversity. The degrees of diversity are different in intensity and perfection. Being continues beyond this diversity without ceasing to be a unity. To elucidate this point, Mulla Sadra utilized the Sufi interpretation of the unveiling of God (al-tajalli). From God, all modes of Being flow constantly in all realms of the microcosm and to the prime matter, which is capable only of accepting forms. In this way

Mulla Sadra conjoins a multi-dimensional conception of reality itself, which has become an open field, with possibilities. His ontology is, thereby, intended to be opposed to the monolithic system.

Since Being is equivocal and the only reality, it acts as the principles of identity and difference. The modes of Being are identical in their inner reality but different in terms of prior and posterior, perfection and imperfection, strength and weakness. This relationship between these two principles of Being becomes clear when the modes of Being are interpreted as gradations in terms of less and more perfect. For example, plants are less perfect than animals and animals less perfect than human beings. Being, therefore, has two different poles of perfection, but at the same time it can be achieved when Being shows itself as pure existence rather than essence.

Even at the level of regional ontology or ontic entities, the existence–essence dualism remains a mental factor. The systematic ambiguity of Being, as we see, is downward (tanzil), from pure to concrete modes of Being. This irreversible process, when it is understood in light of emanation, becomes problematic. Emanation, as a vertical systematic ambiguity, begins with the highest form of Being to the lowest. In this respect it cannot be seen as progress, but as a journey towards darkness and the unreal, while the systematic ambiguity of Being is an irreversible progress from less perfect to more perfect. In this case, it is not a journey towards the dark corners of existence, but rather a movement similar to the dialectic movement of Geist in Hegel's philosophy for accomplishing absoluteness. Only in this context of understanding it dialectically can the systematic ambiguity of Being be seen as progress.³¹ Although Hegel, unlike Mulla Sadra, sees the world as rational and holds the view that human inquiry must grasp this rationality in order to have an adequate apprehension of reality, the dialectic movement of Geist shares commonality with the ambiguity of Being. This commonality, however, does not deny the fundamental ontological differences between Hegel and Mulla Sadra's thought. For Hegel, reality is a range of universal thought determinations or categories: 'Metaphysics is nothing but the range of universal thought determinations and is as it were diamond-net into which we bring every thing in order to make it intelligible.'³² In considering reality as 'the range of universal thought determinations', Hegel lapses into the 'darkness of illusion' or 'nihilism' in the Heideggerian sense.

For Aristotle and Muslim peripatetic thinkers, substance, unlike accident, is unchangeable. Substance cannot become more or less substance. We can think of change in quality or of an object's becoming more or less white, but a substance such as an animal cannot become more or less animal. The species 'animal', despite changing qualities, remains the same. Keeping substance aloof from change and from all accidental qualities under the sway of change is, for Mulla Sadra, again based on the illusion of subject–object dualism, which he refutes. Since this dualism is a mental factor, the dynamic character of Being should be described as a substantial change (al-haraka al-jawhariyyah), according to which everything is continuously transformed. Such transformation implies that change is not limited to the four accidental categories of quality, quantity, place and position. In addition, there is a more fundamental change, that of substance itself.³³ Under the influence of change, Being transforms itself without losing its identity or unity. This transformation should be understood in the light of the principles of identity and difference mentioned earlier. Based on this view, Being passes through infinite accidental forms and substantial changes in an evolutionary manner.

From this survey of Mulla Sadra's doctrine of the primacy of Being, we see that his turn is as significant to Western thought as was Martin Heidegger's. Unfortunately, Mulla Sadra has received little attention in the West. This, to a great extent, as Nasr remarks, is due to the fact that the works of this Muslim thinker, unlike those of Ibn Sina and Ibn Rushd, were not translated into Latin.³⁴ Mulla Sadra's ontology is important for understanding the development of Muslim philosophy in the post Ibn Sinan era. It brings a new philosophical insight in dealing with the nature of reality and creates a major transition from essentialism to existentialism.

Mulla Sadra's ontological turn is dealt with in this book in six chapters. Chapter One is an introduction to the nature of this investigation and outlines the conflict between the doctrines of the primacy of Being and the primacy of essence. Chapter Two explores the philosophy of Suhrawardi and his doctrine of the primacy of essence. It discusses his arguments justifying this doctrine and the influence of the doctrine on the Islamic intellectual life in Isfahan. It also explains Suhrawardi's interpretation of the history of philosophy and Plato's influence on Suhrawardi's metaphysics, which has great significance for understanding Mulla Sadra's ontology and for comparing Mulla Sadra's ontology with that of Heidegger. Chapter Three deals with the development of the Isfahan school of philosophical thought during the Safawid dynasty. Mulla Sadra was a student of that school. Chapter Three also explores the ideas of thinkers such as Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i, the Suhrawardi tradition in the school, the life and philosophical development of Mulla Sadra and the major changes in his metaphysical position, namely his turn to the doctrine of the primacy of Being. The chapter concludes with Mulla Sadra's influence on the subsequent philosophical development in Persia and other parts of the Muslim world, particularly the rise of the philosophical schools in Teheran and Sabzawar during the Qajar period.

Chapter Four focuses on Mulla Sadra's ontological turn and his doctrine of the primacy of Being. This is compared with the ontological enterprise of Heidegger. The similarities between them are explained on the ground of three points: their criticism of Platonism, the primacy of Being, and the shortcomings of the Aristotelian logic and rationalistic discourse for understanding the meaning of Being. Also explained is how Mulla Sadra's ontology differs from that of Heidegger. Chapter Five investigates the nature of trans-substantial change as one of the central doctrines in Mulla Sadra's ontology and his interpretation of change as a clear departure from Platonism. Trans-substantial change is also compared with Hegel's and Bergson's understanding of the constant renewal of the world. The religious and philosophical consequences of this doctrine and its impact on the human understanding of truth, values and knowledge are considered.

Chapter Six explores Mulla Sadra's interpretation of knowledge by both the presence and the failure of the rationalistic apprehension of Being. Mulla Sadra's rejection of pure rationality and his reliance instead on intuition or mystic experience for knowing the inner reality of Being is explained. The analysis includes the nature and different kinds of intuitive knowledge (al-idrak), beginning from sense-perception to intellectual perception. Two major epistemological issues discussed by many Muslim philosophers apart from Mulla Sadra are also addressed in this chapter. These are the unity of the intelligent and the intelligible, and God's knowledge of the world. Mulla Sadra's analysis of these issues is a significant part of the chapter.

Chapter Seven crystallizes the book and presents the contribution of Mulla Sadra's philosophy to the development of intellectual life in the Muslim world. His significance is seen in terms of his ontology in dealing with the doctrine of the primacy of Being, the gradations and trans-substantial change of the modalities of Being, and finally the role of his metaphysics in determining the unity of the intelligent and the intelligible, which makes reality accessible to the human mind.

In interpreting Mulla Sadra's main philosophical doctrines I have tried to compare them with philosophical views and doctrines of some Western philosophers such as Hegel, Heidegger and Bergson. At a number of places the similarity between the existentialist views of this Muslim philosopher and the ontological enterprise of Heidegger are elucidated. It should also be remembered that Mulla Sadra and these Western philosophers, in particular Heidegger, not only come from different cultural background; their metaphysical objectives will remain parallel. I have used the original works of Mulla Sadra in Arabic and in working on this project over the last two years I have benefited from the writing of Seyyed Hossein Nasr and Fazlur Rahman on Mulla Sadra in English. Although few works are published on Mulla Sadra in English, recently much interest has been shown in rereading of his philosophy. In 1913 Max Horten wrote Das Philosophische System von Schirazi. This was followed by Henry Corbin's edition of a selection of Mulla Sadra's writings in French. Thinkers such as William Chittick and Oliver Leaman have contributed articles on Mulla Sadra's epistemology in the Journal of Transcendent Philosophy, a special issue on Mulla Sadra (Vol. 1, No. 1, June 2000). In 1981 James Morris translated Mulla Sadra's al-Hikma al-'Arshiyyah (The Wisdom of the Throne) into English. Seyyed Hossein

Nasr, Hossein Ziai and Muhammad Abdul Haq have published articles on Mulla Sadra's life and aspects of his philosophy. However, the only systematic work to date in English is Fazlur Rahman's The Philosophy of Mulla Sadra (1975). According to Nasr, this work is a rationalistic interpretation of Mulla Sadra's transcendent philosophy without recourse to the living oral tradition and consideration of the spiritual and Gnostic background of Mulla Sadra, which are significant for understanding his ideas. In 1992 Parviz Morewedge translated Mulla Sadra's al-Mash'ir into English, a work that summarizes Mulla Sadra's metaphysical system. An investigation into the philosophy of this Muslim thinker, as we see, is beset with some difficulties. Mulla Sadra's major philosophical work Al-Asfar, which presents his entire philosophical system, has not been translated into Persian and Urdu but not into English. With the exception of Fazlur Rahman's work no comprehensive book on his philosophy is available. In addition to this limitation in accessing Mulla Sadra's philosophy in English, his style of writing is sophisticated and complex. It covers a broad area of metaphysics, Gnosticism and theology. It deals with the views of Mulla Sadra's predecessors critically Mulla Sadra's new philosophical ideas are presented or constructed. Despite these difficulties it should be remembered that Mulla Sadra's philosophy is the product of the sixteenth century but quite relevant to our understanding of reality and contemporary society. His doctrine of the trans-substantial change and his views on novelty and constant transformation of history could play a profound role on our ethical as well as political life in the Muslim world.

I am indebted to Dr Purushottama Bilimoria at the University of Melbourne for his assistance and encouragement to write on this project and publish it. My acknowledgment is gratefully made to Prof. Gholam Hossein Ebrahimi Dinani of the Department of Philosophy, Teheran University for his valuable time and valuable discussion on Mulla Sadra, and to the Sadra Islamic Philosophy Research Institute (SIPRI) in Teheran for their support and assistance. My thanks go to Donna Williams who went through the manuscript and enabled me to root out inelegancies of expression. I wish also to express my appreciation to the editor of the series of Ashgate World Philosophies in which this book appears.

The School of Illuminationism and the Doctrine of the Primacy of Essence

Al-Ghazali's (1058–1111) polemic of rationalistic philosophy, along with the Seljuq dynasty's revival of Ash'ari Sunni theology, contributed to the eclipse of philosophical discourse in some parts of the Muslim world.¹ These two factors, however, did not disrupt the intellectual continuity of Shi'i twelfth century, Muslim philosophical thinking forged two different directions: the rationalistic discourse re-emerged under the influence of Aristotelian philosophy in Spain led by Muslim philosophers such as Ibn Bajjah (1106–1139), Ibn Tufayl (d. 1185) and Ibn Rushd (1126–1198); and Illuminationism (al-ishraqiyyah) spread in Persia.

The school of Illuminationism, which is significant for our understanding of Mulla Sadra's philosophy, was founded by Shahab al-Din Yahya b. Habash b. Amirak Suhrawardi, known also as Shaykh al-Ishraq, the master of illumination. Suhrawardi's date of birth is not known precisely. We only know that he was born in Suhraward or 'Suhrabard', a Kurdish village between Zenjan and Bijar. According to Mulla Salih Ibrahimi, Shahab al-Din Suhrawardi was originally Kurdish and the nephew of Mulla Omer Suhrawardi, another Kurdish Muslim scholar from the same village and of Sunni-Islamic origin. Mulla Omer and Shahab al-Din also wrote poetry in Kurdish; some poems of the latter were published by Ibrahimi. It is also reported in Nuzat al-arwah e rawzat al-afrah by Shams al-Din Shahrazuri that 'Shuraward' was a Kurdish village.² In the tenth century, the village was destroyed by the Mongols. According to Noldeke and Marquart, its name derived from Suhrab, who was a Persian governor of Hira.³ Today, Suhraward (Suhrabard) is located in the municipality of Azerbaijan in Iran. For this reason, some people, without knowing the ethnic make-up of the region, think that Suhrawardi was originally Turkish or Persian.

Shahrazuri states that Suhrawardi was born in 1166 or 1171.⁴ Nasr also gives two dates. In one of his early works, Nasr says that Suhrawardi was born in 1153;⁵ later, in his introduction to Opera Metaphysica et Mystical, he indicates that Suhrawardi was born in 1171.⁶ After receiving an Islamic education, Suhrawardi travelled through Persia to Anatolia and Syria. He was a contemporary and classmate of Fakhr al-Din al-Razi; the two had studied under Shaykh Mujjad al-Din Jili and later under Zahi al-Din Qari in Isfahan. On one of his journeys from Damascus to Aleppo, the capital city of the Ayyubid Sunni dynasty,⁷ Suhrawardi met Malik Zahir, the governor of Aleppo and the son of Salah al-Din al-Ayyubi, who patronized him and engaged him in conversation on thorny philosophical and theological issues with a cluster of the 'ulama in Aleppo.⁸ Another reason for travelling to Aleppo – a centre of the new political conflict between Islam and Christendom – rather than to a peaceful region, might be seen in Suhrawardi's ethnic affiliation with the Ayyubi family.

The political situation in Syria at that time could be defined as crucial and in turmoil. The Shi'ite Muslims who had long ruled Syria and North Africa, particularly Egypt, lost their hegemony to the Sunni Muslims. Salaha al-Din destroyed the Fatimid Shi'i dynasty in Egypt and Syria. In addition to this internal conflict between Sunnism and Shi'ism over political hegemony, the Crusaders appeared as an eminent external force against the Muslim world. Salah al-Din Ayyubi, who represented the Sunni political hegemony, was seen as the only one with authority to protect the interest of Sunni Islamic civilization from these external and internal rivalries. Under such unfavourable circumstances for the development of philosophy, it seems that, by travelling to the heart of this turmoil, Suhrawardi chose a wrong direction and time to advocate his philosophical ideas. The Sunni Islamic world, facing threats from Christendom represented by the Crusaders and from Shi'ism, was not resilient to change and could not tolerate innovation. The Sunni 'ulama, considering themselves the guardians and protectors of Islamic faith and identity, were looking at any philosophical inclination or intellectual contention with suspicion. Suhrawardi's philosophical ideas, in the court of Malik Zahir, were seen in this political context; on them were visited the hostility and rejection of the institution of the 'ulama. The 'ulama branded Suhrawardi's ideas as heretical and asked Malik Zahir to put the young philosopher to death. Malik Zahir was reluctant to do this against his master and friend, so the 'ulama approached Salah al-Din, who ordered his son to act. Suhrawardi was finally executed in 1208 at the age of thirty-eight. According to Shahrazuri, there are several accounts of his death. One reports that he was starved to death in prison. Another states that Suhrawardi himself fasted until he died. Some held the view that he was suffocated, executed or thrown from the wall of the fortress and then burned.⁹

The term 'ishraq', which is Arabic for 'illumination', was used before Suhrawardi by Ibn Sina in his Mantiq al-Mashriqiyyan, where he talks about the oriental wisdom as a superior source of knowledge to the rationalistic discourse. Suhrawardi was aware of the significance of Ibn Sina's view but believed that Ibn Sina was unable to comprehend the importance of oriental cognition as he did not have the proper epistemological tools or access to the sources of ishraqi wisdom (Gnosticism). He states in his treatise Risaleh safari Simurgh that seeking the Truth through rationalistic discourse is like seeking the sun with a lamp.¹⁰

In Suhrawardi's view, the history of philosophy did not begin with Thales in 600 BC. Instead Hermes is considered by this Muslim thinker to be the father of illuminative philosophical thinking or wisdom. Hermes was followed by sages from Greece, Persia and the Muslim world. In Greece, this type of philosophical thinking came to an end with Aristotle, who replaced the cognitive tool of illumination with the rationalistic discourse. But the illuminative philosophy continued to develop in Persia, and after the advent of Islam was continued by Muslim Sufis such as Dhu al-Nun al-Misri, Abu Salih Tustari, Abu Yazid Bistami, Mansur al-Hallaj, Abu Hassan Kharraqain and finally Suhrawardi himself.

What is important for us in understanding the history of philosophy described by Suhrawardi and for developing our argument is that this Muslim thinker acknowledged the connection between Plato's thought and his own metaphysics. The depiction of this connection is significant when we try to compare Mulla Sadra's metaphysical background and criticism of Illuminationism and Heidegger's interpretation of 'nihilism' in the West by tracing them back to Plato. To demonstrate similarities between Mulla Sadra's opposition to Illuminationism, in particular the doctrine of the primacy of essence, and Heidegger's negative attitude towards nihilism, we need to highlight the relationship between Plato's metaphysics and Illuminationism. We begin by explaining how Suhrawardi, in his introduction to Hikmat al-Ishraq, refers explicitly to Plato and the place of his ideas in the development of the illuminative philosophy,

In all I have said about the science of lights and that which is not based upon it, I have been assisted by those who have travelled the path of God. This science is the very intuition of the inspired and illumined Plato, the guide and master of philosophy, and of those who came before him from the time of Hermes, 'the father of philosophy' upon Plato's time, including such mighty pillars of philosophy as Empedocles, Pythagoras, and others.¹¹

It is customary in the history of Western philosophy to begin with Thales (a Milesian philosopher of 640–546 BC) as the father of Western philosophy. To understand the development of Greek philosophy we must also distinguish between the pre-Socratic and the post-Socratic periods. But for Suhrawardi, philosophy began with Hermes and Plato rather than with Thales. For Suhrawardi, this was the demarcation between two stages of development in the history of this type of philosophical thinking. The science of light or the illuminative philosophy came down from Hermes to the sages of ancient Iran and Egypt and thence to Plato. Greek, ancient Iranian, Egyptian and Islamic sources have become the foundation of this type of philosophy. In dealing with these historical roots and sources, Suhrawardi mentions the ancient Iranian religion, Zoroastrianism, several times. But as John Walbridge argues, this in no way indicates a revival of pre-Islamic religious belief or an endorsement of metaphysical dualism in Suhrawardi's philosophical system.¹² This Muslim thinker also describes the original form of Zoroastrianism as monotheism, to which King Gushtasp later introduced dualism.¹³ He believes that Zoroastrianism as a religion is different from the teachings of the Zoroastrian sages that he follows, such as Kiumarth, Faridun and Kaikhusraw, who guided their community towards the light by their illuminated wisdom, and who were in turn different from the so-called Manichaeans.¹⁴

As far as Greek thought is concerned, Plato's metaphysics and his allegory of the cave were an inspiration for Suhrawardi.¹⁵ He sees the ascent of the human being from the cave towards the light as a real liberation from the domain of shadows of the contingent world. Attaining the Truth is determined by this journey of the seeker of the Truth who attempts to liberate him/herself from the dogma of the cave and look into the light. In Plato's philosophy, those who liberate themselves from the shadows of the cave and are unshackled will be able to see the sun. In his short treatise Al-Qissa al-Ghurbat al-Gharbiyyah (Story of the Occidental Exile), Suhrawardi pursues Plato's allegory with some modification. In this work, the seeker of the Truth, like the prisoner freed from the cave, must undertake the spiritual journey of his/her liberation from the occident, which is the world of darkness and material existence, to the orient, the world of light and archangels. In Suhrawardi's allegory, human beings are not shackled in a cave but are imprisoned at the bottom of a well and left in total darkness. These prisoners were originally from Yemen (a land between the occident and the orient of the Muslim world), and were sent into exile to Qirawan, a city in Tunis, in the west of the orient. Like the prisoner unshackled from the cave, the escapee from the well will return to the well after seeing the light of the orient because he has not discarded all his bonds.

In the context of Plato's metaphysical analysis, according to Suhrawardi, the rationalistic approach of Aristotle broke the chain of continuity of the Platonic philosophical tradition. Discursive knowledge and rationalistic thinking replaced intuitive knowledge. For this reason and due to the dominance of Plato's metaphysics in the history of Illuminationist philosophy, thinkers like al-Jurjani define the adherents of Illuminationism as "philosophers whose master was Plato".¹⁶ In al-Talwihat, Suhrawardi, besides discussing his doctrine of the principality of essence, presents a critical study of Aristotle's categories. First he argues that the categories were discovered by Archytas (a Pythagorean thinker) before Aristotle. Second he reduces their number from ten to four and adds 'motion' as a new category.¹⁷ In this work, Suhrawardi encounters Aristotle (the master of discursive knowledge) in a state between dreaming and being awake; it is in this state that their discussion on the origin of Illuminationism, the distinction between discursive and intuitive knowledge, takes place.¹⁸

Suhrawardi not only incorporated Plato's metaphysics into his own but he also considered his philosophy of illumination as the continuation of

Platonism. He recognizes Plato not as a philosopher but as one of the masters of Illuminationism:

Plato and his companions showed plainly that they believed the Maker of the universe and the world of intellect to be the light when they said that the pure light is the world of intellect. Of himself, Plato said that in certain of his spiritual conditions he would shed his body and become free from matter. Then he would see light and splendour within his essence. He would ascend to that all-encompassing divine cause and would seem to be located and suspended in it, beholding a mighty light in that lofty and divine place.¹⁹

At another place, Suhrawardi compares Plato's philosophy with the allusions of the prophets,²⁰ and describes himself not as the founder of Illuminationism but as a follower of masters such as Hermes and Plato.²¹ In classifying seekers of knowledge, Suhrawardi also places Plato among those who possess perfect discursive knowledge and illumination. A philosopher like Plato, in possession of these two faculties of knowledge, is the vicegerent of God and a person wise enough to be a leader or ruler of society and a philosopher king. By contrast, the rationalist philosophers such as Aristotle, proficient only in discursive knowledge, are not suitable candidates for such elevated positions in society.

It is worth mentioning that, although it does not have a direct relationship with the essence of things, Suhrawardi still considers discursive knowledge to be one of the cognitive tools. But for Suhrawardi, a true philosopher is one who is capable, like Plato, of possessing discursive as well as intuitive knowledge and using both, in particular the latter, for understanding the nature of reality and knowing the Truth. Suhrawardi's opposition to Aristotle, and to Muslim Peripatetic thinkers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, can thus be elucidated in the light of Aristotle's metaphysical position, his criticism of Plato, and his reliance on discursive knowledge in his epistemology. Aristotle's philosophy is seen as a philosophical tendency hostile towards Platonism and as a philosophical position yielding a distorted notion of reality.

Plato assumed that the plurality of individual objects could be unified under common essences or Ideas.²² The essences have their own reality as objective essences rather than mere universal concepts that exist only in thinking. To Plato, referring to the universal concept or quiddity of an object also means referring to its objective essence. Besides, essences do not rely on individual objects to exist, because they are transcendent and spatially detached from them. The essences constitute the reality of individual objects but do not reside in them in the sensible world.

How does the human mind know and reach these transcendent essences? In the Symposium, Plato describes a procedure or 'itinerary' for this. For example, one can arrive at realizing the essence of 'beauty' by ascending from beautiful objects to the pure notion of beauty and thence to the form of this essence, which is universal and self-subsistent.²³ Individual objects, which are detached from these essences, are objects of 'opinion' and 'sense-experience'. In contrast, the essences are not in the domain of 'opinion' and 'sense-experience' but objects that can be 'known'. Here and in the Platonic context, true knowledge corresponds to the apprehension or intelligibility of the essences when the human mind is turned upwards in the method of ascent.²⁴ This kind of knowledge and way of knowing became in the Republic a prerogative of the philosophers who seek to turn their minds upwards in order to see the universal transcendent essences. A philosopher should not be interested in a multiplicity of individual objects of the sensible world but in their unified essences or the source of their existence in the ideal world. For Suhrawardi, this upward turn or the sight of the sun in Plato's theory of cognition is illumination (al-ishraq) and the source of true knowledge through which the human mind can apprehend the transcendent reality.

There is more than a convergence of views between Platonism and Illuminationism; in my opinion the latter has a parasitical relationship with the former. Further similarity between these two philosophical schools can be found in Plato's analogy of the idea of Good with Light. Among all essences, the Form of the Good is both supreme and the source of all other essences. This notion of the Good is also compared to the sun or the 'Light', shining upon all other essences and making them visible and intelligible:

This, then, which imparts truth to the things that are known and the power of knowing to the knower, you may affirm to be the Form of the good. It is the cause of knowledge and truth, and you may conceive it as being known, but while knowledge and truth are both beautiful, you will be right in thinking it other and fairer than these. And as in the other world it is right to think light and sight sun-like, but not right to think them the sun, so here it is right to think both knowledge and truth like the good, but not right to think either of them the good. The state or nature of the good must be honoured still more highly.²⁵

The Form of the Good is to an extent the foundation of all other essences. Their existence and intelligibility are thinkable only in their relation to the Good. In understanding this relationship Heidegger remarks that 'the highest idea, although itself barely visible, is what makes possible both being and unhiddenness, i.e. it is what empowers being and unhiddenness as what they are. The highest idea, therefore, is this empowering; the empowering for being which as such gives itself simultaneously with the empowerment of unhiddenness as occurrence.'²⁶ This empowering is the characteristic and the essential quality of the Form of the Good, which corresponds to the symbol of light. Similarly for Suhrawardi the world is made up of contingent light, which depends for its existence on the ultimate light or the Light of lights (nur al-anwar): 'Accident light is not light in itself, since its existence is in another. Thus, it can only be light due to another. The incorporeal pure light is light in itself. Therefore, everything that is light in itself is incorporeal pure light.²⁷

The world is indebted to the Light of lights or the form of the Good not only for being visible and comprehended but also for what it is. The coming into being and ceasing to be of everything in the contingent world is empowered by the Light of lights. In the realm below the empowering Light there are four forms of light: immaterial, luminous, accidents and bodies. The immaterial light is the cause of the other three lights and is also a self-conscious substantial light. God, the intellects of the spheres, human intellect and animal soul are all immaterial lights, which cause the other three forms of light to exist. Since the contingent lights belong to a lower ontological division, they are less bright. They also share the same essence, as all of them spring from the same source. They are also gradations of the same reality but different in their intensity and perfection in brightness. This ground for making a distinction between one contingent light and another is not the realization of their 'differentia' or 'accidents'. It is due to their rank in the hierarchy of emanation. Two contingent lights are different because they vary in perfection or the intensity of light. Human beings, for example, are more perfect than animals. They both belong to two different ranks of existence. The vertical emanation from the Light of lights goes from the Intellects of the celestial sphere to the individualization of light in accidents and bodies. Based on the relationship between the immaterial light and the other three forms, the immaterial light is divided into dominating and managing light. The former functions like the Platonic Forms and the latter is the individual soul in an individual body:

Even though the managing light comes from one of the exalted dominating lights and accepts many illuminations, it is not like a dominating light in perfection of its substance. The dominating light brings into being the managing incorporeal light only due to perfections of the barrier acquired from the mighty lords and in order to manage it in the way appropriate for controlling barriers of finite power. By this, it strengthens its connection with the barrier.²⁸

In explaining this relationship among various forms of light, Suhrawardi thinks in line with Plato, but at the same time he does not repeat the Platonic doctrine of Ideas without alteration. For him, the dominating light is concerned with species. Every species that exists as a dominating light has a universal form called 'Lord of the Species'. These Lords of Species or Forms are not universal essences shared by all particulars. They exist at a higher realm and are independent of particulars. Their universality is determined by the same relationship to all particulars of the same species. The Lords of Species are the causes of the particulars and are universals in the sense that they have this causal relationship to all particulars of the same species. For example, the universal Form of 'cat' has the same causal relationship to all individual cats in the material world. This can be seen as a difference between Suhrawardi's understanding of the universal Forms and that of Plato. Another essential difference to be noted here is that Suhrawardi, unlike Plato, believes that the domain of the Forms is beyond the cognitive capacity of reason and is to be apprehended intuitively. In this way, Suhrawardi followed Plato but at the same time offered his own point of view and contribution to the doctrine of the Forms. He accepts the doctrine but thinks of the Forms as causes of individual beings, not as a universal predicate shared by all of them. The question that arises here is how a multiplicity of contingent lights can arise from the simple and indivisible nature of the Light of lights.

Suhrawardi found a Neoplatonic answer to this question: from the Light of lights emanates the lower levels of contingent lights, the angelic order, and the archetypes. The Light of lights is the single origin of all things and gives constant illumination to them. It is the highest in the metaphysical hierarchy of being, not only in terms of rank but also as the most perfect source and origin of all contingent lights. The emanated realms, unlike the Light of lights, are different in their degree of perfection and remoteness from their illuminating source. They are either self-subsistent or dependent on something else. In addition to this classification they can be distinguished by their degree of self-consciousness. A self-conscious being is either self-subsistent, as in the case of the Light of lights, the angels and the human consciousness, or depends on something other than itself for its self-awareness, as in the case of stars or fire. Another division of the lights is based on their degree of self-awareness. A light is either self-aware of or obvious to itself. The self-aware light is either self-subsistent or depends on something other than itself in order to become aware of itself. The classification continues and the differences between all things at various levels of this hierarchy of light depend on the intensity of light manifested in each kind of being. But the illuminating source or the Light of lights is not affected by this multiplicity of its own manifestation and gradation:

Multiplicity cannot conceivably result from the Light of lights in its unity, nor can any darkness be conceived to result from a dusky substance or state, nor yet two lights result from the Light of lights in its unity. Therefore, that which first results from the Light of lights must be a single incorporeal light. This then cannot be distinguished from the Light of lights by any dark state acquired from the Light of lights. This would imply the multiplicity of aspects in the Light of lights in contradiction to the demonstration that the lights, particularly the incorporeal lights, do not differ in their realities. Therefore, the Light of lights and the first light that results from it are only to be distinguished by perfection and deficiency.²⁹

The descending process of emanation of the multiplicity of contingent lights from a single indivisible source can best be understood against the hierarchy

of being in the ontological system of other Muslim emanationists such as al-Farabi (c. 870–950). According to this Muslim philosopher, the first emanation from the 'One' was not a multiplicity of contingent beings but the first intellect capable of knowing the 'One' as well as itself. The second intellect emanates from the first intellect and the third from the second intellect, which gives rise to the sphere of the fixed stars. This process of emanation continues until the emanation of the tenth intellect is reached, and with it the corresponding spheres of Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the sun, Venus, Mercury and the moon. At the lowest level of emanation lies the 'prime matter'. This contains the four elements of water, air, fire and earth. These include minerals, plants, animals and finally human beings.³⁰ Similarly, from the Light of lights emanates the first light, and from this the incorporeal light and barrier. This emanation continues until there are the nine spheres and the series of lights from which no other incorporeal light emanates. Suhrawardi also believes that emanation is a pre-eternal process because the Light of lights neither changes nor withers away.³¹ His analysis of human existence is also based on his understanding of reality. As a thinker who believes in the reality of the incorporeal realm, he divides human beings into two parts: incorporeal (soul) and corporeal (body). These two parts represent light and darkness. Nor is a relationship between them necessary. The incorporeal soul, although attached to the body, is independent and survives without embodiment. The corporeality of human existence has at the same time an attachment to darkness, which is a barrier that foils the human soul's access to knowledge of the reality. Identifying the human soul with light and the body with darkness represents for Suhrawardi two aspects of human existence, which are essentially distinct and belong to two different ontological ranks. The human soul is also in constant struggle to keep itself aloof from the influence of the body in order to reach perfection, which can be obtained by giving up worldly pleasure and the demands of corporeal life. This is a journey in human life towards the abode of pure light and the Sufi path of self-purification and elevation.³²

As mentioned earlier, Suhrawardi acknowledges his debt to Plato, under whose influence he rejects the question of the primacy of being and treats being as nothing, and develops arguments for the primacy of essence (asalat al-mahiyyah). For him, something exists when its essence becomes cognizant; its reality relies on its essence. The arguments in vindication of this metaphysical position rotate around the philosophical conviction that existence is conceptual and has no reality of its own in the external world. It has no representation outside the human mind. Before explaining Suhrawardi's main arguments it is important to mention some considerations discussed by him in Section Three of the Third Discourse ('Concerning the Illuminationsit Judgments on Certain Points') in Hikmat al-Ishraq. These considerations are:

- Against Muslim Aristotelian–Neoplatonic thinkers he argues that ‘There is nothing in existence, which is itself the quiddity of existence; for as soon as we conceive its concept, we may wonder whether or not it has existence.’³³ This will eventually result in an infinite regress, because existence would have another existence and so on.
- If we think that essence has existence, then it should have a relation to it. This relation would also need existence, which stands in a relation to the previous relation and so on. This would continue to infinity.³⁴
- If existence were in entities and were not an essence, then it would become a state in them. In this case existence would become dependent on them. ‘Thus its locus would be actualized, but it would exist before its locus. Its locus could not be actualized simultaneously with it, since its locus would exist with the existence, not by the existence – which is absurd.’³⁵
- According to Muslim Aristotelian–Neoplatonic thinkers, the locus is prior to an accident. Thus, as pointed out by Suhrawardi, the existence would be prior to existence; this is not only absurd, but also impossible.³⁶
- Muslim Aristotelian–Neoplatonic thinkers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina believed that ‘existence’ was added to ‘essence’ of an entity as an accident. But, according to Suhrawardi, if we think of existence as an accident, it should subsist in its locus. In this case existence would need its locus for its realization. Since the locus is existent, then its subsistence would be circular, and this is again absurd for Suhrawardi.

Let us now turn to Suhrawardi’s main argument for the primacy of essence. In this argument he tries to prove that existence is either a universal concept or a particular. If it is a universal concept and shared like any other universal concept by all particular existents, existence remains in the domain of thinking as something conceptual. If existence is a particular, it is dependent on its essence. Let us say that ‘existence’ is a universal concept because all things that exist do so equally – or they share existence. In this case, ‘existence’ as a universal concept becomes a universal nature. But there are other universal concepts such as ‘blackness’ or ‘whiteness’ of the same nature. Could we say that existence, like these universal concepts, is a universal essence? If the answer to this question is ‘yes’, then existence becomes a universal concept; otherwise we have to think of it as a particular entity.³⁷ If existence is thought to be a particular entity, it still remains a mental concept, and essence becomes real in which a particular existence is actualized. A particular existence is nothing more than its essence. As Suhrawardi argues, ‘existence’ is conceived in respect to a particular existence and the particular existence is also equivalent to essence. Existence is thus contingent on a particular existence. To clarify this metaphysical position Suhrawardi states:

Next we argue that if blackness is non-existent, then its existence is not actual. Therefore its existence is not existent, since its existence is also non-existent. If we do intellect existence and judge that it is not existent, then the concept of existence is distinct from the concept of existent. We might say that blackness, which we had taken as non-existent, now exists and that its existence was not yet actual but then becomes actual. If so, the actuality of the existence would not be the existence itself, and the existence would have existence. This same argument applies to the existence of existence, and so on to infinity. But a simultaneous ordered infinity of attributes is absurd.³⁸

What we understand from this is that 'existence' cannot be a primordial ontological condition for a thing. That primordial ontological condition is 'essence', which occupies a primary position on which the existence of all things relies and which supports the contingency of existence.

In Suhrawardi's philosophy 'essence' is also equated with 'light'. God, who is the Essence of the essences, is the Light of lights. Here we find a lucid distinction between the Light of lights as the cause and empowering light of all lights and the contingent or caused and empowered lights. The Light of lights cannot be thought of as another contingent light; all contingent lights are dependent on something other than them to exist and the Light of lights is their final cause, which has no cause. It is that being that does not fail to exist and so is necessary. This argument, which is originally Aristotelian, is also used by Muslim theologians and philosophers in a variety of forms to prove the existence of God. The Light of lights provides constant illumination and brings all contingent lights into existence. These lights are either self-subsistent, for example incorporeal lights, or they are accidental and their subsistence relies on something other than themselves.

The individual self, which is a contingent light, is more illuminated as it nears its source. This increase in the intensity of illumination occurs with the abolition of the ontological distance between the Light of lights and the self. Suhrawardi calls this proximity to the Light of lights 'presence', the awareness of which is 'knowledge by presence', which is considered to be the most reliable source of cognition. 'Knowledge by presence' or intuitive knowledge, however, had a significant impact on Mulla Sadra's epistemology, which is discussed in Chapter Six.

The thinkers who were responsible for the early transmission of Suhrawardi's ideas and were known for their writings on Illuminationism were Shams al-Din Muhammad al-Shahrazuri (d. 1288), Sa'ad b. Mansur Ibn Kammunah (d. 1284) and Qutb al-Din al-Shirazi (d. 1311). Al-Shahrazuri is considered to be the first major commentator on Suhrawardi's thought. Ibn Kammunah wrote on Suhrawardi in al-Talwihat, a book studied widely by the advocates of Illuminationism in Persia. Al-Shirazi incorporated Illuminationism into Ibn Sina's ontology and the doctrine of the Unity of Being of Ibn 'Arabi.³⁹ From the thirteenth century onwards, other thinkers, such as Muhammad b. Zayn al-Din b. Ibrahim Asha‘i (d. 1479) and Giyath al-Din Mansur Dashtaki (d. 1541), wrote under the influence of Suhrawardi’s illuminative philosophy.

Suhrawardi’s Illuminationism changed philosophical tradition in the Muslim world by bridging the gulf between Gnosticism and rationalism. It left a great mark on the development of intellectual life in the Muslim world. Its influence can be found in Persia and the Indian subcontinent to the present day. The magnitude of this influence will be discussed in the next chapter on the Safawid period in Isfahan, when Mulla Sadra came under the sway of this philosophical tradition at the beginning of his philosophical training and vocation.

The School of Isfahan and Mulla Sadra's Departure from Suhraward's Tradition

Suhrawardi died young but the impact of his philosophy on Muslim intellectual life was outstanding. He advocated the doctrine of the primacy of essence and established harmony between discursive and intuitive knowledge, with an emphasis on the latter as a reliable source of knowing the Truth. The predominance of Suhrawardi's philosophy was greatly felt in Persia and his school, namely Illuminationism, flourished in Isfahan during the Safawid dynasty (1051–1732), attracting a number of Shi'ite thinkers, including Mulla Sadra. To understand the popularity of Illuminationism during that period it is helpful to discern the origin and development of the Safawid dynasty and to explain why the Safawid rulers patronized this type of philosophy in their dynasty.

The Safawid was originally a Sufi order whose founder, Shaykh Safi al-Din (1252–1334), was a Sunni Sufi master descended from a Kurdish family in north-western Iran.¹ Nasr, in his article 'The School of Isfahan', does not mention the ethnic and sectarian origin of the order, but he gives the title Ardibili to the founder because the family of Safi al-Din had settled at Ardibil and Shaykh Safi al-Din died there.² At another place, Nasr acknowledges that the order belonged originally to Sunni Islam as an offshoot of the Qadiriyyah order founded in Baghdad.³ According to Percy Sykes, however, the dynasty traces its descent from Musa al-Kazim (745–799), the seventh Shi'i imam for the Twelvers. Sykes does not say whether this Shi'i genealogy of the order was given by Shaykh Safi al-Din or was fabricated at the later stage of the encroachment of the order into Shi'i Imamism.

The political orientation of the order and the transformation of the sect to Shi'i Islam began with Shaykh Junayd (d. 1460), the grandson of Shaykh Safi al-Din, and his son 'Ali (d. 1496). Shaykh Junayd advocated the idea of jihad (holy war) against non-Muslims as well as corrupt Muslim rulers in Persia. He recruited supporters from Turkish and Kurdish tribes and called them Qizilbash (those who wore red headgear with twelve gores for the twelve Shi'i imams). But the total conversion of the order to Shi'i Islam and the establishment of the dynasty took place at the time of Isma'il (1487–1524), also known as Shah Isma'il, the grandson of Junayd who marched on Tabriz in 1501 and designated himself a king (shah).⁴ The conversion of the order by Shah Isma'il, as it is seen in the political history of the order, provided a terra firma for consolidating Shah Isma'il's own political hegemony. Relying on the notion of the messianic or the Shi'i doctrine of the imamate, Shah Isma'il claimed to be imam al-muntazr (Awaited One) or the Mahdi. On this matter, Nasr asserts that the veneration of 'Ali in the inner tendency of the order was responsible for this conversion:

Both Shah Ni'mat Allah who came to Persia from Aleppo, and Shaikh Safi al-Din from Ardabil were at first Sufis of Sunni background such as the Shaziliyya and Qadiriyya brotherhoods. But the inner belief in the valayat of 'Ali gradually transformed the outer form of the orders as well into thoroughly Shi'i organizations, although the inward structure of these orders, being sufi, remained above the Shi'i-Sunni distinctions.⁵

In my opinion Shah Isma'il combined political and divine authority by seeking absolute power and devotion from his followers. This claim, however, was challenged by the followers after Shah Isma'il's defeat by the Sunni Ottoman Empire during the reign of Selim I (r. 1512–1520) at the battle of Chaldiran in 1514.⁶ To neutralize the tension and avoid humiliation before his followers the defeated Shah Isma'il adopted a softer theological position by making Twelver Shi'ism the official religion of the state. He also began to force the Sunni population to convert in the areas he controlled in Persia. Many Shi'i scholars such as Shaykh 'Ali b. Abd al-'Ali Karaki, Shaykh Baha al-Din 'Amili and Ni'mat Allah Jaza'iri were invited from Iraq, Lebanon and Bahrain to participate in the establishment of Shi'i educational institutions in Persia. Further to this, the Safawid state embarked on a plan to eliminate the rival sects, in particular those with antagonistic attitude towards Shi'ism. The messianic-extremist Shi'i sects and Sufi orders such as Naqshabandiyyah and Khalwatiyyah were banned; Sunni Muslims and other religious minority groups were persecuted. It was during this time that Persia was transformed from a predominantly Sunni Islam to a Shi'i Islamic dynasty.⁷

There were, however, three groups that contributed to the foundation of the Safawid state and its development: the Qizilbash, who represented the popular Sufi movement; the institution of the 'ulama or salaried clergy; and finally, at the top, the ruler. The first group was gradually suppressed for political reasons and the second group drew closer to the royal court. With the advent of Shah Tahmasib (1524–1576), the state openly supported the 'ulama against the Qizilbash and other Sufi orders. Shah Abbas I (1571–1629) recruited many 'ulama in different administrative positions. But his support for the scholars of Gnosticism and real Sufis never ceased. The development of philosophy in Isfahan is indebted to Shah Abbas's patronage of scholars of theology and Gnosticism. It was during his reign that the philosophy of illumination received official recognition and was advocated by some influential Shi'i thinkers who remained close to the monarch. As we see, on one side the Safawid dynasty stood hostile towards Sunni thought and Sufism, while on the other side it did not curtail the development of illuminative philosophy of Suhrawardi and theological debates on various religious matters.⁸

This Shi'i state, like other Islamic states, was supportive of a philosophical discourse favourable to the metaphysical foundation of its political power. Intellectual endeavour was consequently subject to the favour of despotic rulers who were either for or against it. This was characteristic of the political environment in which ideas were shaped in the Muslim world. Philosophy, unlike religious discourse, never enjoyed a long-term engagement and relationship to the state and was forced by the clergy to stand outside the educational institutions most of the time. Nevertheless, there were reasons for the revival of Illuminationism during the Safawid dynasty. As mentioned earlier, the Safawid was a gnostic Sufi order that was transformed into a political movement. Unlike other Islamic dynasties it was not based purely on military insurgence. It was expected to incline towards a type of metaphysics that could easily be manipulated for political ends. Illuminationism, as Amin Razavi remarks, provided such a philosophical foundation for the political convictions of the dynasty.⁹ The contribution of some great Shi'i thinkers with political influence was to promote Suhrawardi's philosophy; this played a remarkable role in having Illuminationism recognized as an influential philosophical trend of the time.

During the Safawid dynasty, Muslim thinkers in Persia continued the post Ibn Sinan intellectual tradition. They were able to establish systems of thought that were neither purely philosophical nor gnostic but a combination of both. They intended to develop a theosophical tradition rather than a rationalistic philosophy based purely on discursive knowledge. Thinkers such as Ghyas al-Din Mansur and later Mir Damad interpreted Ibn Sina's Peripatetic doctrine in the light of the illuminative philosophy of Suhrawardi. Other thinkers, such as Abd al-Razzaq Kashani, Sa'ad al-Din Hamuya, Aziz al-Din Nasafi, Fakhr al-Din Araqi, Auhad al-Din Kirmani and Abdul Rahman Jami, were influenced by Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the unity of being. They incorporated this gnostic doctrine into their philosophical systems.¹⁰ In the fourteenth century, Sayyid Haider Amuli, Ibn Abi Jumhur and Rajab Basri, whose theosophical doctrines were developed under the influence of Ibn 'Arabi, contributed to the integration of Gnosticism in Shi'i Islam during the Safawid period. Sayyid Sharif Jurjani and Jalal al-Din Dawani also tried to bridge the gulf between philosophy and theology.¹¹

Among these Muslim Shi'i thinkers, Mir Damad is of great importance because, with Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i, he belonged to the first generation who were the main thinkers behind the establishment of the School of Isfahan. The name of this school was employed recently by Henri Corbin, Nasr and Ashtiyani. Corbin includes Mir Damad, Mulla Sadra and Qadi Sa'id Qummin as its main figures. Nasr gives a longer list of names but emphasizes Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i as the forerunners of the school. These three thinkers were also patronized by Shah Tahmasp and Shah Abbas, the Safawid ruler. It is reported that Shah Abbas visited them

Mir Burhan al-Din Muhammad Baqir Damad was known as Mir Damad and was also given the title of 'Third Teacher' following Aristotle and al-Farabi.¹³ Another title by which he was known was Sayyid al-Afdil, 'Master of the Most Learned'.¹⁴ This Muslim thinker was born in 1561 in Ashtarabad. His father, Mir Shams al-Din, was the son-in-law of Shaykh 'Ali b. Abd al-'Ali Karaki, a distinguished Shi'i cleric (d. 1538) and the author of the theological discourse al-Najmiyyah and several other commentaries on religious subjects. Shaykh 'Ali Karaki migrated to Persia after the establishment of the Safawid dynasty and during the reign of Shah Tahmasp (r. 1524–1576) enjoyed patronage and power. Mir Damad gained his education in the major Shi'i cities of Persia. He studied philosophy, transmitted sciences ('ulum al-naqliyyah) and natural sciences and closely studied Ibn Sina's philosophical texts. He became the leading authority on philosophy, theology, jurisprudence and natural sciences. During the time of Shah Abbas he went to Isfahan to teach, where he attracted a large number of disciples. Among them were Mulla Khalil Qazwini, Sayyid Ahmed 'Alawi, Qutb al-Din Ashkiwari and Mulla Sadra.¹⁵ Mir Damad wrote various religious and philosophical titles in Arabic and Persian; for example Qabasat, Taqdisat, Taqim al-imam, al-Sirat al-mustaqim and al-Ufuq al-mubin were in Arabic. He also wrote Jazarat and Sirat al-muntaha in Persian. These works included discussions on philosophical matters such as being, time, eternity, the relationship between eternal and temporal, creation and God's knowledge of particulars. He also wrote poems under the pen name Ishraq. At the age of twenty, Mir Damad was recognized as a philosopher and was admired by people in the intellectual circles of Mashad and Isfahan. In 1631 he died on his way to Kerbela and was buried in Najaf, a city in present-day Iraq.

It should be remembered that philosophical discourse in the Muslim world has always been looked at with suspicion. The powerful, dogmatic and politically greedy clergy thought of philosophy as poisonous to the religious mind. During the Safawid dynasty, the hostility towards intellectual discourse continued and the Shi'i clergy, like the Sunni clergy, expressed no sympathy with philosophy. The establishment of the School of Isfahan can be attributed less to intellectual tolerance and freedom of expression in the Safawid dynasty than to other factors such as the political position and power of the families of Muslim thinkers like Mir Damad and Mulla Sadra in Shiraz and Isfahan. Mir Damad's father and grandfather were among the influential Shi'i clergy of their time and enjoyed the patronage and support of the Safawid rulers. Mir Damad also was known for his devotion and religiosity. He was highly revered by the 'ulama and by the seekers of irfan (Gnosticism). His style of writing was also complicated and difficult for the clergy to understand, particularly those who were not familiar with theosophy and Gnosticism. Nor should we forget Shah Abbas's personal interest in intellectual debate and philosophy and his encouragement of learning and his friendship with Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i. All these factors contributed to the establishment and development of the School of Isfahan and rescued its founders from persecution by the clergy.

Mir Damad's philosophy is characterized by a fusion of Suhrawardi's Illuminationism and Ibn Sina's ontology. For him, there is a clear distinction between Hellenistic philosophy and Islamic thought. Islamic thought is the source of illumination and theosophy, whereas Hellenistic philosophy represents rationalistic discourse. Illuminationism, as explained by Suhrawardi in Hikmat al-Ishraq (see Chapter Two), was the continuation of a philosophical tradition from Hermes to Plato and then to Eastern thinkers such as himself.¹⁶ Mir Damad, however, kept Platonism outside Hellenistic thought, because Platonism belonged to the philosophical tradition of the illuminative philosophy. Nasr also mentions that eternal creation, huduth-i dahri, is the central idea of Mir Damad's thought.¹⁷ This idea is better understood in light of Mir Damad's division of essence based on Suhrawardi's metaphysics, which eventually leads to different concepts of time. Admittedly, in dealing with the idea of eternal creation, Mir Damad endeavoured to solve the contradictions between the views of Muslim philosophers on creation. He put forward an answer to the question of whether the world was created in time or is eternal. This issue was discussed from the beginning of the rise of Muslim philosophy by thinkers such as al-Kindi, al-Farabi and Ibn Sina. Some Muslim philosophers stated that the world was created in time, while others held that it was eternal. The second view was also attacked by al-Ghazali in his Tahafut al-falasifa; he branded it heretical. Mir Damad took another metaphysical position by synthesizing these two antagonistic claims and advocating the idea that the world was eternally created. For him, the essence of God is absolutely simple and transcends all distinctions, limitations and qualities. It is the source of divine attributes, which are one with it and at the same time different. The divine essence and divine attributes enjoy a necessary and unchangeable relationship, which is eternal or sarmadi, having neither beginning nor end.¹⁸

The divine attributes are similar to the universal Forms in the ideal world in Plato's metaphysics. Even they have a similar relationship to the particular objects of the material world: they are unchangeable but are capable of generating change. The relationship between this unchangeable sphere of the divine attributes and the changing world leads to the rise of another form of time called dahr. The third form of time, called zaman by Mir Damad, is the measure of the quantitative change in the material world.¹⁹ What is the significance of this division of time? How does Mir Damad solve the contradiction between the views of those who advocate the paradigm of creation in time and those who believe in the eternity of the world?

Mir Damad's solution to the relationship between dahr and zaman is that the two forms of time belong to two different spheres of existence. The former time is for the unchangeable and necessary relationship between the divine attributes and the material world. For this Muslim thinker, as for Plato, the material world is distinct from the divine attributes (or the universal Forms in the ideal world). The material world also relies on the divine attributes for its existence. The creation of the world is, therefore, preconditioned by the divine attributes, but it did not occur in the form of time called zaman (time as a quantitative change), because zaman cannot exist without the material world or before the creation of material objects. The world, which exists in zaman and depends on the divine attributes, is also outside the sphere of dahr. Conversely, the divine attributes are in dahr but not in zaman. Something that exists in zaman is non-existent in dahr, and vice versa. Above them, sarmad or the temporality of the divine essence transcends both forms of time. The divine essence is neither in dahr nor in zaman but is aloof from them and their influence.²⁰ Divine essence is the source of everything and everything as essence is identified with light. Following Suhrawardi's doctrine of the primacy of essence, and thinking of everything in the world as the originated light, Mir Damad believes that the essence is the only reality and existence is an accident. Accepting the emanationist doctrine of Neoplatonism, he believed that the world came into existence in the process of emanation. This process is characterized by a descending and ascending order. From the divine essence emanated the divine attributes or the archetypal lights, and the universal intellect was the first component of this emanation. From this emanated the heavenly soul, of which the universal soul is a member. From the universal soul emanated the natural souls. In the final stage, matter emanated. This process is described as a descending order from the most to the least perfect form of existence. At the lowest stage of emanation the process takes an ascending order from minerals to animals and the human species.²¹ Sufism also inspired Mir Damad. In Jadhawat, he describes the ascending journey undertaken by the seekers of redemption to employ intuitivemystic knowledge ('irfan) for understanding the Truth and to devote time to serious spiritual contemplation.

Another Muslim thinker who played a role in Mulla Sadra's intellectual life in Isfahan, and who was a member of the School of Isfahan, was Mir Abdul Qasim Findiriski (d. 1641). Mir Findiriski taught philosophy, mathematics and medicine. Many of his students, for example Rafi'a Gailani, Aqa Husayn Kundsari, Mulla Muhammad Baqir Sabzwari and Mulla Rajab 'Ali Tabrizi, became well-known scholars. However, according to Nasr, it is debatable whether Mulla Sadra studied under him. Mulla Sadra, however, was introduced to Mir Findiriski and the two knew one another well. Mir Findiriski lived longer and died in the same year as Mulla Sadra or one year later.²² Mir Findiriski was acquainted with non-Islamic religious and philosophical traditions in India and Persia. He travelled to India and studied Hinduism as well as Zoroastrianism. He wrote Usul al-fusul on Indian philosophy and a commentary for the Persian translation of the Yoga Vasistha by Nizam al-Din Paniputi. He was also interested in the fine arts and wrote Sana'iyyah, a treatise on the arts and sciences in society.²³ He wrote poetry and lived simply, mixing with the common people and identifying with them. Nasr narrates a story from Riyad al-aarifin that Mir Findiriski's attitude towards the common people annoyed Shah Abbas. One day Shah Abbas said, 'I hear some of the leading scholars and sages have been attending cock-fights in the bazaar.' Mir Findiriski, realizing that the remark was meant for him, replied, 'Your majesty, rest assured, I was present but I saw none of the 'ulama there.'²⁴

Another important figure of the first generation of scholars of the School of Isfahan was Shaykh Baha al-Din 'Amili, known also as Shaykh Baha'i. His father Shaykh Husayn, the son of Shaykh Abdul Samad 'Amili, was originally an Arab from Lebanon, and was sent at the age of thirteen to Persia. He became one of the leading theologians and jurists of his time, a Sufi, a poet, and the leader of the 'ulama in Isfahan.²⁵ He was also a close friend of Mir Findiriski and Mir Damad. The friendship between these three thinkers is revealed in a fresco in the ruins of a Safawid royal building in Isfahan.

This fresco depicts a famous story, according to which one day Mir Damad and two of his prominent contemporaries, Shaykh Baha'i and Mir Findiriski, were sitting in a royal hall, engaged in a philosophical discussion. Suddenly a lion that had escaped from the royal zoo enters the hall. The fresco depicts Shaykh Baha'i as collecting himself with signs of fear on his face, Mir Damad as prostrating in gratitude, and Mir Findiriski as utterly indifferent to the lion's presence. The three distinguished friends were later obliged to provide an explanation of their immediate reactions. Shaykh Baha'i is reported to have said that by the power of reason he knew that unless the lion was hungry, it would not attack him, and yet instinctively he was moved to protect himself. Mir Damad explained that, being the descendant of the Prophet, he knew that the lion would not attack him, so he prostrated himself and thanked God for being a descendant of the Prophet. And Mir Findiriski is reported to have said that he mastered the terrifying beast by the power of his inner serenity and self-control.²⁶

This story, besides disclosing the friendship between these three thinkers, is indicative of the three forms of discourse, namely rational thinking, doctrinal faith and mystical tendency, combined in the intellectual tradition of the Safawid period. The writings of Shaykh Baha'i on theology and astronomy, and his commentaries on the Qur'an and on Arabic grammar were widely used in Persia. He wrote poems under the influence of Rumi (1207–1273), a Persian Sufi and poet and the founder of the Mawlawiyyah Sufi order.²⁷ Like his two friends, Shaykh Baha'i was Gnostic and believed that intuitive knowledge was superior to discursive or rationalistic knowledge. Needless to say, these three thinkers played a remarkable role in the flourishing of the School of Isfahan. The theosophical activities of the school attracted many students from other cities in Persia; Mulla Sadra belonged to its second generation of students.

Mulla Sadra (Sadr al-Din Muhammad b. Ibrahim b. Yahya Shirazi Qawami), also known as Sadr al-Muta'allihin and Akhund, was born in Shiraz. Although the exact date of his birth is unknown he was probably born in 1572 because it is recorded that he died in 1640 at the age of seventy on his seventh pilgrimage to Mecca. He was buried in Basra, a city in southern Iraq. His father, Mirza Ibrahim b. Yhya Qawami, was a religious scholar and a Shiraz noble. He was also said to have held a ministerial post in the government of Fars province. Shiraz was the capital city of Fars, and, like Isfahan, was well known for its cultural and educational tradition. Mulla Sadra, being the only child of a wealthy, educated and politically powerful family, received the best education possible under the tutelage of his father. Later, after the death of his father in 1587, the adolescent decided to go to Isfahan to pursue his religious studies.²⁸ The intellectual life in Isfahan, in particular under the influence of Shaykh Baha'i and Mir Damad, enabled Mulla Sadra to develop a keen interest in philosophy and Gnosticism ('irfan'). He studied the transmitted sciences ('ulum al-naqliyyah') with Shaykh Baha'i and philosophy with Mir Damad.

According to Mulla Sadra's confession in al-Masha'ir, he was a follower of Suhrawardi's metaphysics and advocated the doctrine of the principality of essence.²⁹ His subsequent dissatisfaction with this philosophy, however, suggests that the foundation of his conviction was not firm. His philosophical interest changed from the primacy of essence to the primacy of being. He became more concerned with Ibn Sina's ontology, and later in his book Tarh al-kawnayn he engages himself with Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being.³⁰ But the change in Mulla Sadra's thinking was received with hostility by the 'ulama' in Isfahan. Some interpreted Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being as the identification of God with nature, or belief in an immanent God, contrary to the concept of the transcendent God accepted by the majority of Muslims. Also, the philosopher Ibn 'Arabi belonged to the Sunni theological tradition and was venerated by some Sunni Sufi orders, for example the Naqshabandiyyah, who were hostile towards Shi'ism. This may be seen as one of the reasons contributing to the marginalization of Ibn 'Arabi's theosophy by the Shi'i 'ulama' and to the condemnation of his metaphysical views as heretical.

For Ibn 'Arabi, the 'Unity of Being' means that there is only one Being, and existence is nothing but the manifestation or outward radiance of that One Being.³¹ In this regard, being rather than quiddity becomes the ruling principle of and reason for the existence of everything. Being is also one and manifests itself at all ranks of existence. Apparently, this multiplicity is not the negation of unity but gradations of the manifestation of the unity. William Chittick, in Ibn 'Arabi's Metaphysics of Imagination, tries to explicate the meaning of this doctrine, first by relating the 'Unity of Being' to 'the profession of God's Unity' (al-tawhid) in Islam, and second by making a distinction between this Sufi doctrine and pantheism in occidental philosophy. It is noteworthy that the concept of the unity of God (al-tawhid) is distinct in connotation from the concept of the Unity of Being (wahdat al-wujud). The latter identifies God with Being or renders God and Being as synonymous. The Qur'anic concept of the Unity of God does not mean that nothing other than God exists. It is a simple denial of the polytheism that was a common belief among some Arab tribes of the pre-Islamic period: 'Your God is One God. There is no god but He, the Compassionate, the Merciful';³² 'Allah bear witness that there is no god but He, and so do the angels and men of learning. He upholds justice. There is no god but He, the Mighty and Wise One.'³³ The statement "There is no God but Allah" (la ilaha ila Allah) vividly expresses the existence of one God. It stresses monotheism and rejects other deities beside Allah. The advocates of the Unity of Being altered the first part of this statement 'There is no God . . .' (la ilah) to 'There is no being . . .' (la maujud). The original Qur'anic verse is the denial of polytheism, and the Sufi version of the unity is an assertion that there is no existence except God, which is an emphasis on the immanence of God rather than His transcendence. Fariduddin al-Attar (1119–1230) illustrated this unity by the analogy of water, saying that: 'Water is water in the boundless ocean; and in the jug too it is the same water.'³⁴ Again for al-Attar, that which unites the multiple particularization of Reality is being and not quiddity. Likewise all the various gradations of being such as human beings, animals, trees and so on enjoy this unity. In Fusus al-Hikam, Ibn 'Arabi also considered God to be the totality of beings: 'God, by virtue of being, is the same as the things that are, because there is no existence other than His Being.'³⁵

William Chittick's distinction between the Unity of Being and pantheism in occidental philosophy is not convincing. In my opinion these two doctrines are similar in several ways. Both of them put away duality without insisting on the identification of God with the world. For Spinoza, one of the advocates of pantheism in the West, everything exists through the 'Substance', and beings are particularizations of the manifestation of the attributes of Substance. Meanwhile, Substance is, and at the same time is not, a being: 'God (Deus) I understand to be a being absolutely infinite, that is a substance consisting of infinite attributes, each of which expresses eternal and infinite essence.'³⁶ He adds: 'Whatever is, is in God, and nothing can exist or be conceived without God.'³⁷ Spinoza rejects the notion of transcendent God; for him, God's causality is immanent causality, in the sense that God is an indwelling power, but is not identical with his creation or gradations. It is true that Spinoza's concept of God as the only Reality (which is also the view of the advocates of the doctrine of the Unity of Being) can be mistaken for the identification of God with nature, but nature for Spinoza is one of the infinite attributes of God. Furthermore, Spinoza makes a distinction between natura naturans and natura naturata, an indication of a certain self-differentiation in God, implying two distinguishable though inseparable aspects of the same reality.³⁸

In the face of the hostility from the official 'ulama, Mulla Sadra was left with two options: to defend his philosophical position or to retreat from public life. He chose the second and in 1610 left Isfahan for isolation in Kahak, a village near Qum. According to Fazlur Rahman, there was more to this intense opposition and criticism. In fact, the 'ulama were offended by Mulla Sadra's philosophical ambition. This is shown by the apology offered by the publisher in the introduction to al-Asfar stating that the philosopher's ideas in the work represent nothing to do with religious essence.³⁹ It is also reported that Mulla Sadra was critical of the official 'ulama and attacked them for using their political position for worldly and material gains. He called them ignorant of the states and stations of the human soul. His relationship with and attitude towards the institution of the 'ulama can be described as aggressive and un-compromising.⁴⁰ He removed himself from public life for a decade, and focused on strengthening the foundation of his philosophical thought and spiritual life. This period of solitude and retreat from public life was the most fruitful time in the intellectual development of Mulla Sadra: 'He was, therefore, in search of a method that would give him certainty and would transform rational propositions into experienced truth.'⁴¹ His intellectual situation, as Fazlur Rahman describes it, was similar to that of al-Ghazali and also of Descartes (1596–1650) when the latter was writing the Meditations. The difference was in al-Ghazali's fierce opposition to philosophy and Descartes's reliance on rationalistic discourse. Mulla Sadra neither tried to base truth on dogmatic theology nor accepted the validity of rational principles beyond doubt and limitation. Not much is known about Mulla Sadra during his stay in Kahak, but it is obvious that, although he was forced to choose solitude, this period in his life was significant for the development of a new philosophical ground and for his breaking away from Suhrawardi's metaphysical tradition.⁴² He refers to this in al-Masha'ir, where he describes the shift from Suhrawardi's doctrine of the primacy of essence to the doctrine of the primacy of Being as turning away from the 'darkness of illusion' to the daylight:

In the past, I used to be firm on the defence of the principality of essence, making existence a [mentally dependent] abstract entity, until my God guided me and showed me his proof. It became clear to me that the issue is opposite of what has been conceived and determined. Thank God who took me out of the darkness of illusion through the light of comprehension, who removed from my heart the clouds of these doubts through the rise of the sun of truth, and who held me close to the true discourse in this life and the life after. Existences are genuine [determinate] realities and essences are the eternal 'thisnesses' which have never inhaled the perfume of real existence at all. These existences are merely the rays and reflected lights of The True Light and of the Eternal Existence. Exalted Be His Sublimity! However, each of them has essential predicates and contains intelligible concepts called essences.⁴³

This confession is the confirmation of Mulla Sadra's turn from the philosophical position of essentialism and his departure from Illuminationism, which affirms the primacy of essence and the nullity of being. It is the total conversion from the metaphysical position of Suhrawardi and his ishraqi followers to a position where being becomes primary. In this new philosophical position, essence rather than being is considered predicated or conceptual. This turn is seen by Mulla Sadra as a departure from the 'darkness of illusion' to the 'light of the day', which in my opinion has Platonic overtones. It resembles the journey of a liberated prisoner from the cave towards the light of the sun.

In 1625, at the age of fifty-three and having spent more than a decade in solitude, Mulla Sadra decided to return to his own city, Shiraz, on the request of the governor of Fars, Allahwirdi Khan (d. 1613) to teach in a religious school (madrasa) that he had recently established. The philosopher resumed teaching and writing and trained a number of notable disciples, among them 'Abdul Razzaq al-Husayn Lahiji and Muhammad al-Murthada, known also as Mulla Muhsin Fayd Kashani and Hakim Mulla Muhammad Aqa Jani. Lahiji is also known as Fayyadh. He married Um Kalthum, the eldest daughter of Mulla Sadra who was also a scientist and poetess. Lahiji studied in Mashad and travelled to Qum where he met Mulla Sadra and became his student. He has written on philosophy and theology. His main works include Shawariq al-ilham, Gohar murad, a commentary on Suhrawardi's al-Nur and Sharhi isharat. Faydh Kashani was an expert on Islamic jurisprudence, hadith (the Tradition of the Prophet Muhammad), Gnosticism and ethics. He also studied under the instruction of Mulla Sadra in Qum and travelled to Shiraz with his master and married his daughter (Zubaydah). Fayd Kashani returned to his own town, Kashan, where he established a school to teach philosophy and theology. He wrote Gnostic poems and a number of books in Arabic. Among them are Mafatih, al-Wafi, Usul al-ma'arif and al-Mahajj al-bayza. Mulla Muhammad Aqa Jani is known for his commentary on Mir Damad's book al-Qasabat.

Mulla Sadra's philosophical development can be divided into three periods: in the first period he studied in Isfahan with Shaykh Baha'i and Mir Damad and came under the influence of Illuminationism. Mulla Sadra describes this period in al-Asfar as a time of intensive research and investigation of the ideas of Greek philosophers, of Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic thinkers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, of Muslim philosophers from Spain (al-Andalus) represented by Ibn Bajja, Ibn Tufayl, Ibn Rushd and Ibn 'Arabi's theosophy, and of the wisdom of the Illuminationists.⁴⁴ In al-Masha'ir this period of his intellectual development is identified with disillusionment with the doctrine of the primacy of essence. It was also at this time that Mulla Sadra faced hostility from the 'ulama in Isfahan. The second period, in Kahak, is characterized by deep philosophical meditation and solitude. The third period was marked by his return to society and the commitment to write and teach in Shiraz, which he did until his death. Although these three periods are interconnected and equally important for understanding his philosophy, the second and the third represent Mulla Sadra's authentic way of understanding reality on a new philosophical ground and the maturity of his thinking. His metaphysical position designates not only a conversion but also a new beginning or a new episode in Islamic philosophical tradition in which 'Being' is not the needfulness of essence; rather, it is the ground without which nothing is thinkable.

Although no definitive chronological order has been established for Mulla Sadra's writings, a list of thirty-three treatises on religion and philosophy is provided by Shaykh Muhammad Rida al-Muzaffar in his introduction to Mulla Sadra's al-Asfar.⁴⁵ Nasr listed forty-six works of Mulla Sadra and six treatises whose authorship remains uncertain.⁴⁶ Professor S. M. Khamenei provided a list of thirty-nine works.⁴⁷ Abu Abdullah al-Zanjani also listed twenty-six philosophical works by Mulla Sadra in his Life and Main Philosophical Teaching of the Great Iranian Philosopher Sadr al-Din al-Shirazi.⁴⁸ Since Mulla Sadra's ontology is our primary interest, the present book deals with the writing of the third period of the philosopher's life. Nevertheless, it should be remembered that even his religious treatises, such as his commentaries on the Qur'anic verses, are related to his philosophical conviction. His major philosophical work and the fountainhead of his thought is Al-Hikma al-muta'aliyah fi al-asfar al-'aqliyyah al-arba'a, known also as al-Asfar (it is referred to in this book as al-Asfar).⁴⁹ This work was first published in four volumes in 1865, with a commentary by Mulla Hadi Sabzawari on three volumes. The most recent edition, by Rida Lutfi, was published in nine volumes in 1958. It was also published in Teheran with a Persian commentary by Ayatullah Abdulla Jawadi Amili in 1989. One of Mulla Sadra's early works before al-Asfar was Tarh al-kawnayn, which was written under the influence of Ibn 'Arabi's pantheistic philosophy and marked the beginning of Mulla Sadra's move away from Suhrawardi's philosophical tradition; this work was also branded as heretical by the institution of 'ulama in Isfahan. The book was later published under the title Risalat seryan al-wujud. Other important philosophical works include al-Masha'ir, which is a summary of Mulla Sadra's philosophical project in al-Asfar and was published in 1897. It was later published in Persian in 1964 by Dr Karim Mujtahidi, a professor at Teheran University, and was translated into English by Parviz Morewedge and published by the Society for the Study of Islamic Philosophy and Science (SSIP) in 1992. Other philosophical works, for example Al-Hikma al-'arshiyyah, al-Mazahir al-ilahiyyah fi asrar al-'ulum al-kemaliyyah, Risala fi al-haraka al jawheriyyah and al-Mabda' wa al-ma'ad, deal with various philosophical and theological issues. Mulla Sadra also wrote a treatise on subject-object dichotomy, Risala fi itihad al-'aql w al-ma'qul, and Hashiyyah 'ala sharih hikmat al-ishraq lil Suhrawardi. The latter was published in 1898. A treatise on Ibn Sina's philosophy, Sharih ilahiyyah al-shifa, was published in 1885. Mulla Sadra also wrote Mafatih al-ghayb, on metaphysics, cosmology and eschatology. Al-Mabda' wa al-ma'ad was revised and published by Jalal al-Din Ashtiani in Mashad in 1921. This book was also published in Tunisia in 1972 by Nur al-Din al-Ali, and by the Iranian Academy of Philosophy in Teheran in 1975. The book has two main sections: the knowledge of God and Resurrection. In the last part of the section on Resurrection under the title 'Prophecy', Mulla Sadra deals with the relationship between religion and politics. Al-Shawahid al-Rububiyyah is a summary of his teachings and was published for the first time in 1869. It is considered to be his last work.⁵⁰ The book was recently edited by Jalal al-Din Ashtyani and was published with Mulla Hadi Sabzawari's commentary in 1967. A collection of his treatises was published in 1996 under the title Majmu'a rasa'ile-falsafi Sadr al-muta'ahilin, with an introduction in Persian by Hamid Naji Isfahani. This collection includes important philosophical treatises by Mulla Sadra such as Risalat itihad 'aql e ma'qul, Risalat isalat ja'il al-wujud and Risalat shawahid al-rububiyyah.

Mulla Sadra's major philosophical work, Al-Hikma al-muta'aliyah fi al-asfar al-'aqliyyah al-arba'a, or al-Asfar (The Transcendent Philosophy Concerning the Four Intellectual Journeys of the Soul), stands as the most valuable philosophical product. It is a work that has remained unknown to a great extent in the West. This work not only contains Mulla Sadra's philosophical system but presents his rich understanding and evaluation of the earlier Muslim philosophical, theological and Sufi traditions. The title of this work indicates four intellectual journeys, which lead human existence from the lowest to the highest rank. These journeys complete one another and describe Mulla Sadra's philosophical system. The four intellectual journeys are:

- A journey from creation to the Truth or Creator
- A journey from the Truth to the Truth
- A journey that stands in relation to the first journey because it is from the Truth to creation with the Truth
- A journey that stands in relation to the second journey because it is from the Truth to the creation.

The first journey, from creation to the Creator, deals with general principles of philosophy or rather metaphysical questions in order to found the transcendent philosophy as a divine science. This journey also addresses philosophical issues such as the definition and meaning of philosophy, the primacy of Being over essence, the gradation of Being, the trans-substantial change (al-Haraka al-jawhariyyah), Platonic ideal forms, time, and the dichotomy of the subject-object relationship. The second journey represents Mulla Sadra's natural philosophy and his criticism of Aristotle's doctrine of the categories. It explains the existence of natural entities, matter and forms, substance and accident and the hierarchy of the natural beings in the world. It includes Mulla Sadra's views on the problem of the creation ex nihilo and the eternity of the world. It explores the views of the Greek philosophers such as Thales, Anaximenes, Empedocles, Pythagoras, Plato and Aristotle. At the end of this journey Mulla Sadra discusses the relationship between nature and its metaphysical principles. He advocates his own opinion of change as the continuous renewal of the world. In the third journey, Mulla Sadra constructs his own theological ideas or a divine science in a particular sense. It includes the nature of God's existence, divine unity and attributes, God's knowledge of the world, good and evil and the divine law. He also gives different proofs for the existence of God, God's knowledge of the world, the nature of divine will, and the role of love (ishq) in the evolutionary process of change. The fourth journey is the end of the intellectual progress of Mulla Sadra where he explains his own understanding of rational psychology and eschatology. It begins with a discussion on different types of the soul, the proofs for its existence, and the possibility of the separation of the soul from the corporeal world. Mulla Sadra also deals critically with the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul. He explains the condition of the human souls who reside in heaven and hell quoting from Ibn 'Arabi's al-Futuhat al-makiyyah at the end.

These four intellectual journeys in al-Asfar are not only descriptive of Mulla Sadra's philosophical ideas, but also critical of almost all views held by his predecessors. Fazlur Rahman describes this style of Mulla Sadra as hypercritical because all alternative solutions to the philosophical problems are rejected; meanwhile the new solutions he suggests seem not to be essentially different or in disagreement with those of his predecessors. For example, in his discussion on eschatology he rejects al-Ghazali's solution but his own solution on physical resurrection is not distinguishable from that offered by al-Ghazali. The only texts and thinkers that did not come under Mulla Sadra's critical scrutiny were the foundation texts of Islam, the views of the Shi'i imams, and Ibn 'Arabi.⁵¹

The third period of Mulla Sadra's intellectual development gave rise to a new type of ontology based on the doctrine of the primacy of Being. This ontology, although it had similarities with Ibn Sina's ontology and Ibn

'Arabi's theosophy, offered a new philosophical foundation distinct from that of Illuminationism. Although not recognized immediately by the intellectual circle of its time, Mulla Sadra's philosophical achievement gradually inscribed its effect in the Muslim philosophical tradition, particularly during the Qajar dynasty. Today it is almost impossible to understand the development of Muslim philosophy without understanding Mulla Sadra's ontological enterprise and his influence in the Persian-speaking world.

The influence of Mulla Sadra's transcendent philosophy and the doctrine of the primacy of Being was felt later in the post Isfahan era. This era is characterized by the political changes to Shi'ite Islamic power after the collapse of the Safawid dynasty in 1732 and the shift of the centre for Islamic philosophical studies from Isfahan, capital of the Safawids, to Teheran following the establishment of the Qajar in 1779 by Agha Muhammad Khan.⁵² The Safawid dynasty witnessed the culmination of the Shi'ite political and philosophical fusion, but it remained a target of sectarian antagonism by the Sunni neighbouring political hegemony and tribes. It is reported that Mir Vais, a Sunni Muslim leader of the Ghilzai tribe in Qandahar, travelled through Isfahan on his way to Mecca in 1707. He collected some material containing matters repugnant to Sunni Islam. After showing them to the Sunni 'ulama in Makkah he obtained a fatwa (religious verdict) from them authorizing jihad (holy war) against the Shi'ites and their dynasty in Isfahan. The holy war began with an attack on the Shi'ite minority in Qandahar and ended with the fall of Isfahan in 1722. In 1723 another fatwa was issued against the Shi'ites by the Shaykh al-Islam (of the chief 'ulama) in Istanbul,⁵³ in which it was stated that the blood of male Shi'ites was to be shed and even their women and children to be taken captive.⁵⁴ In 1743, in this hostile atmosphere, Nadir Shah tried to promote a revised form of Shi'ite Islam. He sponsored a meeting between Shi'ite and Sunnite 'ulama in Najaf and later succeeded in having the Shi'ites recognized as the followers of the Ja'afari School of law (mazhab), the fifth Islamic school of law, by the Ottoman empire. Unfortunately Nadir Shah was assassinated soon after this achievement.⁵⁵

The Qajar dynasty, unlike the Safawid, was characterized by constant internal tension between the political hegemony of the monarch and the institution of the 'ulama. The Qajar monarchs did not claim religious authority for themselves through alleged imamate descent. They, however, sought the favour of some 'ulama by patronizing the Shi'ite holy shrines of the imams and offering other services.⁵⁶ The Qajar monarchs' alienation of the official 'ulama from the political hegemony and the tenuous relationship between the state and religious authority made the 'ulama stronger as an opposition so that their religious actions were intensified politically in the community. Various religious schools were established for promoting religious studies. Sufi orders such as Shaykhism, Ni'mat Allahi, Zahabis and Khaksar gained popularity.⁵⁷ The Shaykhi order eventually became the birthplace of the Babi movement with its doctrine of the messianic return of the hidden imam, which later developed into Baha'ism.⁵⁸ The 'ulama stressed the external dimension and rituals of the faith in light of the instructions of the imams, while the Sufi movement justified the significance of the internal dimension of the faith, but again for its effectiveness turned to the teachings of the imams.

Parallel to this development in the Qajar period, the teaching of Mulla Sadra's philosophy added another element of diversity to the cultural progress of Shi'i Islam. The school of Isfahan, where Mulla Sadra studied under the direction of Mir Damad, Mir Findiriski and Shaykh Baha'i, was dominated by the 'Essentialism' of the ishraqi metaphysical tradition of Suhrawardi. By contrast, the philosophical school of Teheran flourished under the sway of Muslim 'Existentialism' or the metaphysical tradition of Mulla Sadra. This metaphysical tradition became 'central to the intellectual life of Qajar Persia and was of great importance not only for those who considered themselves as his followers, but even by those who opposed him, as is seen in the writings of Shaykh Ahmad Ahsa'i, the founder of the Shaykhi movement and Sayyid Muhammad the Bab, the founder of Babism.'⁵⁹ Although the school of Teheran was founded at the end of the eighteenth century with the advent of the Qajar dynasty, the teaching of Mulla Sadra's philosophy actually began with Mulla Ali Nuri (d. 1830–1831) in Isfahan, the former Safawid capital of Persia in the early Qajar period. Mulla Ali Nuri was a great Islamic scholar and his teaching of Mulla Sadra's philosophy in that city continued without opposition from the official 'ulama.⁶⁰ Ali Nuri also wrote commentaries on al-Asfar, al-Masha'ir and Sharh usul al-kafi. His pupils included Mulla Muhammad Isma'il Isfahani, Mulla Abdullah Zunuzi, and his son Mulla Ali Mudarris Zunuzi, Mulla Muhammad Ja'afar Langarudi, Mulla Isma'il Khajaw'i, and finally Mulla Hadi Sabzawari, who studied philosophy for seven years in Isfahan and was responsible for the revival of the Existentialist school of Mulla Sadra in the Qajar period.⁶¹ The philosophical school of Teheran, however, became the centre for studying Mulla Sadra's philosophy on one hand and Islamic esotericism or Gnosticism on the other. The latter was advocated by Sayyid Radi Larijani, known also as Malik a-Batini (the Professor of the Esoteric).⁶²

Mulla Sadra's philosophy was also taught on the Indian subcontinent for the first time by Muhammad Salih Kashani, a disciple of Mulla Sadra who migrated to India. Indian Muslim scholars such as Muhammad Amjad al-Sadiqi (d. 1727), Mulla Hasan Laknawi (d. 1783), Muhammad A'lam Sindili (d. 1834) and Abdul Ali Bahr al-'Ulum (died in the nineteenth century) wrote commentaries on the works of Mulla Sadra.⁶³ As mentioned earlier, one of the most influential figures in the promotion of the philosophy of Mulla Sadra during the Qajar dynasty was Mulla Hadi Sabzawari. This Muslim thinker was born in 1797 in Sabzawar in north-eastern Iran. He studied metaphysics, logic, mathematics and jurisprudence in Mashhad. He then moved to Isfahan to study philosophy with Mulla Isma'il Isfahani and Mulla Ali Nuri, the interpreter of Mulla Sadra's philosophy of that time. Although he studied with Mulla Ali Nuri for about three years, Sabzawari hints in his autobiography at "illuminati" rather than Mulla Sadra's philosophy as the motive behind his inclination for philosophy and traveling to Isfahan:

I spent a total of ten years in the pious circle of the late Mulla [Mulla Husayn Sabzawari in Mashhad], until the time that my passion for learning was intensified. From Isfahan the whisper of the 'illuminati' reached my heart, at a time when, by the grace of God, I found great pleasure as well as competence in theological studies. I then left Khurasan for Isfahan leaving behind a considerable amount of property and goods. I stayed there for eight years gaining, with God's aid, an ascetic temperament, free of excessive passions, as well as success in my studies of the sciences and the shari'a; however, I spent most of my time studying philosophy of the illuminations school. For five years I studied with that supreme doctor of theology (glory of truth seekers, shining light of savants and teachers, possessing the virtuousness of the divines – nay the virtues of God, that knower of the Truth), Akhund Mulla Isma'il Isfahani (may al-Sharif (God) sanctify his heart).⁶⁴

After the death of Mulla Isma'il Isfahani, Sabzawari studied with Mulla Ali Nuri: 'When I returned to Khurasan, I continued my studies of fiqh (jurisprudence) and tafsir (commentary) for five years, for scholars (there) favoured these two subjects and offered deep understanding of hikmat (philosophy). For this reason I rely mostly on hikmat, especially ishraqi (Illuminationism).'⁶⁵ After returning from pilgrimage to Mecca, Sabzawari spent the rest of his life in his own town teaching philosophy and theology. He soon earned a reputation as a great thinker of the Qajar dynasty; even Nasir al-Din Shah (the Qajar king who died in 1896) visited him in 1867. Sabzawari died in 1873 and was recognized as the founder of the Sabzawar philosophical school. He was called, as Henri Corbin states, 'the Plato of his time', and was also said to be its Aristotle.⁶⁶ One of the most famous philosophical works of Sabzawari is Ghurur al-Fara'id, in which he gives a systematic account of Mulla Sadra's existential philosophy together with Sharh al-manzumah in poetic verses. Mulla Sadra's doctrine of the primacy of Being, modalities and the systematic ambiguity of Being are discussed in the first part of this work. Sabzawari wrote three other commentaries on Al-Shawahid al-rububiyyah, al-Mabda' wa al-mi'ad and Mafatih al-ghayb. Another work, Asrar al-hikma, deals in detail with the origin of being, eschatology and the esoteric meaning of liturgical practices. At the request of Nasir al-Din Shah (the Qajar monarch) Sabzawari produced a summary of this work entitled Hidayat al-talibin.⁶⁷

In modern times, Sayyid Muhammad Husayn Tabatab'i (professor at the theological University of Qum) is considered to be one of the philosophers and Gnostic thinkers of Persia who were inspired by Mulla Sadra's philosophy. He was born in Tabriz in 1903 and died in 1981. He wrote numerous books, one being a new edition of Mulla Sadra's al-Asfar. Tabatab'i was also engaged in a philosophical debate with Henri Corbin from 1958 to 1977. These debates were arranged by Sayyid Hossein Nasr (1933–) and conducted before a small audience. Among those who attended were Ayatollah Mutahari and Sayyid Jalal al-Din Ashtiyani.⁶⁸ Many other Persian Muslim thinkers have followed Mulla Sadra's philosophy. Among them are Sayyid Abu al-Hasan Rafi'i Qazwini, Sayyid Jalal al-Din Ashtiyani (1925–), a professor of theology at Mashhad who edited Mulla Sadra's Al-Shawahid al-rububiyyah, al-Mazahir al-ilahiyyah and Sabzawari's Majmu'ai i-rasa'il, and Sayyid Muhammad Kazim 'Assar (1885–1975), professor of theology at the University of Teheran, Mahdi Illahi Qumsha'i, professor of philosophy at the University of Teheran, and 'Allamah Muhammad Salih Ha'iri Simnani.⁶⁹ At present, Sayyid Muhammad Khamenei, the director of Sadra Islamic Philosophy Research Institute in Teheran, and Gholam Hossein Ebrahimi Dinani, a professor of philosophy at the University of Teheran, are working on Mulla Sadra's philosophy. Mulla Sadra's philosophy is also studied widely at the universities and religious schools (madrassa) in Iran.

The Doctrine of the Primacy of Being: An Ontological Turn

As a dedicated and critical thinker, Mulla Sadra investigated deeply into almost the entire corpus of philosophical, theological and mystical Islamic thought. Under the influence of his teacher, Mir Damad, he became one of the followers of Illuminationism.¹ Like his teacher, he was also interested in Ibn Sina's ontology and studied Ibn 'Arabi's theosophy. Suhrawardi, Ibn Sina and Ibn 'Arabi had a notable impact on Mulla Sadra's thinking and played a significant role in facilitating his ontological turn from the doctrine of the primacy of essence to the primacy of being and in his development of a new ontological system. Mulla Sadra's ideas were formed in the matrix of the dominant philosophy of Suhrawardi in the school of Isfahan. As discussed previously in Chapter Two, Suhrawardi held the metaphysical view that being was a mere mental concept and that essence was the only reality. Human knowledge of an object was also possible only through the revealing of its essence. A relationship was suggested between Suhrawardi's Illuminationism and Plato's metaphysics; this relationship was seen as important in comparing Mulla Sadra's ontology with that of Heidegger.

From the second period of his intellectual development, Mulla Sadra began to express dissatisfaction with the metaphysics of Illuminationism, in particular with the doctrine of the primacy of essence and declared, on the contrary, the doctrine of the primacy of Being. This ontological turn could not have occurred without the influence of Ibn Sina and Ibn 'Arabi. Mulla Sadra's teacher, Mir Damad, also tried to combine Suhrawardi's ishraqi thought with the Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophy of Ibn Sina. The philosophical tradition of the Isfahan school could not be characterized by blind imitation of Suhrawardi's Illuminationism. There was an inclination towards newly creative ideas and an attempt to amalgamate Suhrawardi's thought with that of Ibn Sina. Mulla Sadra, however, crossed the boundary set by the official interpretation of Islamic thought when he expressed his interest in Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the Unity of Being (wahdat al-wujud). In addition to the influence of this doctrine, another visible influence on Mulla Sadra was the psychological-eschatological role of the realm of images. In this realm, according to Ibn 'Arabi, images are as real as they are perceptible. The images in the human soul in the hereafter, since they are not attached to material objects, are more vivid and real than the images in the material world. This idea was used by Mulla Sadra to prove his view on bodily resurrection in his eschatological doctrine.²

For Ibn Sina, existence and essence were both real. Existence was of two kinds: necessary and contingent. He illustrated the difference between them in two ways. First, the necessary being is dependent on itself to exist and its existence is inseparable from its essence, or rather it is pure existence. By contrast, contingent beings are not self-dependent and derive from necessary beings. Their essences are also separable or are additional to them.³ Following Ibn Sina's ontological division and his distinction between existence and essence, the problem of whether existence or essence constitutes reality emerged in subsequent philosophical debates among Muslim thinkers. Suhrawardi, as one of the followers of Platonism, argued against Ibn Sina's ontology and insisted on the non-reality of existence and advocated the idea that essence was the only reality.⁴ Mulla Sadra contradicted Suhrawardi's doctrine and rejected the Platonic-Illuminationist metaphysical view that nothing in the real world corresponds to existence or nothing exists but ideas or essence. He, on the contrary, believed that nothing is real but existence.

In seeking to clarify the similarities between Mulla Sadra and Heidegger in relation to the doctrine of Being, it is important to note three points:

- Mulla Sadra and Heidegger stress the principality of Being and the reality of Being as a pre-ontological condition for the existence of all beings.
- Both thinkers argue against Plato's metaphysics, which reduces everything to ideas or their essences.
- They hold the view that Aristotle's logic and rationalist cognition are incapable of revealing the meaning of Being. As a result, a new cognitive instrument is required to apprehend the meaning of Being.

Mulla Sadra conceived of no more difficult task than marking a departure from the dominant philosophical tradition of his time and developing a new ontological system capable of rendering being meaningful. The task could be accomplished, however, by being essentially critical as well as creative through challenging Illuminationism. A new philosophical beginning was required, which should begin with a shift to the doctrine of the primacy of Being. In Chapter Three the shift in the direction of his thought from the second period of his intellectual development was described as a 'turn' from the core elements of Suhrawardi's metaphysics which neglected fundamental philosophical questions in favour of investigating the nature of something less fundamental or grounded that could not exist by itself. Heidegger, in Being and Time (1927), similarly sought a new ontological system based on understanding of the meaning of Being as the most fundamental philosophical concern. In order to prove this, Heidegger argues that the post Aristotelian thinkers accepted the dogma of negligence or the abandonment of Being. They withdrew themselves from the genuine philosophical question about the meaning of Being, for three reasons. First, they thought that Being was the most universal concept, and that its universality 'transcended' any universality of genus. Second, since Being is the most universal concept, and is not an entity, it is therefore indefinable and escapes all attempts to define it in accordance with the rules of 'definition' provided in Aristotelian logic. Third, Being is self-evident.⁵ Heidegger rejects these three presuppositions and argues against the post Aristotelian thinkers that the universality of the concept of Being does not guarantee the clarity of its meaning, and that the meaning of this concept is still the darkest of all. He also, like Mulla Sadra, says that Being is not an entity and is thus indefinable, and that Aristotle's definition by genus and difference, 'definitio fit per genus proximum et differentiam specificam' or connotative definition, which is the most important kind of definition, is not applicable to it but appropriate only for defining beings. Heidegger also believes that the indefinableness of Being does not invalidate the question of its meaning, and should not hinder us from investigating that meaning:

Being cannot be derived from higher concepts by definition, nor can it be presented through lower ones. But does this imply that 'Being' no longer offers a problem? Not at all. We can infer only that 'Being' cannot have the character of an entity. Thus we cannot apply to Being the concept of 'definition' as presented in traditional logic, which itself has its foundations in ancient ontology and which, within certain limits, provides a quite justifiable way of defining 'beings'. The indefinability of Being does not eliminate the question of its meaning; it demands that we look that question in the face.⁶

To clarify Mulla Sadra's view on the indefinableness of Being, Mulla Hadi Sabzawari states that even the positive attributes by which we try to define Being will neither render a definition nor a description, because whatever attribute is employed is not applicable to this reality. Sabzawari's argument is based on the notion of the 'simplicity' of Being. Since Being is simple, it has no differentia or genus on which its definition will become possible. Attaching positive attributes to Being cannot be a description because Being has no accidental properties to ascribe to it.⁷ As a result, Sabzawari suggests that the meaning of Being will be understood through negative attributes. Being, for example, is neither a substance nor an accident. Substance is essence and since it has no substratum cannot be an accident. Another way of understanding the meaning of Being is that Being has neither an opposite nor anything with similarity, because Being has no genus or differentia. It is not distinct or different from anything. That is why there is nothing to be opposed to it. Because Being also has no essence to share with another being, it is not possible to think of anything similar to Being. We can also say that Being is not a part and has no parts.⁸ The negative attributes listed here reveal some aspects of the nature of Being; but again, like positive attributes, these are neither definitions nor descriptions of Being.

Mulla Sadra describes the metaphysics of Suhrawardi in his book al-Masha'ir (the illusion of darkness, or the concealment of the truth):

Existences are genuine [determinate] realities and essences are the eternal 'thisnesses' which have never inhaled the perfume of real existence at all. These existences are merely the rays and reflected lights of the True Light and of the Eternal Existence—Exalted Be His Sublimity! However, each of them has essential predicates and contains intelligible concepts called essences.⁹

The 'darkness of illusion' is indicative of Suhrawardi's metaphysics. It is the state of untruth that reigns over the whole of reality in such a way that the meaning of Being remains unattainable and concealed. For Heidegger, the 'darkness of illusion' is the 'abandonment of Being', which led to 'nihilism' in the occidental thought of Plato, whom Suhrawardi considered the master of Illuminism, and finally of Nietzsche. It represents a history of negligence of the most fundamental philosophical question. In An Introduction to Metaphysics Heidegger states:

Where is nihilism really at work? Where men cling to familiar essents and suppose that it suffices to go on talking about essents as essents, since after all that is what they are. But with this they reject the question of being and treat being like a nothing (nihil) which in a certain sense it is, insofar as it has an essence. To forget being and cultivate only the essent – that is nihilism . . . By contrast, to press inquiry into being explicitly to the limits of nothingness to draw nothingness into the question of being – this is the first and only fruitful step toward a true transcending of nihilism.¹⁰

In Contributions to Philosophy (Enowning) Heidegger explains this metaphysical position in detail and points out four forms of nihilism: actual nihilism, the greatest nihilism, the most disastrous nihilism, and finally crude nihilism.¹¹ These forms of nihilism have no historical sequence as any one can emerge in one historical epoch together with the abandonment of Being. Nihilism is also described as the epoch of total lack of questioning in which problems will pile up and rush around, those types of 'questions', which are not really questions, because their response dare not have anything binding about them, insofar as it immediately becomes a problem again. This says exactly and in advance that nothing is immune to dissolution and that deconstruction [Auflösung] is only a matter of numbers regarding time, space, and force.¹²

The reconstruction of new metaphysical thought based on the principality of Being means destroying the foundation of nihilism; this should be the priority of this project for Mulla Sadra as well as for Heidegger. Ontology needs to become the foundation of philosophical thinking; even philosophy has to be defined as an inquiry into the meaning of Being: 'Initially and throughout the long history between Ahaximander and Nietzsche, inquiring into being is only a question concerning the being of beings.’¹³ Both Mulla Sadra and Heidegger developed, by revolting against the dominant Platonic tradition, a new ontology at two different times and against two different cultural backgrounds. At the end of this revolt, Suhrawardi for Mulla Sadra and Nietzsche for Heidegger represent the final stage in the development of an antagonistic metaphysical tradition. The ‘darkness of illusion’ or ‘abandonment of Being’ is not simply an effacement for these two thinkers, but a serious philosophical problem that reigns over the whole domain of thinking in such a way that the truth of Being recedes into the darkness or, as Heidegger states, into the ‘disintegration of truth’ and finally the thinking of Being as essence.¹⁴ Beginning with Plato, Being was understood as ‘Idea’ and was interpreted as mere representation in the domain of thinking. As a consequence, in Plato’s metaphysics, the Being of beings as a whole was relegated to darkness. In Heidegger’s view, the concealment of truth about the reality of Being in the history of occidental thought from the time of Plato is like ‘the process in which the light of a star that has been extinguished for millennia will gleam but its gleaming nonetheless remains a mere appearance’.¹⁵ Overcoming this type of metaphysics is possible only by turning to, and not in a mere conversion of, the metaphysics of Being by positing the most fundamental philosophical question concerning the meaning of Being and its principality. It is possible to turn to the metaphysics of Being, as described by Heidegger in Being and Time and Contributions to Philosophy, by making Being the grounding question and by allowing the re-emergence of the truth of Being as the only inner reality of all ontic beings. For Mulla Sadra, as he writes in al-Masha’ir, this is a departure from the ‘darkness of illusion’ to the daylight of the Truth.

The theme of ontology in Mulla Sadra’s philosophy is the sum of the multiplicities of being grounded on the principle of unity. In this kind of system, in which unity and multiplicity are taken into consideration, the relation of unity to multiplicity and of identity to difference is decisive. In this system of ontology, the principal reality, Being, unlike Plato’s universal Forms in the ideal world, is not multiple. It is a unity or identity manifesting itself in multiple gradations (difference). In this case this unity in multiplicity or identity in difference is best understood in the light of Hegel’s dialectic logic rather than Aristotle’s, because it is not abstract identity. It is not a simple unity of Being with itself but a relation to itself. By virtue of this relation of identity, beings or the multiple modalities of Being exist, and Being becomes the unified ground for them. In identity, Being and the modalities of Being belong together. This metaphysical principle is one of the most general and encompassing determinations on which all modalities of Being depend. Precisely, it indicates that Being functions as the foundation on which we can grasp the nature of the relationship between unity and multiplicity. It shows that unity and multiplicity are two different aspects of the same reality. Unity contains multiplicity and vice versa. But taking Being as a unified ground of grounded multiplicity resembles to a great extent Aristotle's understanding of Being in the Metaphysics. For Aristotle, general ontology must study unity and its varieties. He insists that there is a unity beneath the diversity of phenomenal objects and that unity is Being qua being. There is also a single science known as 'general ontology', which investigates Being as well as its varieties. But the difference between Aristotle and Mulla Sadra arises with the doctrine of the categories and the rationalistic apprehension of this unified ground or Being qua being. Aristotle listed ten categories, of which the most fundamental was substance. The other categories, such as quality, quantity, relation, place, time, posture, state, action and passion, are dependent on substance to exist and cannot be by themselves. Meanwhile, these categories are classes or genera and their applications render our knowledge of the phenomenal world possible.¹⁶ In Mulla Sadra's ontology, Being, as the principle of the unity beneath the multiplicity of the phenomenal objects, is beyond the domain of the applicability of these categories. Hence Being remains indefinable. It is not a genus, differentia, species or a common and specific accident. In this case, understanding the meaning of Being cannot be based on anything other than itself:

It [existence] cannot be described [defined], because description is due to either a definition or a [distinguishing] mark. Thus, it cannot be described by definition. Since it has neither a genus nor differentia, it does not have a definition. Nor can it [be described] by a distinguishing mark, since its understanding cannot be supplied by anything more manifest and prevalent than it. It is a mistake to attempt to describe existence, for it would need to be described by something more hidden than the [entity] itself – unless the aim were to [approach it by] either an indication or a notification, or some description; the latter is merely a syntactical [lit. linguistic] inquiry.¹⁷

Being is then not conditioned by any sort of determination and limitation. If it is defined it is limited and conditioned by its determinations, for every affirmation is a negation. Kant, in the second and third part of the Critique of Pure Reason, draws a similar conclusion. He limits the application of the categories to the multiple forms of the phenomenal world, and the 'thing-in-itself' or noumenon is kept beyond the applicability of the categories of human understanding and hence remains unknowable. These two conclusions look similar as each recommends the employment of the categories for revealing beings rather than their inner reality; but Mulla Sadra and Heidegger disagree with Kant on the unknowability of reality. For them, the shortcoming in the application of the categories to the realm of Being does not hinder an investigation into the meaning of Being. The unknowability and indefinability of Being, as indicated here, refer to the inherent shortcoming of Aristotle's logic and rationalistic apprehension, which becomes an explicit problem in the epistemological inquiry of Kant. Nevertheless, this shortcoming does not negate the task of ontological inquiry. Mulla Sadra and Heidegger searched for a new epistemological tool and methodology that was different from the Aristotelian form of cognition. Mulla Sadra, in particular, relied on intuitive knowledge or knowledge by presence for investigating the meaning of Being. It is a cognitive tool associated with the mystic way of apprehending the reality:

As it has been stated, the reality of existence is neither genus, nor species, nor accident, since it is not a natural universal. Instead, its inclusion happens in another mode of inclusion, and no one has gnosis of it except the mystics; i.e. those who are firmly grounded in mystical knowledge. Sometimes it is interpreted as the spiritual soul [i.e., Holy Spirit], other times as the grace 'which extendeth to all things'. Sometimes [it is interpreted as the] 'Reality from which beings have been created', according to the mystics. [Also, it is] the expansion of the light of existence to the structures [lit. figures] of contingent beings, and the essences which are receptive to it; finally, [they speak of] its descent towards the abodes of inner-natures.¹⁸

For Heidegger, the universality of Being is also not a natural universal like the universality of 'whiteness'. Its universality 'transcends' any universality of genus. Those who follow Aristotle's rule for definition arrive at a negative conclusion in defining Being, simply because Being is not a genus and has no differentia. But does this mean that no further attempt should be made to understand the meaning of this indefinable reality? Indeed, if the horizon of thinking is limited by Aristotle's doctrine of the task and application of the categories, the answer to this question is in the affirmative. Mulla Sadra and Heidegger, although inspired by Aristotle's ontology, denounced his logic and his rationalistic apprehension of Being. An inquiry into the meaning of Being is not in the scope of rational epistemology or regional ontology, because Being is distinct from beings. Similar to Aristotle's First Principle, it is a prior condition not only for beings but also for all scientific inquiries, yet it cannot be studied scientifically. 'Fundamental ontology', which takes Being into account, is substantially distinctive and its subject matter is neither this nor that kind of being but Being per se: 'Basically, all ontology, no matter how rich and firmly compacted a system of categories it has at its disposal, remains blind and perverted from its own most aim, if it has not adequately clarified the meaning of Being, and conceived this clarification as its fundamental task.'¹⁹ Mulla Sadra also believes that the question of the meaning of Being becomes a prior condition and the foundation of all kinds of scientific discourse and knowledge:

The question of existence is the foundation of the principles of wisdom, the basis of philosophical theology, and the nexus of [concern] of those in the circle [lit. the millstone; i.e., the centre] of the sciences of unity, the resurrection of souls and bodies, and of much else that only we have developed and articulated. It gives them a synthesis [lit. a unity] through its explication. Anyone who is ignorant of the gnosis of existence is also ignorant of the major subjects and most significant quests and misses the refinements of gnosis and its subtleties, the science of the divine and the prophets, the gnosis of the soul, and its connection and return to the [primordial] source and destiny [i.e., telos].²⁰

As discussed earlier in Chapter Two, in Hikmat al-Ishraq, Suhrawardi acknowledges his debt to Plato and considers him to be one of his spiritual masters and a great Illuminationist sage and thinker. However, Mulla Sadra's attack on Suhrawardi's philosophy is a direct criticism of Platonism.²¹ In addition, while Mulla Sadra and Heidegger came from different cultural backgrounds, the similarity in their thought is within the framework of their ontology and criticism of Platonism; that is, represented by Illuminationism of Suhrawardi in Persia and the nihilism of occidental thought. These two philosophical traditions, one Eastern and one Western, belong to Platonism, which has led to the 'abandonment of Being'. They stand in opposition to the type of metaphysics founded and advocated by Mulla Sadra and Heidegger.

The new ontological enterprise of Mulla Sadra is explained in the first journey of al-Asfar and is continued in al-Masha'ir and al-Shawahid al-Rububiyyah. Mulla Sadra was convinced that Being is self-evident; in al-Masha'ir, in the Third Prehension, under the title 'An Analysis of the [Extra-Mental] Existence Having a Determinate [Concrete, Fully Determined] Status', he tried to prove the principality of Being in eight ways or by eight arguments that he called evidences.

The First Evidence

'The reality of anything is its existence, which ranks with its effects and implications. Existence, therefore, must be the most real of all things for it is the possessor of reality, because whatever possesses reality possesses reality only due to it.'²² Being in this evidence becomes an a priori ontological condition for the existence of all things. Everything finds its way into the light of being or the objective reality only through Being and by relying on Being rather than its essence.

The Second Evidence

In this evidence, Mulla Sadra states that when the principality or the reality of essence is affirmed there will be no distinction between external and mental realities, but that 'this however is absurd'. He also states that if something exists in the external world or intellectually, it does not signify that these two domains (external and intellectual) stand for that thing as containers in which the existence of that thing is established. It simply means that it has an existence from which some effects and consequences are derived.²³

The Third Evidence

If the reality of things is in their essences, then it is impossible to predicate essences of one another. Predication is the union of two concepts. This implies that when one thing is predicated of another, the two will be united in existence but be different from one another in their essences:

If things exist by their essences and not by the [mediation] of something else, it would not be possible to predicate them on each other, such as 'Zaid is an animal' or 'Man walks'. It is so, because the use and the truth of predication is a union between different concepts in existence. Thus the judgment made of something predicated on something else is an expression of their unity in existence, though they be diverse as concepts and in terms of their essences.²⁴

If the reality of a thing is its essence, then there will be no distinction between a subject and its predicate on the bases of unity and diversity.

The Fourth Evidence

Here Mulla Sadra supposes that if Being is non-existent then nothing has existed. Since the non-existence of things is false, the non-existence of existence is necessarily false. Also, if we think of essence as not in a union with existence, then it is non-existent in any mode. If there is no existence, then the predication of an essence is impossible, as affirming a predicate presupposes the existence of the subject. The adjunction of a non-existent thing to another non-existing thing has no validity.²⁵

The Fifth Evidence

This evidence is another version of the previous evidence. Before, Mulla Sadra states that without Being nothing can exist; here he holds the view that if Being has no concrete form or external actualization, then no species will have particulars or individuals: 'If existence is not realized in the individuals of a species, no one of the [individuals of the species] is realized in the external realm.'²⁶ For the actualization of an individual a species is required, which also relies on existence to be, and nothing (for example, another universal concept) other than existence can qualify as a necessary condition for this purpose.

The Sixth Evidence

Again, in proving the principality of Being, Mulla Sadra argues that there are two kinds of accidents: accidents of existence such as ‘whiteness’ for a body, and accidents of essence such as differentia for a genus. Some thinkers believe that the qualification of essences by existence, and the presentation of existence to the essences, is not a case of an external type of qualification or an occurrence of an accident to its subject, because this implies that the object of qualification enjoys a certain degree of reality. The occurrence of accidents of essences (differentia to genus) does not contradict their unity in the real world. This can be held true for the relationship between existence and essence. Existence as an accident of essence must be united with it, and this implies that existence as an objective reality should be realized: ‘Existence, therefore, must be something by the mediation of which an essence exists and with which it is united in [the externally determined realm of] existence.’²⁷

The Seventh Evidence

In this evidence, the reality of existence is explained through the relationship of an accident with its subject. It is believed that the existence of an accident is nothing in itself but is something for its subject; that is, the existence of an accident is ‘identical with its incarnation [i.e., instantiation] in its subject’.²⁸ This incarnation of an accident in its subject takes place in the real world. It is also clear that the subject of an accident is not included in its essence or its definition but in its existence. The category of accident depends on something other than itself, namely a subject, to be manifest. Keeping this in mind, we can conclude that if existence (the subject) is not real, then the accident is a mental concept. The existence of blackness, for example, would be a concept rather than an incarnation in a body, which is an actual base for the meaning of blackness. This also leads to the denial of the separation of existence from essence in the realm of accident, whereas the reality of this separation has already been agreed upon.²⁹

The Eighth Evidence

Again, if existence is a mental concept and not real, as stated by Suhrawardi and other ishraqi thinkers, then ‘an infinite number of species could be realized between any two limits’. There would be no specific number of specific essences, and no specific number of species would be realized between any two limits of intensity, which is necessarily false. According to Mulla Sadra, the doctrine of the primacy of Being offers a solution to this problem, because it advocates the idea that the structure of all essences stands on the foundation of a single unity (i.e., Being) and one incessant form. In this incessant form, the unity of being is actual and its multiplicities will be in the potential mode without opposing or negating one another.³⁰

It is worth mentioning that these evidences do not explain the meaning of Being but only its principality. Being, which reflects the reality of all things, cannot be known rationally or conceptually. It can only be experienced intuitively. Mulla Hadi Sabzawari also restated these evidences of Mulla Sadra for the primacy of Being, but reduced them to six. According to Dinani, there is a slight difference between Sabzawari and Mulla Sadra in the evidences. In reality, the material used by the former is same as that developed by the latter.³¹ Sabzawari also presented six arguments to prove the validity of Mulla Sadra's doctrine of the primacy of Being; some of them are not significantly different from those of Mulla Sadra's evidences. In the first argument, Sabzawari insists that the self-evidence of Being becomes the fountainhead of all values in human life because values are not attributed to concepts, which are mentally posited. The second argument is the realization of the distinction between external and internal (mental) modifications of Being: 'So if existence is not realized, and if what were realized were quiddity – and quiddity is kept in both modes of being without any difference – there would be no distinction between the external and the mental. But since this consequence is absurd, the antecedent must also be the same.'³² The third argument deals with the priority of cause to its effect in relation to the reality of Being. The cause, as we know, necessarily precedes the effect logically as well as in time. If we suppose that Being, as stated by the ishraqi thinkers, is not real but is mentally posited, then a specific quiddity of fire as a cause would be prior to the specific quiddity of fire as the effect, which becomes posterior. In this manner the generic quiddity of a substance as a cause would be prior to a posterior substance, which is caused by the former. This will necessitate a priority–posteriority relationship in the quiddities. In the doctrine of the primacy of Being, Being is considered to be real, and things, which are prior or posterior, are quiddities; yet only Being can confirm their priority or posteriority.

Arguments four and six of Sabzawari are similar. Each deals with the reality of Being as a unity beneath the scattered quiddities and multiplicities of beings. In the fourth argument, the primacy of Being is established on the gradual increase in the evolutionary movement of the world. This movement, in which various species with quiddities are posited, is both continuous and infinite. If the philosophical position of Illuminationism is true and Being is mental, then the species will be bound by the beginning and the end, because Being is one and many in accordance with the things from which the concept of being is abstracted. In this case, Being will not be present as a single reality and unity and the quiddities will be dispersed without a connection among them.³³ The sixth argument takes Being as uniting the multiplicity in the phenomenal world of beings. It argues that Being should be fundamentally real in order to be a unitary ground for all beings.³⁴ In the fifth argument, Sabzwari says that if Being is a mental reality, then ‘what could have made the quiddities leave the state of equality, and by what have they come to deserve the predicate “existence”?’³⁵

Being is the primordial reality on which everything stands; but the reality of all things cannot be described in common language as something that exists, because it is not an ontic existent but the Being of beings or ontological reality. It is simply existence par excellence.³⁶ What is real in everything is its being rather than its essence. In this sense, Being is equivocal, not univocal. It is a common characteristic of all things or the Being of them but with different intensity and weakness. The Being of beings and beings are not two different realities, but one and the same. The reality of Being is, therefore, objective or an ontological reality of all beings. It is what constitutes the very Being of everything. For Mulla Sadra, Being, unlike beings, and unlike the view of al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, is not something accidental occurring to its essence. Accidents are caused but Being is uncaused and nothing is prior to it. If we think of Being as something accidental, then it should have a cause. The cause must also be prior to it. If a being that is caused by another being is unified with it, the being that is caused is prior to itself as a cause, or is causa sui, which will lead to an infinite regress.³⁷

Since Being is not this or that ontic being, it has no describable property. Its abode is not the mind but outside the human mind; it has a dynamic character that creates all modalities of ontic beings, which results in the rise of essences in thinking. Essence, by contrast, is a mental factor and exists for the mind when beings are comprehended.³⁸ Although Being is that reality without which nothing is possible, its meaning is still obscure. It requires further investigation for Mulla Sadra as well as Heidegger. But in my opinion, Heidegger’s understanding of the meaning of Being is beset with ambiguity. It is for this reason that Heidegger’s commentators have discussed and understood the meaning of Being in different ways. Kockelmans interprets Heidegger’s Being as a process, an activity in which its self-manifestation becomes a truth:

As the clearing process which sheds light on itself and on beings by the very fact that it illuminates everything, Being may thus be correctly called truth. Yet the term truth here obviously does not mean “agreement”; rather, it means clearing, illumination, original self-manifestation, the emergence of Being and of all beings.³⁹

Kockelmans is convinced that Being, like the Geist in Hegel’s philosophy, is a dynamic ontological reality, which has the character of a happening that comes to manifest itself as a truth.

This interpretation can be supported by Heidegger's own understanding of the meaning of Being in On the Essence of Truth (1930), in which he states: 'The primordial disclosure of being as a whole, the question concerning beings as such, and the beginning of Western history are the same; they occur together in a "time" which, itself immeasurable, first opens up the open region for every measure.'⁴⁰ The interpretation by Kockelmans becomes adequate and reasonable when Heidegger's understanding of 'Time' and 'Temporality' is taken into account: 'In contrast to all this, our treatment of the question of meaning of Being must enable us to show that the central problematic of all ontology is rooted in the phenomenology of time, if rightly seen and rightly explained, and we must show how this is the case.'⁴¹ If Being is conceived in terms of time, then it should be dynamic and eventful; it only becomes concealed in this temporal character and its concealment is an active process through the ecstatic projection of Dasein. Dreyfus rejects Kockelmans's interpretation. He does not believe that Heidegger regards Being as a process or a happening: 'Heidegger must have been aware of this danger, since at the point where he says being is not an entity, he writes in the margin of his copy of Being and Time, "No! One cannot make sense of being with the help of these sorts of concepts". To think of being in terms of concepts like entity, or process, or event is equally misleading.'⁴² Richardson takes the view that in the early works of Heidegger, 'Being' and the world were considered to be equivalent.⁴³ At the same time he suggests that, in Kant and the Problem of Metaphysics (1929), Being is understood as the pure horizon of meaning, within which the process of the clearing described by Kockelmans takes place.⁴⁴ The notion of 'Pure', which is mentioned here and is used again by Heidegger in 'Letter on Humanism', can be understood in the Kantian sense. In the Critique of Pure Reason, Kant presents a list of pure categories of understanding within which all material collected by sensibility (Anschauung) becomes thought and acquires meaning.⁴⁵ For example, the sensuous notions of colour, taste and odour can be kept in the pure category of 'Quality'. Quality is called pure because it is independent of all empirical experiences. It is neither redness nor sweetness, but a category transcending all empirical notions.

When we say that Being is pure, we simply mean that Being transcends all empirical beings, and that the possibility of understanding the meaning of an empirical entity is conditioned by understanding the meaning of Being. Zimmerman has another interpretation: Being for Heidegger is history shaping ways in which beings can reveal themselves and become real.⁴⁶ Okrent tried to connect this 'shaping ways of Being in history' with the pragmatic signification of each kind of being that shows itself to us.⁴⁷ On the question of Being (Seinfrage), Heidegger claims that the question of the meaning of Being constitutes a philosophical inquiry about the meaning of what is asked about. It presupposes guidelines or knowledge, which are already available to us in some way or another. But raising this question is an indication of our intellectual dissatisfaction with available guidelines, and available knowledge. Being, at this stage, is known and yet not known, or it is obscure and concealed.

Heidegger explicitly states that the subject matter of this inquiry is the Being of beings, which is not an entity.⁴⁸ One cannot think of Being as an entity like a tree, a table, a horse or a mountain, and hence it cannot be grasped in terms of empirical concepts; meanwhile, it is also not the summum genus of Aristotle's First Philosophy. For this reason, Being is transcendent and a presupposition, for nothing can be presented to us without having been articulated in its Being.⁴⁹ As a consequence of this, in order to understand an entity, we need to look into its Being. Our philosophical knowledge is incomplete without apprehending the meaning of its Being. By saying that Being is not an entity, we draw an ontological distinction between Being and beings, but at the same time Being cannot be distinct because no entity can exist without it. In 'Letter on Humanism', Heidegger raises another meaning of Being, defining it as power: 'As the element, Being is the "quiet power" of favouring-enabling, that is, of the possible'.⁵⁰ He also tries to use Hölderlin's elegy "Homecoming" to interpret the meaning of Being. Finally, in An Introduction to Metaphysics, Heidegger states,

All things we have named are, and yet, when we wish to apprehend beings, it is always as though we were reaching into the void. The being after which we inquire is almost like nothing, and yet we have always rejected the contention that the essent in its entirety is not. But Being remains indefinable, almost like nothing or ultimately quite so.⁵¹

Elsewhere, Heidegger takes the view that our attempts to understand the meaning of Being are futile because Being is inaccessible and its meaning cannot be apprehended completely. The reason for this lies in the way Being reveals itself to Dasein:

Manifestly, it is something that proximally and for the most part does not show itself at all: it is something that lies hidden, in contrast to that which proximally and for the most part does show itself; but at the same time it is something that belongs to what thus shows itself, and it belongs to it so essentially as it constitutes its meaning and its ground.⁵²

In this paragraph, Heidegger clearly states that the meaning of Being is completely inaccessible, because it 'for the most part does not show itself at all'. This hiddenness of Being is not something insignificant or temporary that will not influence our philosophical understanding of reality; rather, it is essential and constitutes its meaning. The hiddenness of Being cannot be neglected, but at the same time we find ourselves helpless in our search for its meaning as the greatest part of it 'does not show itself at all'. In addition to this hiddenness, Being can be obscured. Further, a phenomenon that is uncovered at some point can deteriorate to the point of being obscured again. This deterioration or recovering of Being leads to disguise: 'and the most dangerous, for here the possibilities of deceiving and misleading are especially stubborn'.⁵³ Despite the perplexity of this issue, Heidegger suggests that the meaning of Being can be revealed in an existential analysis of an entity that has an ontic–ontological significance. That entity is the being of Dasein and has the power to question the meaning of its own being and Being as such. This inquiry into the meaning of Being, unlike Mulla Sadra's ontological inquiry, begins with a particular type of being. The hermeneutic circle of this inquiry moves from a part to the whole, or, more specifically, from the being of a particular entity, namely Dasein, to Being in general. This can be seen as the line of demarcation between the ontological inquiries of Mulla Sadra and Heidegger. No matter how similar the two inquiries are, they still differ in methodology and metaphysical conclusions. For Heidegger, the existential analysis of the being of Dasein reveals the structure of fundamental ontology. An investigation into the meaning of Being thus explains the existence of Dasein. The hermeneutic circle then moves from Dasein to Being and from Being to Dasein.

In rejecting the Cartesian analysis of human existence as a thinking substance, Heidegger describes human being as 'Dasein' (being-there), because res cogitans presupposes its own ontological ground and there can be no thinking without being. Dasein is an entity that intends itself and understands its own being. This attitude of Dasein is at the same time the realization of its own possibilities, and its existence is always towards these possibilities. For that reason, and in order to make a clear distinction between Dasein and other beings, Heidegger ascribes 'existence' (Existenz) to Dasein rather than 'Existentia', which describes the being of other beings. Existenz, not existential, captures the unique meaning of human existence because it is incomplete and dynamic and is a being towards possibilities. On the contrary, Existentia signifies the being of a static existence, a term used by medieval metaphysicians to describe something actual. With Dasein, its being is at issue; it has to decide about its own being and then comports itself towards that. In opposition to res cogitans, Dasein's authentic existence is possibility, not actuality. This terminology and subdivision of Being into Existenz and Existentia is not found at the beginning of Mulla Sadra's ontological inquiry. Instead he uses common philosophical terminology such as Necessary Being, contingent being, existence, essence, substance, cause, effect and accident. Unlike Heidegger, he did not try to invent a new philosophical language for establishing his new philosophical system and accomplishing his break away from the philosophical tradition of his time.

Mulla Sadra rejects the idea that Being is an entity; the being of an entity is not different from the entity itself. He is also against the description of ‘Being’ as a universal concept, because a universal concept cannot be used to represent the being of particular beings. This would be equal to saying that ‘whiteness’ is a white entity.⁵⁴ The reality of the relationship between Being and beings is not like that between universals and particulars. The reason for this, as explained earlier, is that Being does not stand as a genus or species for ontic beings. If Being is a genus, it will become an abstract universal concept which can then be apprehended rationally. Mulla Sadra argues from the very beginning of his ontology that Being is neither a concept (such as genus, species, differentia or accident) nor conceived rationally: ‘and no one has gnosis of it except the mystics, that is, “those who are grounded in mystical knowledge”’.⁵⁵ The reality of every ontic entity is in its being. Being is therefore the real ground of everything, including essences. Essences are determined not by their own inner structure but by Being.⁵⁶ This, at the same time, claims identity between Being and beings or between beings and their Being. The dynamic movement of Being in modifying itself and manifesting all ontic beings with their essences also determines its completion. The more we move towards Being, the less of essence is exhibited. Essence is then the negation of Being.⁵⁷ In my opinion, Mulla Sadra borrowed this idea from Ibn Sina, who described God (the Necessary Being) as an existence without essence. More specifically, we can say that God’s essence is inseparable from His existence. Only in case of contingent beings can essences be distinguished from their existences. Existence is positive and real while essence is negative and unreal. For this reason it is more correct to say ‘This is a tree’ than ‘Tree exists’, because essence does not exist by itself. It should be attached to existence.⁵⁸ However, this interpretation of the relationship between existence and essence should not be understood in terms of metaphysical dualism. For Mulla Sadra, essences are not real beings. They come into existence when Being creates its own modalities or ontic beings, and then essences arise as the result and are joined to them. In the downward movement of Being, when the multiplicity of ontic beings emerges, these beings exhibit diverse essences. With the upward evolutionary movement, this duality gradually disappears until, at the end, being can be grasped in its absolute positivity without essence. According to Fazlur Rahman, this view marks a distinction between Mulla Sadra’s ontology and that of the Aristotelian–Neoplatonic Muslim thinkers. The latter believed that a concrete being is the combination of existence and essence. Each of these two aspects of a concrete being is real and could exist by itself.⁵⁹ Mulla Sadra advocates ontological monism. For him, there are not two realities such as existence and essence, but only existence. It is worth mentioning that Suhrawardi is also a monist thinker, but for him the single reality is essence rather than Being.

Having established the principality and reality of Being, Mulla Sadra deals with the modality or individuation of Being in his philosophical system. This, in my opinion, should be seen as similar to Heidegger’s attempt to divide

Being into various ontological regions because every system of ontology requires this division. Generally speaking, in the ontological division of Mulla Sadra there are three modalities of Being: the realm of unity and simplicity includes the Necessary Being, heavenly spheres and the intellect in human existence; the modalities in the realm of diversity and multiplicity consist of the ontic beings and the perceptive soul in human existence; finally, at the lowest level of ontological division, there is the realm of matter with pure potentiality to receive forms. This realm also includes the human body. Human existence is shared by all three modalities. The human intellect is in the first realm, the perceptive faculty belongs to the second, and the body to the third.

The modality of unity and simplicity is the realm of Being, which is identified with God. Being, for both Mulla Sadra and Ibn Sina, is Pure Being because it is without essence and at the same time it is the Being of all beings in the two lower realms of existence. At the rank of Pure Being multiplicity is dissolved, and everything merges into a unity or into a 'simple' and 'One' mode of Being.⁶⁰ It is also important to mention that for Mulla Sadra ontology is not separate from theology because he thinks of Being as the highest ground above all beings, as the grounding ground and cause of all being without having a cause or a ground for itself. This grounding ground of all beings is also at the same time conscious of both itself and beings and determines their destination. This can be seen as the distinction between Mulla Sadra's ontology and that of Heidegger. Here, Mulla Sadra's ontology could be described as onto-theology, a Heideggerian term used to define this type of metaphysics.⁶¹ In Heidegger's ontology, Being is neither transcendent in this sense nor a rational cause for all beings. It is the Being of beings and their inner reality. God does not enter into Heidegger's metaphysics; his metaphysics remains as ontology.

In the second division, or the modality of diversity and multiplicity, there are ontic beings such as heavenly bodies, souls, animals and inanimate beings. This is the realm of individual beings.⁶² Every ontic being in this realm is in constant flux and evolutionary change towards a higher realm to achieve perfection. These beings reach perfection in human existence, as human beings are more intelligent than animals. Some human beings reach a higher rank of existence and become more perfect in their intelligence than others; this is the highest form of Being in the realm of multiplicity beneath the realm of unity.⁶³

The lowest degree of modality of Being is the realm of prime matter, which is nothing more than the potentiality to receive forms.⁶⁴ Following the doctrine of emanation introduced earlier by some Muslim thinkers such as the members of Ikhwan al-Safa (The Brethren of Purity), al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, Mulla Sadra believes that prime matter is emanated from Being eternally because Being is not in time. Prime matter represents the lowest level of existence and becomes existent through receiving specific forms in the evolutionary process from potentiality to actuality. It is also the beginning of the movement towards perfection in the universe, which will be explained in Chapter Five in the discussion on trans-substantial change (al-haraka al-jawhariyyah). The two lower realms, namely the realms of potentiality and diversity, originated from the realm of unity and are dependent on that realm ontologically:

All contingent beings, whatever their distinctions and their ranks of [relative] deficiency and perfection, are existentially dependent, being indigent in their inner-realities towards It, and enriched by It. Thus, these contingent beings are contingent by virtue of their own inner-realities. Due to the First Necessity, The Exalted, however, they are [conditionally] necessary. They are inoperative and perishable only from the perspective of their own inner-reality [and thus are not categorically necessities]. They become a reality due to the Absolute Reality [aletheia], [being] the One and the Only: 'Everything that exists will perish except His own face'. His relation to other beings is like sunlight, such that [in itself] it depends on its own inner reality, [while other] bodies are enlightened by it; [they, however] are dark from [the perspective of] their own inner-reality.⁶⁵

Mulla Sadra's division of the ontological realms attributes principality and priority to the realm of unity. To clarify the principality of this realm, he explains three ontological positions, in each of which the nature of this principality is vindicated. He argues that the relationship between being and essence should be understood in three different ways: we think of Being as prior to essence or posterior to it or we state that both of them co-exist simultaneously. When Being is thought of as prior to essence, it simply signifies that Being is independent and can stand by itself without relying on essence. If the primacy of essence is accepted, as stated in the second case, then essence would exist independent of Being and be prior to it, but then for essence to exist it needs existence to rely on and this is a vicious regress. The third position is that essence co-exists with Being simultaneously, and not in it; therefore it relies on another existence for its existence. As a consequence of this, essence cannot be without prior existence:

If being exists [lit. if the being of existence were an existent], then either it is prior to the essence or posterior to it, or they are simultaneous. If the first is the case, its realization necessarily follows independently without the essence. This implies that priority of the attribute is prior to the subject of its attribution as well as its realization without it. If the second is the case, it necessarily follows that essence exists prior to it [existence] before being, which implies a vicious regress. If the third is the case, it necessarily follows that essence exists with it [i.e., existence] and not in it. Therefore, there would be another existence for it [i.e., for essence]; this [state] implies what has been mentioned. The falsity of the consequences always implies the falsity of the antecedents.⁶⁶

After arguing for the primacy of Being, Mulla Sadra stresses the view that essences belong to the realms of potentiality and multiplicity and are inseparable from beings ontologically. Their separation is only an intellectual fact, which occurs in the realm of thinking. Beings and essences are united in the world but separated in thinking:

What has been said earlier is sufficient to refute this claim, for, existence is identical with essence in the external [realm] but different from it mentally. Therefore, there is no relation between them except in intellectual consideration. In [such an intelligible] consideration, the relation will have existence which is in its inner-reality is identical with it, but is different from it in the realm external [to the mind]. This kind of ad infinitum is stopped when the intelligible consideration is ceased.⁶⁷

However, it is clear that the only ontological position accepted by Mulla Sadra is the affirmation of the primacy of Being and the intellectually posited status of essence. What he has argued here, then, or has tried to prove, is that Being, not essences, is the sole reality. Essences exist in the mind or only in thinking, not in the external world. The dualism of existence and essence arises only when we think to define a being or understand its nature. More precisely, essences emerge when Being modifies itself in the downward process of further diversified ontic beings. We can talk about essences when these ontic modes of Being are perceived or thought about. But gradually essences disappear when we move upwards to apprehend Being in its pure absoluteness. According to Fazlur Rahman, this view draws a line of demarcation between Mulla Sadra's ontology and that of the Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic thinkers.⁶⁸ The latter accepted the reality of existence and essence outside the domain of thinking and did not insist on the subjectivity of the latter.⁶⁹ In contrast, essence here is considered a mode of Being that exists only in thinking; that is, it has mental reality. It is the intellect that conceives essence and separates it from existence; otherwise, there is only existence and nothing else as an ontological reality and the foundation of all ontic modes. It may be possible to find a resemblance between this view of the ontological status of essence and the subjective categories in Kant's philosophy. Our knowledge of the phenomenal world, as described by Kant, is produced through the application of these subjective categories that define the essence of every phenomenon with the assistance of sensibility. This claim is an obvious contradiction with Suhrawardi's metaphysical conviction, in which essence has become real and Being a mere mental concept having no ontological reality of its own. Mulla Sadra, again in his arguments against the doctrine of the primacy of essence, insists that Suhrawardi's conviction can be taken into account when the dual reality of essence and existence is accepted.⁷⁰ For Mulla Sadra, Being is real and essence unreal; Being is positive, light, and makes all essences exist, whereas essence is negative, darkness, and imposes limitation on beings. The essence of each Being, which is other than Being, does not exist by itself. It exists by virtue of Being.

Being is, then, an ontological reality while essence lacks that reality and this rank of existence.⁷¹ The problem that arises in describing essence as subjective is with the possibility of understanding essence as something illusory. What does Mulla Sadra mean by insisting on the principality and reality of being? Is there a unity of being and essence in reality? Does that unity make them one real thing? Does that unity presuppose their previous ontological distinction? In answering these questions the ontological status of essences and their relationship to Being can be seen from two perspectives: first, the essences are illusory or images in the mind and have a mental existence like the subjective categories of the faculty of understanding in Kant's epistemology; second, the essences are real and their reality is of the second degree and is not equal with the reality of Being.

The first perspective is also found as a mystic point of view and analogous to the metaphysical position of some Indian thinkers who consider the world to be maya or unreal. Based on this type of metaphysical belief the essence of an entity or its being in the sensible world is seen as an illusion. But is this Mulla Sadra's position? Does this Muslim thinker say that the essence of the table I am now using for writing is only mental and has no reality outside my mind? In my opinion, Mulla Sadra's understanding of this problem belongs to the second perspective, which is similar to the view of Ibn Sina and to Hegel's interpretation of unity and diversity. Indeed, even explaining some similarities between Mulla Sadra's interpretation of the meaning of Being and its relationship with essence with that of Kantian metaphysical dualism will not be of great help here. The best way to approach this problem is through Hegel's analysis of the external reality and his interpretation of the world as the self-manifestation of Geist. In other words, we need to understand Being as an objective reality that exhibits itself in various forms and gives rise to the multiple beings and their essences. Being in this sense is a dynamic fountainhead of all things as well as their essences. This view is also shared by Heidegger, with the exception that Heidegger's ontology leaves no room for a rational teleology. Also, Hegel's concept of essence should not be taken for the Platonic Forms or the Kantian noumena. It is the negation of Being and is derived from the last category in the sphere of Being in dialectical logic. Essence, therefore, cannot exist by itself without relying on Being, but unlike Being, which is immediacy, essence is mediated and known through reflection or understanding.⁷² This discussion, in some ways, brings us closer to Ibn 'Arabi's doctrine of the unity of being. Mulla Sadra also wrote on the graded unity of being in order to justify his doctrine of the ambiguity of Being (tashkik al-wujud). In his discussion on the relationship between cause and effect he draws a conclusion on the personal unity of being in line with Ibn 'Arabi.⁷³ This discussion on the causal relationship also leads to the ontological division of Being stated by Ibn Sina, because Being that is a cause for its own multiple modality or the emergence of the effects becomes a Necessary Being as in Ibn Sina's ontology and the effects of possible beings. The existence of a cause does not rely on its effects, because it is independent and self-subsistent. Dependence and reliance on something other than itself is the character of the effects. The effects become both necessary when they are accompanied by their perfect cause and impossible in the absence of this perfect cause. When a cause produces an effect, that effect gives rise to its own essence in the mind, and in this way essence is derived from the existence of the effect. An effect, for example the world, is real when it is seen only in its relationship to its cause. This relationship is described as that of a speech to the speaker. The moment the speaker halts speaking, speech becomes impossibility.⁷⁴ The necessary relationship between a cause and its effect determines the existence of the effect but the cause (Being) remains without relying on anything for its existence. Can we say that Being causes essences? What is important to remember here is that essences have no reality for Mulla Sadra. They exist in the mind or intellectually. Being as a perfect cause gives rise to its effects or possible beings, and essences affect the possible beings and emerge only in the mind when the possible beings are thought about or conceived. Essences have no existence at all, either primary or attributive.

Essences belong to contingent beings in the realm of diversity and multiplicity. These contingent beings emanate from Being and give rise to essence in the mind.⁷⁵ Existence and essence, as mentioned in al-Masha'ir, are not separate in the external world; their separation is merely mental. This, however, does not mean that existence and essence are two different realities having a unity. Mulla Sadra plainly rejects the external reality of essences. For him, essences belong to contingent beings; if these beings have more essences they possess less being. Yet their being will never vanish, as nothing can exist as pure essence. The essences become 'concepts' through which we come to know about contingent beings. It is worth mentioning here that Suhrawardi is right in stating that what is known is essence not existence. But in Mulla Sadra's philosophy, knowledge is preconditioned by Being, or epistemology by ontology. Essences, as internal realities, are dependent on the external reality of Being. Although at the highest level of the hierarchy of Being there is pure Being, a kind of existence without essence, we cannot state that at the lowest level there is pure essence or essence without existence. Essences are always with ontic beings and do not exist in themselves. Their relationship as universal concepts to ontic beings (phenomena) remains; as long as one particular or ontic being exists, the essence will also exist. This can be seen as a one-to-one relationship.⁷⁶

The ontological division of Being in Mulla Sadra's philosophy does not depict the world as an aggregate of ontic beings or a container of them. Mulla Sadra sees the world as an organic body in which the evolutionary process of trans-substantial change takes place towards perfection. When an ontic being is described as something 'in' the world, this spatial relationship is not external like the case of a table in the room. The existence of the table is not dependent on the room, while its existence as an ontic being is unthinkable without its being in the world. Mulla Sadra's understanding of the relationship between Being and beings has similarity with Heidegger's existential analysis of in-der-Welt-sein, where being-in-the-world becomes an ontological condition for the existence of Dasein.⁷⁷ Yet this condition does not constitute the essence of this entity. This relationship between Being and beings is often elucidated metaphorically. As stated by John Quinn, for example, it is like the relationship of ink to written words.⁷⁸ One is usually not aware of the ink while reading the words. But in reality it is the ink that is seen and the words do not exist without it. Beings are similarly dual in nature. They have the character of identity as, like the words, they share the ink, but at the same time they represent multiplicity as the words are different from one another in form and meaning. Every being is then identical and different, eternal and temporal, divine and profane, because they are the intensive modifications of Being. By reflecting on this distinction and the ontological difference between the realms of Being we find a way to Being. This is Mulla Sadra's objective in al-Asfar. His aim is to move away from the 'darkness of illusion' to the daylight of the truth of existence.

The Systematic Ambiguity of Being and the Trans-Substantial Change in the World Order

All beings in the sensible world are actual in some ways or potential in others. In the former, they have been changed from potential to actual but do not possess perfection completely. Their state of actuality is not yet pure and final. It is merely a new state of potentiality for another actuality, without which they will remain immutable without transition from one rank of being to another. The change from potential to actual will be in a state of constant flux, with beings undergoing sudden or gradual change. The state of potentiality, which is prior to the state of actuality, is weak and imperfect. But in order to become more perfect and reach a higher rank, beings need to become actual again. To achieve this, they must be elevated to a higher mode of being where perfection is articulated or actualized.

In this discussion about change we encounter one of the most important philosophical issues in Mulla Sadra's ontology: trans-substantial change (al-haraka al-jawhariyyah). This is, in my opinion, the lynchpin of his cosmology and the key concept for understanding the world order. Mulla Sadra's interpretation of the meaning of the world is also based on understanding of trans-substantial change; hence his interpretation of the world is deeply rooted in his metaphysical system. In Mulla Sadra's philosophy, the world is not a mere material realm like that of Aristotle in which beings are causally and mechanically connected, but a world with integrated parts of a single system with a pre-given purpose. The world is not built on blind and aimless regulation and mechanical self-repetition. It is created by a perfect cause that has determined its meaning and destination.

In advocating this teleological metaphysics for understanding the world Mulla Sadra draws closer to Hegel rather than to Heidegger, and moves away from Aristotle. For Hegel, the world is the self-objectification of the Geist; it moves dialectically onward to accomplish perfection and overcome its alienation from Geist. The world is seen as an organic whole that changes itself for a purpose predetermined by Geist.¹ Geist is in a process of transformation in history through contradictions that determine the development of the world. Hegel elaborated this process in the Phenomenology of Mind as a temporal structure, which moves from idea to nature and then back to the idea in a better form and with richer content. This dialectical movement is carried forward by the triad of thesis, antithesis and synthesis. Synthesis, which is the union of thesis and antithesis, is richer than the previous movements in content because it supersedes both and becomes a new thesis for another antithesis, which unites to produce a new synthesis, which in turn becomes a new thesis in a new triad. This dialectic movement from thesis to antithesis and then to unity in synthesis is an irreversible process that continues until Geist, as the only sovereignty of the world, achieves self-completion at the final stage of historical development when the estranged world is appropriated by consciousness and transformed.

What Mulla Sadra explains in his doctrine of trans-substantial change can be separated from Hegel's description of the dialectical movement in three ways: first, Mulla Sadra does not advocate the idea of the dialectical movement of the world; second, although the emanation of the world is a temporal generation of the modalities of Being, time and change do not affect Being. Third, God is not immanent but transcendent, so Mulla Sadra's metaphysics should be understood in terms of panentheism rather than pantheism, the former being the metaphysical view that the world is part of God rather than being identical with Him. The world of multiplicity and God are in communion with each other because the former originated from the latter. But at the same time God is transcendent and separated from the world. Mulla Sadra, unlike Hegel, thinks of being in the world as temporality, but this temporality is external to the realm of Being. This is also in contradiction with Heidegger's description of Being as temporality. In Hegel's Phenomenology, as in Heidegger's Being and Time, temporality is the reality of Geist; for example Hegel states:

Time is just the notion definitely existent, and presented to consciousness in the form of empty intuition. Hence spirit necessarily appears in time, and it appears in time as long as it does not grasp its pure intuition, i.e. so long as it does not annul time. Time is the pure self in external form, apprehended in intuition, and not grasped and understood by the self; it is the notion apprehended only through intuition. When this motion grasps itself, it supersedes its time character, (conceptually) comprehends intuition, and is intuition comprehended and comprehending. Time therefore appears as spirit's destiny and necessity, where spirit is not yet complete within itself; it is the necessity compelling spirit to enrich the share self-consciousness has in consciousness, not put into motion the immediacy of the inherent nature (which is the form in which the substance is present in consciousness); or, conversely, to realize and make manifest what is inherent, regarded as inward and immanent, to make manifest that which is at first within – i.e. to vindicate it for spirit's certainty of self.²

The world is not separated from Geist, which functions as an immanent cause in the dialectical process of evolution. The actualization of Geist happens only in time through stages of development in nature and history. Since the essence of Geist is self-determined, history is the realization of freedom determined by Geist. It is a purposeful transition towards the absolute idea where all differences are united in absolute consciousness.

Another distinction between Mulla Sadra's ontology and that of Heidegger lies in the doctrine of emanation. Mulla Sadra, following the Neoplatonist Muslim thinkers such as Ikhwan al-Safa, al-Farabi and Ibn Sina, describes the creation of the world as emanation. From the realm of unity or Pure Being emanates the realm of prime matter (potentiality) and the realm of diversity (ontic beings). Accordingly, Being remains both transcendent and the origin and grounding of all that is grounded; in other words, the inner reality of all things. The emanation begins from Pure Being and moves downwards to the lowest level, where the ontic beings, although they do not vanish as beings, are dominated by their essences. Like the dialectic movement in Hegel's logic, this descending process of emanation is from the most general and indeterminate form to the most concrete, but it loses perfection on the way. Descendence is a gradual distance from perfection. At the abyss of this descending process there are beings with more essence but less existence.

In the light of the doctrine of emanation all ontic beings are the same and share identity because they spring from a single fountainhead. In all of them, Being becomes a common character and the inner identity. We can describe all beings in the three ontological realms as things that are. Meanwhile, emanation from Being downwards explains various stages of being with different degrees of perfection. In this case, all beings are not equal or the same in sharing the reality of Being. This unequal distribution of the character of Being with different gradations of the Being of their beings is called the systematic ambiguity of Being (tashkik al-wujud):

The relation between generated creatures and the creator is that of deficiency to perfection, and of weakness to strength. It has been established already that what is realized in a determinate manner are real existents and not essences. Moreover, it has been established that existence is a simple reality which has neither genus, nor a persisting difference, nor species, nor dividing difference, nor individuation. Rather, its individuation is due to its simple essence and the essential distinction between its units and identity [occurs] only by means of [their] being the strongest and being the weakest; and distinction into accidents happens only in bodies. There is no doubt that the Creator in existence is The Most Perfect and in realization The Most Complete [in encounter] with the created. The created is like an emanation of its Creator. In reality [the creature] is not even an effect, except in light of its unfolding [lit. modification] by the Maker, in light of Its Unfolding and Activities.³

The systematic ambiguity of Being is another way of expressing the principle of identity in difference and is determined by the descending process of emanation from Being to the lowest ontic beings. Being, as the reality of all ranks of ontic beings, is one and identical in its relation to them, but at the same time it becomes multiplicitous and different. From the perspective of this principle, there will be no distinction between diverse ontic beings and Being, as all of them belong together. They are only different in their perfection, deficiency, richness and indigence.⁴ It should be remembered that imperfection and deficiency infect only the realms of prime matter and diversity. These terms cannot be employed to describe the realm of Being because Being is a unity and pure and has no essence; otherwise, as Mulla Sadra states, 'It would not be the case that a Necessary Existent could exist.'⁵ Deficiency and imperfection are not the characteristics of the inner reality of Being. They are characteristics of its gradation in the rank of contingent and posterior beings. Deficiency, limitation and privation are the characteristics of beings rather than Being. They are generated during the process of emanation because 'It is necessarily the case that the created thing is not equal to the creator, nor does emanation equal the source of emanation in terms of rank of existence.'⁶ The gradation of Being is also systematic because it is purposeful, unidimensional and determined by Being. It does not leave the emanation of the ontic beings in the world to the caprice of blind chance.

The world of multiplicity and difference is a temporal occurrence and a gradation of Being, because everything emanates from Being and is grounded in it. The non-existence of a particular being precedes its existence in time, and is in the state of non-existence prior to its existence caused by Being. In this process of creation or coming into being of the non-being, an individual being requires a new identity constantly and its existence is not fixed.⁷ Mulla Sadra supports this view of the constant renewing of being in the world by quoting Qur'anic verses. He believes that the renewal of ontic beings is a necessary, autonomous or innate process, because all ontic beings are in a relation of identity to Being. Their existence is based on the reality of Being: 'The Maker, in virtue of His durability and endurance, created this creature which is self-renewal in terms of its essence and identity.'⁸

The systematic ambiguity of Being is the particularization of Being in which Being becomes manifest in its own individual modalities. It is not a process similar to the emanation of particulars from the universal Platonic Forms or to Suhrawardi's Lord of Species, simply because the Necessary Being or the source of this particularization is not a universal form but a single transcendent Being. This can be seen as a significant difference between Mulla Sadra's understanding of the Platonic Forms and Suhrawardi's. Although Plato thinks of the universal forms in the immaterial world as ideas or essences in the Suhrawardian sense, Mulla Sadra insists that they are beings rather than essences and placed at a higher rank of existence in the gradation of Being. Besides, he believes that they are not universal ideas but individual beings responsible for generating species at a lower rank of existence. Having discussed the gradation of Being briefly it is useful at this point to explain more precisely Mulla Sadra's interpretation of emanation for understanding his doctrine of the systematic ambiguity of Being. The process of emanation begins with Pure Being and proceeds to its own particularization, which gives rise to the creation of all beings. This pure Being, as stated before, is neither genus nor species, but a mere identity and simplicity. On the ground of identity, its relationship to beings is equivocal. From this transcendent single and simple Being emanates only one being; the diversity of the ranks belongs to the lower stages of emanation and has no direct contact with the transcendent source. At this stage in understanding Mulla Sadra's ontology, we can state that there are two regions of ontology: the region of Pure Being and that of becoming. The former is characterized by unity and sameness (identity) and the latter by difference, multiplicity and change. These two regions of being are necessarily connected as the former is an ontological ground for the latter. As a consequence of this necessary relationship between ground and grounded, we can conclude that there is no multiplicity without unity. The principle of identity in difference becomes an essential characteristic of the two regions of Being and becoming. Difference becomes possible only on the ground of identity. The presence of unity in emanation is an ontological condition of the equivocal ground for the multiplicity of the grounded.

The systematic ambiguity of Being brings us to the individuation (al-tashakhus) of Being, which is discussed by Mulla Sadra in the second volume of al-Asfar. The meaning of individuation as understood by him signifies the division of a species into undivided units. For example, Socrates as an individual human being is a member of the human species. The concept of human being can be applied to all members of this species, in which case the universal concept cannot become an individuation. On the other hand, an individual human being is not a universal concept, and cannot be applied to all individuals. The main characteristic of individuation is, then, its inapplicability, unlike a universal concept, to other or multiple things.⁹ The individuation of an ontic being is not in its quiddity and it is not something caused by its accident. It is in its existence, which constitutes the reality of its individual existence even in a material form:

The subsequent deficiency is not from the Principle of Existence. But, it is due to its actualization in [its being in] the second rank and thereafter. Deficiencies and privations happen due to the secondary [existence] due to the fact that they are secondary and posterior [in relation to the First Existence]. The First Being [exists], since its perfection is complete, [and thus] it has no limit. Privation and indigence are derived from the emanation and creation, because it is necessarily the case that the created thing is not equal to the creator, nor does emanation equal the source of emanation in terms of rank of existence.¹⁰ involved in this evolutionary process, but at the same time it is not detached from it because it is the ontological originator of the beings and their evolutionary movement. Being is a unity and a non-conditional origin of all things. Otherwise, it cannot exist necessarily without a beginning. Perfection is in contrast to individuation, and distancing of beings is in proximity to Being.

The notion of becoming gives rise to the idea of time or the temporality of the realm of multiplicity. As mentioned earlier, Being, as the origin and the cause of becoming, is not affected by time. Time belongs only to the world of multiplicity of ontic beings. Mulla Sadra's understanding of the concepts of time and change is different from that of Aristotle. In al-Masha'ir, he states that the concept of 'change' described by some philosophers as a mediation between the realm of Being and becoming does not suit our ontological enterprise, because they understand change to be .an additional intelligible affair, which indicates the transition of a thing from potentiality to actuality, rather than the means by which this transition is made.'¹¹ Change, for Mulla Sadra, is a constant transition of substance and time is the measure of trans-substantial change. With this kind of change we encounter an ascending process of evolution towards perfection. Becoming is, then, the reverse of the descending process of the individuation of Being. The descending process is a movement from Being to the lowest rank of beings with less of being and more essence. The universality of Being is reduced until it arrives at the stage of individuals where no universality is further possible. The ascending movement is from the lowest rank to the highest, from the least perfect to the most perfect rank of existence. The doctrine of the systematic ambiguity of Being is nothing more than the increase and decrease of the reality of Being and identity in all ontic beings. The beings are distributed among various ranks due to their being prior or posterior, perfect or imperfect, strong or weak. There is always less and more of Being in the real world. It should be remembered that Mulla Sadra is not the first philosopher to advocate the idea of constant flux. Before him Heraclitus held this view on change. This Greek thinker is known for sayings attributed to him such as 'All things are in a state of flux', and 'You cannot step twice into the same stream'.¹² Being, in this constant flux, particularizes itself and gives rise to multiplicity. Heraclitus also believed that reality was an eternal vital fire, kindled in measures and extinguished in measures. These philosophical views were in contradiction to the views of Parmenides and Zeno of Elea, who argued against the possibility of motion, multiplicity and difference. Parmenides thought of Being as consisting of the same stable reality. Zeno, the disciple of Parmenides, went further to prove the ideas of his teacher by arguments known as Zeno's paradoxes.¹³ The foundation of Heraclitus' ontology, however, has four principles: first, Being is one in many or unity in multiplicity; second, everything changes constantly; third, Being as a living fire is governed by logos; and fourth, Being includes non-being and both generate becoming. After Heraclitus, the notion of becoming became one of the pivotal categories in Hegel's logic. Being and non-being (Nothingness) in dialectical logic are identical because neither has determinations and both are abstractions and also different. But it is a contradiction for two things to be identical and different. This contradiction propels the dialectical progress further. As a consequence of this and as the synthesis of being and non-being, 'becoming' prevails when being passes into non-being and non-being into being. These two movements determine the coming to be and ceasing to be of the beings in the world. Although the notion of trans-substantial change was not used by Heraclitus and Hegel, their interpretation of change and motion, particularly where Heraclitus states that one cannot step twice into the same stream, might be interpreted as trans-substantial change because one cannot have the same kind of being at different times. In the case of accidental change, it is true that the substance remains the same without losing its own identity. For example, when water is cold it receives the form of cold. It becomes hot only when it receives the form of heat by throwing off its previous form; water cannot be cold and hot at the same time. In this kind of change, when a being receives a new form – a bud blossoms and becomes a flower – it does not throw away its previous form. The object becomes perfected and elevated to a higher level of existence by receiving a new and better form without negating the previous one. We can say, in the Hegelian sense, that the previous form is superseded (aufgehoben), preserved and elevated. The trans-substantial change consists of preserving the past forms and yet transcending them. But it does not leave 'substance' without affecting it like its accidents.

In Mulla Sadra's ontology, as in Heraclitus, change is a constant renewal and an evolutionary process towards perfection. It is not a movement from one place to another like the movement of an arrow in space or a train from one station to another. It is a substantial change that dominates all beings in the ontological region of becoming. The causal foundation of this change in beings is not something stable or unchangeable such as substance in Aristotle's metaphysics; rather, it signifies a being that is at the same time affected by change. There is in every accidental change a substantial change; to put it another way, change in accidents is caused by change in substance. This change is a fundamental transformation of a being from one rank of existence to another.¹⁴ All beings come under the influence of this change; nothing remains outside the domain of change and nothing remains the same for ever. If we think of time as the measure of change, then in this context time for Mulla Sadra becomes the measure of this trans-substantial transformation of beings. It is a dominant reality in the span of life of every ontic being and constitutes the ontological structure of the region of becoming.

Change in the four categories or accidents, an idea advocated by Aristotle and Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophers, is possible with change in substance. As a consequence of this, with the exception of change nothing remains durable in the region of becoming. For Mulla Sadra the cause of change is a self-moving substance called the inner reality of Being, which is equivocally shared by all beings. It is, as stated by Fazlur Rahman, the specific nature commonly supposed to create the species in the world.¹⁵ This nature is not stable; it is subject to constant change and brings about accidental changes with itself. The arguments developed by Mulla Sadra to support his notion of change are easy to understand. He states that, since the changeable accidents of beings are caused by their substances, substance itself should be changeable because a motionless cause cannot produce a moved accident. A change in accident should be caused by a change in substance. Otherwise there would be no causal relationship between substance and its accidents. In another argument, he insists that change is an evolution towards perfection. Perfection is achieved when there is a substantial change from a less perfect state to a more perfect state of existence, following which there will be no distinction between the accidental and substantial changes in the world because every accidental change is caused by substantial change. The moving being does not remain the same at the moment of change and throughout the change.

For Aristotle, substance is the primary category and is of two kinds: primary and secondary. Primary substance, such as individuals, is neither a predicate of a subject nor in a subject. Secondary substance, such as genera and species, which includes primary substance, is a predicate of a subject in a proposition but not in a subject. All other nine categories are present in the subject. Substance is also considered a stable nucleus. Changes occur only in the four categories of quality, quantity, place and position. For this reason, Aristotle talks about four kinds of change: in a being itself, in quality, in quantity and in place. A change involving the being of a thing is generation and corruption; a change in quality is alteration, in quantity it is increase and decrease, and a change in place is locomotion. These changes will be from a certain status in an entity to its contrary. Substance as the substratum presupposed by the categories has no contrariety so is not affected by change.¹⁶ Some Muslim theologians, such as the Mu'tazilites (with the exception of al-Nazzam), the Ash'arites, and Muslim Peripatetic Neoplatonic philosophers such as al-Farabi and Ibn Sina and his followers, agreed with Aristotle and accepted the interpretation of the possibility of change in accident. In rejecting the idea of change in substance, Ibn Sina, for example, states:

However, if it is claimed that motion occurs in substance, then this is a figurative expression. No motion occurs in substance because if a nature of a substance deteriorates, it will be sudden. And if it is originated, it is still sudden. There is no middle perfection between potency and mere act. Substantial form is not subject to increase and decrease, nor is it subject to intensity and weakness. The reason is that if it is subject to these factors, then inevitably either it will remain within the increasing or decreasing of its species, and the substantial form does not change.

The change rather occurs in the accident of the form, since what was weak and was intensified later is annihilated, whereas the substance is not annihilated.¹⁷

Ibn Sina, in his discussion on the existence of the physical world in al-Shifa, insists that the archetype of the beings remains stable from the beginning to the end of motion in all situations. If we accept this point, then the substance will not require change. The resulting change and motion in beings occurs only in one or more than one of the four categories of substance indicated by Aristotle.

The question that arises here is how can we think of identity when everything is subject to constant substantial change? How can we think that a being which undergoes trans-substantial change is the same being or has an identity? These questions also remind us the problem of personal identity discussed by David Hume in his refutation of the Cartesian concept of self-substance. In criticizing the Cartesian theory, Hume argued that nothing remains the same in the world and that resemblance is the cause of the mistake in substituting the notion of identity: 'For when we attribute identity, in an improper sense, to variable or interrupted objects, our mistake is not confined to the expression, but is commonly attended with a fiction, either of something invariable and uninterrupted, or of something mysterious and inexplicable, or at least with a propensity to such fiction.'¹⁸ The notion of personal identity in this case is fictitious and a product of our imagination, because the changes that happen in a being are slow and gradual. In trans-substantial change, all beings (corporeal and non-corporeal) change constantly. They are originated and renewed at each moment. No single being remains permanently the same. Every being is different and new at every new moment. Mulla Sadra's view regarding this problem is in one respect similar to that of Hume. First, he states that trans-substantial change occurs unnoticed because it is gradual and slow. We think that the change has not occurred and that the being is the same. Second, we attribute sameness to a being because the mind employs universal concepts for describing the essences, which are static. Trans-substantial change is usually noticed when the being of a being arrives at a crucial stage of modification or undergoes a sudden change. In addition to this, Mulla Sadra believes that the identity of a person relies on the intellectual form of that person, which exists in the mind of God. For God, a person is the same; otherwise he or she is not the same.¹⁹ From this interpretation, we can conclude that the renewal process of the world is not externally caused or is not something in contrast to Being. Whatever goes through change is one of the modalities of Being, which has a temporal dimension and belongs to the region of becoming. Since change is the mode of beings, then Being, its modalities and the process of becoming are necessarily connected. Change does not take place in beings as an external event; instead, beings originate change internally, and the external conditions, such as being in the world and being an individuation, facilitate that change. If we understand the relationship between Being and its modalities without making a substantial distinction between them, all their differences on the ground of their ontological unity and identity disappear. A human being, as a combination of intellect and body, is nothing more than a modality of Being; or, more precisely, an individuation of Being aiming at its own transcendence through the gateway of self-understanding and approximation to Being. In this process of change, this modality of Being rises above the boundaries of its own finitude and limitation as it is capable of understanding the meaning of its own existence and seeks the Truth. It is on the foundation of this ontology and the gradations of the modalities of Being that the meaning of (humanity) within the intentionality of the upward movement should be understood. The way in which Mulla Sadra looks at the gradations of the modality of Being in the trans-substantial change from less perfect to more perfect can be used to address humanity in plurality. Within the development of this modality towards perfection, and by realizing the end in the 'perfect human being', we come across a range of human existence at different ontological-historical stages and different kinds of humanity. Particularly in the light of this kind of change, it is possible for us to talk about less or more humanity at different ranks of existence in the same way we describe a being as smaller or larger.

Mulla Sadra's ontology, in particular the doctrine of systematic ambiguity of Being, bridges the gulf between monism and pluralism. This can be elucidated in considering the principle of identity in difference. Identity is established on the ground of the reality of Being as a simple reality that contains the multiplicity of its own modification. The external reality as Being and the modifications of Being, which have less or more of being, are characterized by unity and diversity. Diversity is a mode of the single and simple reality of Being. The multiple modalities of Being do not exist in themselves as separate realities, as is the case in pluralism. Here, Being is one and all other things that exist are the modalities of this reality.

Since the systematic ambiguity of Being is nothing more than an increase or decrease in the intensity of Being, the trans-substantial change is an existential movement. It happens to Being as a change in the intensification of Being rather than a change in essence. Nor is change in the categories of quality and quantity a gradual or continuous intensification of quality and quantity in a particular type of being; it is their replacement by a new one. Here, Mulla Sadra is talking about the definite quality and quantity of a being.²⁰ Intensification of a quality, for example 'whiteness' in a body, is not an increase in intensity of the same quality of 'whiteness'. It is a replacement of the former 'whiteness' by another 'whiteness' with more intensity in its 'being' white. This kind of change can be seen as the mutation of the former definite quality and the emergence of a totally new quality. This is the case also with a definite quantity of ontic beings. In a quantitative change, a new quantity replaces the old quantity. As a result, beings in the world are in constant change and renewal until they reach their own perfection, where no further change is thinkable. What undergoes change but at the same time endures in this evolutionary process is Being as the being of all beings and their unity.²¹ Since beings are the modalities of Being, undergo through constant change we can conclude that all kinds of change occur in beings are also Being and by Being. Being is, therefore, in a self-evolutionary process that has no cause except Being itself. Being is the origin of change but still unchangeable.

The existential movement of Being begins with emanation or the descending movement from the realm of unity to the realms of potentiality and multiplicity, which are called the region of 'becoming'. We also call this downward process the particularization of Being. The second phase of change, by contrast, is the ascending movement of the particularization of Being through trans-substantial change upward towards perfection. This descending-ascending process can also be described as a movement from perfection to imperfection and then from imperfection to perfection; from Being to its own particularization and then from the particularization of Being back to Being. The distinctiveness of this two-fold movement of Being is that no accidental change takes place without substantial change. Furthermore, the existential movement of Being is both vertical and horizontal. In the vertical direction, the movement is from the lowest rank to the highest and is governed by the objective of achieving perfection or arriving at the highest rank of being. Here it seems that Mulla Sadra is in agreement with Proclus (410–485), a Hellenic philosopher of the Anaximander School of Neoplatonism who subdivides the process of emanation into horizontal and vertical. For both thinkers, the vertical movement ends with arriving at the most perfect state of existence.

In his discussion of the ascending process and the vertical movement of all beings towards the goal of perfection, Mulla Sadra understood the significance of human existence for the realization of this goal. The foundation of human existence, in the systematic ambiguity of Being, is potentiality. Human existence gradually fulfils itself by moving away from potentiality to actuality. At the start, there is only the realm of pure potentiality emanated from Being, but, in the evolutionary process of vertical trans-substantial change, human existence moves towards the realm of actuality. The journey ends with the emergence of the perfect human being (al-insan al-kamil), who attains unity with the Intelligences or divine attributes: 'These Intelligences themselves have little to attain by way of perfection, since all their perfections are already realized, for, as Divine Attributes, they are united with God's existence.'²² The other direction of change, namely horizontal movement, determines the transformation of the world through a succession of infinite forms. This movement is infinite in the sense that it has no end and, unlike the vertical movement, is not determined by the realization of the end. The trans-substantial movement also resembles the idea of the creative evolution advocated by Bergson, for whom the world is in a constant, multidimensional and vertical process of creative evolution.

Dissatisfied with the mechanistic explanation presented by Laplacean scientific theory and the Darwinian concept of natural selection, Bergson argued that 'mechanism' was inadequate for understanding reality as it neglected other aspects of reality such as duration and creative evolution. The mechanistic account of evolution was also directionless and an outcome of mere chance.²³ For Bergson, the directionality of evolution was a vital field of constant renewal and creativity in which 'duration' rather than physical time played a significant role in transforming life from a lower to a higher state. Evolution was conceived in terms of an unbroken continuation of life in multiple directions. Duration, as the temporality of life, was a single indivisible continuity in which all three elements of past, present and future became integrated parts. To explain this, Bergson presents the analogy of human personality. We are aware of the development in our personality and this development is not seen as a mechanical change in which one state of existence is replaced by another. The change persists and is secured by memory, which establishes the connection between past, present and future.²⁴ The dissimilarities between Mulla Sadra's trans-substantial change and Bergson's creative evolution arise with directionality and purpose. The former kind of change is unidirectional in its vertical movement and culminates in the perfect human being. The latter is multidirectional and infinite. Another dissimilarity is in the teleological conception of evolution in trans-substantial change, which is that evolution fulfils a predetermined plan of Being. In contrast, creative evolution in Bergson's philosophy is a constant growth, like a snowball rolling down a slope. This growth is also without a predetermined purpose and is thus an ontological foundation for free will.

Mulla Sadra's doctrine of trans-substantial change is directly related to the notion of time and the temporality of the ontic beings in the world. It leads at the same time to the problem of the creation of the world in time. In the history of Islamic thought the Qur'anic paradigm of 'creation ex nihilo', which is in contradiction to the Hellenistic principle of 'ex nihilo nihil fit', created a problem for some Muslim thinkers. Al-Kindi (d. 866) for example used Aristotelian principles and self-evident propositions in order to demonstrate the finitude of the world and to vindicate the Qur'anic paradigm of creation ex nihilo.²⁵ For al-Kindi and the adherents of the Qur'anic paradigm, the world had a beginning and was created in time by God. Al-Farabi and Ibn Sina found a solution to this contradiction between the Qur'anic paradigm of 'creation ex nihilo' and the Hellenistic principle in the doctrine of emanation provided by Plotinus, which enabled them to argue that the world was created neither ex nihilo nor from the eternal prime matter of Aristotle, but emanated from God eternally. In trans-substantial change, the creation of the world is viewed from the perspective of the doctrine of emanation, but at the same time this perspective is not void of problems. It is also important to understand that in Mulla Sadra's ontology the world is an event and is originated, which means that it is temporal. At the same time, the emanation of the world still appears to be a-temporal simply because God, who is the efficient cause and the source of the emanation, is eternal and not in time. God's time, as stated by Mir Damad, the teacher of Mulla Sadra, is eternal 'sarmad'.²⁶ In addition to this conception of time, Mir Damad refers to 'dahr' perpetuity and 'zaman' cosmological time as two different forms of time belonging to two different spheres of Being. Dahr describes the relation between the unchangeable divine attributes and the sensible world. Zaman is used for the temporality of the ontic beings in the sensible world. Zaman, therefore, cannot exist without the world and did not exist before the creation of material objects. The sensible world, which exists in zaman and depends on the divine attributes to exist, is outside the sphere of dahr and sarmad, whereas the divine attributes are in dahr but not in zaman.²⁷ Since the creation of the world is in zaman, and the sensible world is real, zaman should also have an objective reality. It cannot be a mere subjective notion in the Kantian sense. Mulla Sadra accepted the division of time by his teacher, but believed that it required further investigation. On one hand, time is said not to exist objectively. On the other hand, the relation of time to the existential movement in the world provides an ontological ground for the objectivity of time. One can claim that, since existential movement is objective, time as the measure of that movement is also objective. Even the notion of time, which is subjective and exists only in the mind, should be caused by something external and must have a connection with the objective existential movement in the world. This, however, does not mean that time is a quality of the existential movement. It should also be remembered that we cannot think of time without the existential movement in the world.²⁸ Since the emanation of the world from the divine attributes of God did not happen in zaman because zaman is not prior to the creation of the world, the world is, then, a-temporally originated.

In trans-substantial change, the only being not affected is Being, because Being is pure actuality and perfect. It can still be argued, however, that since the world is originated from Being and is part of it, then it is Being that changes and transforms itself by itself into its own modalities. This view is also the foundation of the mystic conviction held by some Sufis, who rejected the dichotomy of reality and appearance. From this understanding of time it should be clear that Mulla Sadra's concept of the temporality of the world is different from the concept of the creation of the world in time. Here the world is not in time but exists with time or is substantially temporal. The sensible world and time co-exist and belong together. Temporality is not an indication of the beginning and the end of the world because the world does not end in Mulla Sadra's ontological interpretation. Temporality is simply the measure of trans-substantial change, and the origination of the world should be understood as a consequence of this change. Every moment in this trans-substantial change is a beginning as well as an end, in this constant and endless process of change. The world is, therefore, endless or eternal but does not stay the same, since the creation of a new substance is the annihilation of the previous one. The world is temporal as it goes through change but is a-temporal because change is permanent and remains for ever; it does not fall into the abyss of nothingness. In each moment there is a being that did not exist before, and this determines the temporal dimension of existence.

Without the objective existence of the existential movement there will not be an objective space-time continuum. The objectivity of time is a logical requirement of the objectivity of the existential movement of Being. At this point, Mulla Sadra's view contradicts Ibn Sina's understanding of the subjectivity of the notion of time, which is derived from movement as continuity or passage from the beginning to the end as a whole.²⁹ But does this mean that time is something real? If it is real, we need to assert its objectivity just as the objectivity of the world is asserted. But Mulla Sadra insists that time is not independent of the existential movement of Being. It is not like a container in which all events occur. It is one of the dimensions of the world that cannot be separated from it.³⁰ Elsewhere he states that the existential movement of Being is not different from time because 'the measure and the measured are the same'.³¹ On one hand, Mulla Sadra believes that time is not independent of the existential movement of the world and not something real like a being; on the other hand, he identifies time as the measure of the trans-substantial change that accompanies the existential movement. In this way Mulla Sadra's interpretation of time is different from that of his predecessors. Time is neither subjective nor objective, because it is not a mere concept or a fancy that has no representation in the external world. nor can it be seen as something that exists outside human thinking. Time is, rather, a subjective-objective, existential and non-existential dimension of reality. It is the measure of an objective existential movement, and an inherent function of the world, which is conceived intellectually.

Time is also eternal. The temporality of time is eternity for two reasons: first is emanation, through which the world came into existence and which is eternal. Second, whatever is thought to be prior to time is necessarily in time, because priority involves time.³² Time, in this respect, is distinct from space, because the finitude of space does not involve space beyond space. The notion of time prior to time involves real time because, as Mulla Sadra believes, the reality of time is in the mind.³³ Here, Mulla Sadra thinks of time as something subjective. Does his notion of subjectivity prove time to be an essence because essence for him is an intellectual property? Time is not a mere subjective notion; it has a reality of its own as well. In this case, the status of time is not like that of essence. For this reason, Mulla Sadra insists that time is something positive and has a peculiar existence, and has an essence as well.³⁴ Time, therefore, has existence as well as essence. The existence of time is the reality of time inherent in the trans-substantial movement of Being, while its essence, or the mental concept of time, is the relational factor of the continuity.³⁵ Mulla Sadra does not claim that time is subjective or objective; it is only from his conceptions of the systematic ambiguity of Being and trans-substantial change that we arrive at this inference.

To return to the differences between Mulla Sadra's and Heidegger's ontology, one is that this Muslim philosopher accepted the doctrine of emanation. For Mulla Sadra, the world emanated or originated from Pure Being. Emanation can be seen as a temporal origination of the world, as everything in the world is determined by trans-substantial movement. All beings in the world go through change and are preceded by the temporal non-existence of their beings. Ontic beings continually come into existence and pass away. Every moment in this substantial change is death and rebirth of the same being with a new substance and a new form. Death exists only in this sense as a constant substantial change. Non-being, like being, becomes the reality of all beings. The world is, thus, a temporal surfacing of the reality of Being, which continues eternally. It is a temporal origination from a non-temporal origin. The temporal originality of the world and the notion of perpetual trans-substantial change seem to contradict one another. It is stated on one hand that the world is originated and on the other Mulla Sadra insists on the idea permanent change. Here, perpetuity does not mean that the world is eternal in the sense that it has no beginning, or that everything existed eternally without beginning. If the world is in a state of flux, nothing will remain perpetual, and only in this regard can we say that the world is in constant change and renewal. This interpretation is also doomed to failure, because the vertical direction of existential movement has a definite objective end. The trans-substantial change ceases when it reaches the highest rank of its existence and perfection. In addition, nothing attains or rises above the supreme level of the ontological rank of Being, and change does not govern beings, which are pure actuality. If we consider an immaterial being such as 'intellect' to be entirely actuality without potentiality, the intellect will not change. Change is a movement from potentiality to actuality but not in an Aristotelian sense because it includes change in substance. It is for this reason that Pure Being and the divine attributes are not affected by change. Potentiality is the state of imperfection while actuality is not. What does Mulla Sadra mean by perpetual change? Does he mean that the realm of potentiality and multiplicity remains eternally? Does this movement end by attaining perfection or the highest possible rank of existence?

Since emanation is thought to be eternal and constant, it seems that 'becoming', in Mulla Sadra's systematic ambiguity of Being, is endless. In their various ontological ranks, ontic beings differ in their intensity, priority, posteriority, perfection and imperfection. They succeed one another vertically as well as horizontally. There will be a beginning and an end for an ontic being that exists at a particular time and space but that is not the case with Being as the inner reality of that ontic being, because trans-substantial change will elevate this being from a lower to a higher rank of existence with a new substance and form. There is a constant substantial change, which gives a new identity to the existents at every moment. In the region of becoming, nothing remains the same and nothing resists the stream of this continuous flux and renewal. Finality can be achieved only in the realm of unity with Pure Being. In the ontological region of history truth, knowledge and moral values, under the impact of this flux of becoming, also change constantly. Nothing in the human world can be seen as eternally existent. Another important point is that, with this great novelty in the world, trans-substantial change, like the dialectical movement in Hegel's philosophy, is necessary and determines the progress towards perfection without leaving individuals room for free choice. This point can be challenged, however, on the same ground as in Hegel's philosophy: since trans-substantial change occurs in Being by Being, it is self-determined and hence a free existential movement. Freedom in this case is interpreted on the ground of necessity. The plausibility of this argument is, however, in the premise that the changeable world is not to be different from what determines the change. But what determines the change is not individual free will. It is something beyond that, which brings everything under its own determination. This argument is better understood in the light of Hegel's category of being-for-itself. In the sphere of 'Determinate Being' in his logic, there are two dialectical aspects: being-in-itself (positive) and being-for-other (negative). These two aspects unite and their union becomes True Infinite. The essential character of this new category is being-for-itself.³⁶ The new category is without external limitation and its otherness is not something other than itself. Consciousness, for example, as being-for-itself, is self-consciousness. It is aware of itself as well as the external world. The external world, at the same time, is nothing but the self-manifestation of consciousness. It is idea in its otherness. In this case the contradictions between consciousness and the external world (its otherness) are negated and consciousness becomes self-related and a being-for-itself. It has no otherness and no external limitation. This is thought to be a necessary ground for freedom in Hegel's philosophy. Similarly in Mulla Sadra's ontology being determines its own modalities and transforms them constantly.

The existential movement of the world is not blind or capricious. It is for a purpose. Being, which is identical with God in Mulla Sadra's onto-theology, has no direct causal relationship with this continuity or with the trans-substantial change of its own modalities. There is an intrinsic motive vehicle responsible for accomplishing this task. This motive is the mystic force of love ('ishq), which is present in everything and creates in lower-ranked beings the desire to long for beings in the higher ranks of existence. The notion of love as the main force in the world depicts a mystic (Sufi) influence on Mulla Sadra's metaphysical thinking. Before Mulla Sadra, Ibn Sina expressed similar views in Risala fil 'Ishq (A Treatise on Love), in which he stated that all entities in the world, including matter, move under the sway of cosmic love.³⁷ The relationship between the self and the Reality in Sufism is primordially emotional rather than theoretical. It is the emotional motive ('ishq) which leads to the rise of the mystic way of cognition (ma'rifah). The emotional motive is not only primordial; it is also the ontological constitution of the world, including the self. Ibn Sina also believed that the self was born with this intrinsic motive: 'Ardent love is innate' all things flow from God in a process of necessary emanation and return to Him in a process of necessary love.'³⁸ The primacy of emotion, however, does not nullify the significance of cognition. The self can approach Reality passionately without appropriating it epistemologically. It is also this emotional motive that elevates the self to the stage where it can experience Reality.

Mulla Sadra is in agreement with Ibn Sina that even prime matter is infected by love. His argument supporting this idea is based on the positivity of prime matter. Prime matter is the realm of potentiality and potentiality is something positive, or that which exists. Being is a reality commonly shared by all existents, including prime matter. To all beings, whether at the level of potentiality or actuality, the divine attributes (knowledge, will and power) function with various degrees of intensity. These attributes belong to Being or the inner reality of all beings. Prime matter, which is at the bottom of the descending process of emanation and is considered to be pure potentiality, is capable of receiving forms and becoming actual. More specifically, it has longing and affection for forms. This mystic love penetrates all modalities of being as a motive to assist their progress towards perfection. It prevails everywhere, and wherever there is existence there will be love and longing for perfection.³⁹ In clarifying this point, Fazlur Rahman remarks that the degree of intensity of 'love' is not only in consciousness, such as in human beings. It also exists equally in all beings. Matter, as the most deficient and lowly ranked of all beings, should have a high degree of intensity of 'love' for the higher ranks.⁴⁰ As a consequence, the world, including inanimate beings, can be seen as a loving body with various degrees of intensity of love and longing for perfection. When human beings attain unity with Intellects or divine attributes through the form of the perfect human being, their yearning reaches the point of satisfaction. They no longer yearn for a higher rank of existence, because their longing for perfection will no longer exist. The world is, therefore, characterized by renewal; the things and events of the past are in the past and those of the future are yet to come. Temporality is the progress of the world as a constant becoming and creation. Every new moment is a non-existence that comes into being through trans-substantial change.

The main consequences of the doctrine of trans-substantial change are religious; for example its impact on the notions of resurrection and divine retribution. They can also be philosophical. It cannot be denied that the doctrine expounded by Mulla Sadra changes our understanding of the two religious notions and also opens a discussion on the transmigration of the soul. The transmigration of the soul has been discussed in the history of Muslim philosophy by Muslim philosophers such as Abu Bakr al-Razi, Ibn Sina and Suhrawardi, in addition to Mulla Sadra. They raised the possibility of the transmigration of the soul from one species to another, for example the human soul to animals or plants. Of particular importance to Mulla Sadra's ideas is Suhrawardi's understanding of this question. Suhrawardi deals with the transmigration of the soul in several books, but in Hikmat al-Ishraq he argues that human bodies are in a position to receive a managing rational soul or managing light, while animals receive only imperfect human souls:

Whatever moral habit captures the commanding light, whatever dark state becomes established in it and becomes its support, the commanding light must transfer its attachment after the corruption of its fortress to a fortress corresponding to that dark state: a fortress of one of the brute animals. When the commanding light departs from the human fortress, it is darkened and desirous of darkness. It does not know its source or the world of light. Wicked states have become fixed in it, and it is drawn to the brute fortress of other animals, and the darkness beckons to it.⁴¹

Suhrawardi argues for the transmigration of the soul by insisting that the condition of life after death is dependent on the balance of knowledge and action in the previous life. With regard to the new form obtained by the human soul, he puts forward the notion of 'suspended forms' (suwar al-mu'allaq). These forms, like the Platonic forms, are transcendent but are not in the immutable rank of existence. Some are dark (evil) and some luminous (good). After death, the wicked souls, those that failed to live a balanced life between knowledge and action, are gathered in hell and deprived of their suspended form in accordance with their character in the previous life.⁴² Shahrazuri, the disciple of Suhrawardi, clarifies the position of his master by saying that Suhrawardi accepted the transmigration of the human soul to an animal body, but rejected the transmigration of the human soul into plants and they will be given bodies of the lower rank of existence.⁴³ When we come to discuss transmigration in Mulla Sadra's philosophy, particularly in the light of trans-substantial change, we expect him to argue against it. Trans-substantial change is an irreversible progress and cannot be seen as a movement from a more perfect or developed to a less perfect and undeveloped rank of existence. A being, like a human soul in a developed human body, is not expected to take an animal body, which is less perfect than a human body and is at a lower rank of being. In other words, demotion in trans-substantial change is not only absurd but impossible.⁴⁴ Mulla Sadra's denial of the transmigration of the soul, according to Fazlur Rahman, is beset with a problem. In Islam, the notion of bodily resurrection implies the transmigration of the soul in so far as it is thought to be a reunion of the soul with a new body.⁴⁵ Mulla Sadra's treatment of this matter takes the middle position between the views of those who believe in the survival of the intellect after death, and those who accept the survival of the body as well. He explains that in the afterlife the human intellect is able to apprehend the general ideas in the rational realm in the way it apprehends and perceives different physical objects in this world. But the apprehended general ideas are not mere concepts without a reality of their own. They are real, ontological and identical with actual existence, and are experienced by the human intellect. What then happens to the human body at death? Is it disjoined from the soul and does it then decay? Will the human soul be given a new body? To answer these questions Mulla Sadra, like Suhrawardi, talks about the World of the Images ('alam al-khayal). The bodies of the undeveloped souls, the souls that have committed sins, deteriorate at the time of death and are not reassembled as before. In order to survive physically, they create a material body for themselves by externalizing their inner psychic states in the form of a body in the World of the Images. Thus a human soul that is guilty of committing a sin will imagine itself as an animal.⁴⁶ The important questions that arise here are: what is the destiny of the human soul that has gone through trans-substantial change? Am I the same sinner of yesterday who committed a sin to be punished or substantially transformed into another human being? If I am not the same person, why should I be punished for the sins committed by me in the past? There is, no doubt, a problem here. But Mulla Sadra provides two different answers to these questions. On one hand, he believes that the identity of a person relies on the intellectual form of that person, which exists in the mind of God.⁴⁷ On the other hand, the soul is thought to survive throughout the evolutionary changes, and that this helps the person to retain an identity.⁴⁸ This solution, which has similarity with Descartes's view on the human soul as the self-substance, is in my opinion in contradiction with the implication of the trans-substantial change.

The philosophical consequences of trans-substantial change can be summarized in three points: the temporal contingency of the world; the infection of being by non-being or nothingness; and the relativity of truth and values.

Mulla Sadra demonstrates that the world is in constant substantial change. This ontological view is an indication of the non-being of beings that have not yet come into existence. Non-being or nothingness is at the heart of the world. That is to say, an existent is preceded by its own non-existence.⁴⁹ The passage of being into non-being and of non-being into being is 'becoming', which was also demonstrated by Hegel and discussed earlier, and in contradiction of Aristotle's understanding of Nothingness. In Aristotle's ontology, non-being is neither in motion nor at rest, because for non-being to move it should be in a place, which it is not, and if it were it would be somewhere.⁵⁰ Mulla Sadra seems to have borrowed the idea of coming-into-being from Mir Damad. Sabzawari, in explaining the relationship between eternities and becoming in time, states that becoming through perpetual duration or constant creation was proposed by Mir Damad. He further maintains that, for Mir Damad, the coming-into-being of the world by way of becoming through perpetual duration is a temporal coming-into-existence, or 'the precedence of "preceding non-existence" over the existence of a thing by way of separable precedence of it, i.e., of the non-existence'.⁵¹ This is an interesting point in Hegel's logic as well as in the phenomenological interpretation of the structure of consciousness in Sartre's Being and Nothingness. Being, for Hegel, is an undeduced beginning and pure because it has no determination or qualification. It is the most abstract category in his dialectical logic. It is nothing more than a simple 'isness'.⁵² Since this undeduced beginning has not passed over into another or its opposition, it is self-identical. When it produces its opposite it undergoes change and becomes different. But saying that Being is an immediacy and has no determination except 'isness' implies mere emptiness and the equivalent of 'Nothing' or non-being.⁵³ Being, therefore, becomes the birthplace of nothingness, and the two categories become the first two oppositions in Hegel's logic holding the relationship of identity in difference. When 'Being' and 'Nothingness' pass over into one another they produce the category of 'becoming'. When understood in the light of the dialectical interpretation in Hegel's logic, the meaning and significance of becoming as an important category in Mulla Sadra's ontology can be grasped. It is a process that involves being and nothingness. Being of a being is subsequent to its nothingness; this is the temporal origination of the ontic being in the realm of potentiality and diversity. Sartre also deals with the problem of Nothingness in detail. But, unlike Mulla Sadra and Hegel, he insists that Pure Being cannot become the source of Nothingness and that the only being responsible for bringing nothingness into the world with itself is consciousness. This is described by Sartre in Being and Nothingness as follows:

We perceived that nothingness can be conceived neither outside of being, nor as a complementary, abstract notion, nor as an infinite milieu where Being is suspended. Nothingness must be given at the heart of being, in order for us to be able to apprehend that particular type of realities which we have called négarités. But this intra-mundane Nothingness cannot be produced by Being-in-itself; the notion of Being as full positivity does not contain Nothingness as one of its structures. We cannot even say that Being excludes it. Being lacks all relations to it.

Hence the question which is put to us now with a particular urgency: if Nothingness can be conceived neither outside of Being, nor in terms of Being, and if on the other hand, since it is non-being, it cannot derive from itself the necessary force to 'nihilate itself', where does Nothingness come from?⁵⁴

To prove his point, Sartre gives the example of finding Pierre in the café where Sartre tries to say that Nothingness is experienced by consciousness. Sartre also argues with Kant's view that negation is the quality of a judgment (proposition), and Nothingness is logically prior to negation; that we experience Nothingness and negation before making a judgment.⁵⁵ The distinction between the existentialist views of Mulla Sadra and Sartre is in the origin or birthplace of Nothingness. Mulla Sadra insists that all contingent beings, including the human intellect, are preceded by their own non-existence in the world. For Sartre, Nothingness is a characteristic of the ontological structure of consciousness. The being of non-conscious being is not infected by Nothingness.

As far as the distinction between Being and Nothingness is concerned, it is clear, at least for Sartre, that both can be experienced intuitively as two realities. In Hegel's dialectical logic, they pass over into one another and their causal relationship can be recognized. But what is the distinction between one non-being (nothingness) and another? Is there a causal relationship between them? Mulla Sadra does not engage in this discussion, but Sabzawari, one of the followers of Mulla Sadra, says that the distinction between non-beings is imaginary and they have no causal relationship: a non-being cannot be a cause for another non-being. Is it possible, then, to say that the non-being of clouds is a cause for the non-being of rain? Or that the non-existence of oxygen is a cause for the non-being of human life? Sabzawari would say that such statements, which show the causal connection between two non-beings, are only the realization of the absence of beings such as the non-presence of clouds and rain, and that in reality we are not dealing with non-being or nothingness.⁵⁶ But when we study read Sartre we find out that the realization of the non-presence of a being, as in the case of searching for Pierre in the café, is a legitimate ground for experiencing the non-being of Pierre. It is the non-being or non-presence of Pierre that produces a negative proposition such as 'There is no Pierre in the café'. If we go back to the causal relationship between the non-existence of oxygen in space and the non-existence of human life and say that 'Such a void is the cause of death', we are making an affirmative proposition that explicates the causal relationship between two non-beings in an affirmative way. Meanwhile, we cannot deny that every affirmation is a negation. Void, here, can be understood as the absence of oxygen; so that the non-being of oxygen in space causes death or the non-being of life. Sabzawari's argument for the non-existence of the causal relationship between non-beings can thus be refuted.

Another philosophical consequence is that trans-substantial change leads to the relativity of truth and values. The doctrine of trans-substantial change deconstructs the metaphysical foundation of universal truth and values, as nothing is considered to be eternal and stable in the world. Everything is in constant change, including human society and our understanding of reality. As a consequence of this, no system of belief can claim to be absolute and final, because the novelty prevails. This consequence also had a profound impact on Mulla Sadra's understanding of politics, in particular political Islam, which proclaims the divinity and universality of its discourse. Mulla Sadra made a vivid distinction between religion and politics or between religious laws and political laws and rejected the identity of the former with the latter. Religious laws are characterized by generality and necessity, and political laws by particularity and dependence on the human situation.⁵⁷ This distinction between religion and politics in Mulla Sadra's philosophy stands in contradiction to Shi'ite political thought, which claims a necessary link between religion and politics, and states that no true Islamic political system is established without religious laws. A true Islamic political system is possible on the foundation of the religious laws and the presence of an imam (a spiritual leader and a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad) to implement the law. Although Mulla Sadra is a Shi'ite thinker and accepts the doctrine of the imamate, he still believes in constant change in nature and history. For him, however, trans-substantial change rules over both nature and history; ontology and social system are necessarily interconnected. It is not possible to understand Mulla Sadra's political philosophy without understanding his metaphysics. For him, as for Hegel, metaphysics is the foundation of all natural and historical phenomena.⁵⁸

Any socio-political system existing at any stage of human history is not final and should be superseded by a social system richer and more perfect in content. According to Mulla Sadra, in a perfect society all members live together in harmony and cooperate to achieve the highest good and the full realization of Truth. In contrast, in an imperfect society the members cooperate to execute evil.⁵⁹ Since change is the essential characteristic of the world, the imperfect society should also be seen in the light of the evolutionary process of the existential movement of the world. The evolutionary process of the world is towards perfection rather than deterioration. Mulla Sadra's view on political leadership in a perfect society is similar to that of al-Farabi in Mabadi Ara Ahl al-Madina al-Fadila. Al-Farabi, like Mulla Sadra, makes his metaphysical interpretation of reality the foundation of his political philosophy. The socio-political system in a 'perfect society' needs to function in harmony with the system of the universe designed by the First Cause. For al-Farabi, this interconnection is founded on the doctrine of emanation. Following this doctrine, al-Farabi places his view of the relationship between the state and civil society in the hierarchy of the system of the universe, in which the emanation of various forms of being flows from the First Cause. This metaphysical structure is a political model.⁶⁰ The diversity of emanation represents varying social groups and political institutions, which are subordinated to the authority or to the will of the supreme statesman. Mulla Sadra, like al-Farabi, holds the view that a leader of the perfect society should be someone of sound mind and body who has attained the rank of actual intellect:

That man [the leader] is a person over whom nobody has any sovereignty whatsoever. He is a man who has reached his perfection and has become actual intellect and actual being thought (intelligized), his representative faculty having by nature reached its utmost perfection in the way stated by us; this faculty of his is predisposed by nature to receive, either in waking life or in sleep, from the Active Intellect the particulars, either as they are or by imitating them, and also the intelligibles, by imitating them. His Passive Intellect will have reached its perfection by [having apprehended] all the intelligibles, so that none of them is kept back from it, and it will have become actual intellect and actual being thought.⁶¹

The leader of the perfect society is not the lawmaker but the executor of the law, which is divine and pre-given. Like the ruling organ in the human body, the leader is chiefly responsible for the rise and fall of state and society. The bearer of such responsibility must further possess two kinds of qualities: natural (inborn) and acquired. Natural qualities are beyond one's capacity to choose or acquire after birth. For example, the statesman cannot choose which family or situation to be born into. The prime inborn quality, which precedes all other qualities, is that a statesman is born as an imam; in the Shi'ite context, he should be a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad, a male from his household, ahl al-Bayt:

This is the sovereign over whom no other human being has any sovereignty whatsoever; he is the imam, he is the first sovereign of the excellent city, he is the sovereign of the excellent nation, and the sovereign of the universal state (the oikumene).⁶²

Although al-Farabi does not mention in Ara that the leader should be from ahl al-bayt, it is clear that the notion of the imam, which is explicitly expressed in Ara, logically presupposes this understanding of leadership. The imam is the only statesman qualified to lead a perfect society, politically as well as spiritually. He is a leader who is granted revelation or is in contact with God, receiving inspiration from the First Principle to guide his perfect society. For Mulla Sadra, the leader should be a theosopher (hakim) who, on attaining perfection in all intellectual faculties, becomes a prophet.⁶³ This view seems incompatible with Mulla Sadra's idea of the distinction between religion and politics. The leader as theosopher and prophet in a perfect society has religious as well as political authority. His rule becomes the execution of the divine will and law. The compatibility of religion and politics belongs to the realm of becoming, where nothing remains stable, or where politics, like religion, becomes universal. But since nothing escapes trans-substantial change, religion and politics must each go through change from a less perfect to a more perfect stage of existence.⁶⁴ The purpose of political life, in the perfect society, is spiritual salvation, so the political order will be divinely oriented and the state will be based on the divine creeds. Mulla Sadra's analysis of politics is, in the light of his metaphysics, an intellectual attempt to explain the place of human beings in the world for achieving collectivism and divinity. He believes that politics is the social sphere where the individual soul experiences belonging to a social system and works with other individuals for a better form of collective life.⁶⁵ He also believes that the leadership in the perfect society is the real guardian of social justice and the divine laws.⁶⁶ Political life is, therefore, imperative in the evolutionary process of existence. The achievement of perfection and the realization of Truth are possible in history. The worldly life is a ladder to ascend to another form of living in the Hereafter as another aspect of existence.

As mentioned earlier, Muslim philosophers before Mulla Sadra, under the influence of Aristotle, tended to acknowledge the reality of change only in the form of accidentality. For Mulla Sadra what was foremost in his mind was change in the form of becoming, with substantial and accidental changes. His novel interpretation of the world is a genuinely innovative philosophical project which involves the development of a new intellectual outlook, conceptual framework and values. The task of philosophy is to actively interpret reality rather than give a mere conceptual translation of it. To achieve this, the creative interpretation should break from tradition and prepare the way for the future. Next, in the light of this innovative interpretation, Mulla Sadra's existential philosophy proves to be far from infected by dogmatism and prejudice, because for him every philosophical conviction remains transitory. Virtually everything about the world, human society, truth, values and knowledge, becomes a prey to change and nothing is immutable in the world except novelty.

Mulla Sadra and the Problem of Knowledge

This chapter contains an account of Mulla Sadra's theory of knowledge. From the outset, it should be remembered that the problem of knowledge in Mulla Sadra's philosophy developed out of his ontological system. I also argue that his epistemology should be understood in the light of his interpretation of reality. The doctrine of the primacy of Being is the foundation of the possibility of knowledge. It suggests that in order to know something we need to begin with its existence. Being becomes an ontological condition for knowing. To make this issue more adequately appropriated, our task will be at the start to trace the notion of intuitive knowledge in the history of Muslim philosophy, which plays a significant role in Mulla Sadra's epistemology, and then continues with an explanation of Mulla Sadra's understanding of knowledge and its source.

Before Mulla Sadra, Muslim philosophers such as Ibn Sina, Suhrawardi and the Sufis advocated the idea that reality should be apprehended directly by intuition rather than by rationalistic discourse. Because Mulla Sadra's treatment of the problem of knowledge is so similar to Suhrawardi's, it is difficult to make a distinction between them. Nevertheless, what is apprehended by intuition for Mulla Sadra is the reality of Being rather than essence. Being and knowledge are not two different things, but are intertwined. Being, by revealing itself or being revealed, renders knowledge possible and knowledge makes the truth of Being comprehensible.

Intuition is the source of knowledge for Ibn Sina. Knowledge is obtained intuitively by the human mind when it comes into contact with the external reality; the active intellect responds by providing the content of intuition. The content of intuition, as Kant also states in his Critique of Pure Reason, is provided from outside. However, Kant does not deal with the external source of knowledge in a mystical way. For him, the faculties of sensibility and understanding are limited and determined by the external content of the phenomenal world and by the subjective necessary conditions or forms such as space and time, in the case of sensibility, and the table of the categories in the case of understanding. Also, for Ibn Sina and Kant, the human mind is empty without the given external content, and knowledge is possible as the result of the interaction between internal and external conditions. To clarify this point, Ibn Sina uses the metaphor of a mirror, saying that the human mind before acquiring knowledge is like a tarnished mirror, which can be polished by knowledge if it is turned to the light of the sun (the active intellect).¹ The human mind then acquires knowledge by intuition and does not rely on the phenomenal world as do sense-experience or rationalistic discourse for obtaining intuitive knowledge. This kind of knowledge, as Majid Fakhry remarks, 'stems from that supernatural or supermundane agency, which governs all the process of generation and corruption, including the process of cognition, in this world, i.e., the active intellect'.²

Acquiring knowledge by intuition varies from individual to individual. Those who get closer to the active intellect are enlightened by attaining the intelligible forms stored in the active intellect, and rely totally on intuitive knowledge rather than discursive knowledge to reach the rank of the prophethood.³ Intuitive knowledge is, therefore, not the product of the human intellect but springs from a divine source. It is the radiation of the active intellect upon the intellect of the seekers of the truth. Here, Ibn Sina makes a distinction between four types of human beings: the highest are those who have acquired prophecy and can create miracles due to the development of their intuitive and their imaginative power and their contact with the active intellect. The second type includes those who have developed their intuitive but not their imaginative powers. The third type is those who have developed their theoretical power but not their practical power. Finally, there are the human beings who have developed only their practical power.⁴
